

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

Chronology of Hansard's Debates.

The PARLIAMENTARY HISTORY contains all that can be collected of the Legislative History of this country from the Conquest to the close of the XVIIIth Century (1803), 36 vols. The chief sources whence these Debates are derived are the Constitutional History, 24 vols.; Sir Simonds D'Ewes' Journal; Debates of the Commons in 1620 and 1621; Chandler and Timberland's Debates, 22 vols.; Grey's Debates of the Commons, from 1667 to 1694, 10 vols.; Almon's Debates, 24 vols.; Debrett's Debates, 63 vols.; The Hardwicke Papers; Debates in Parliament by Dr. Johnson, &c., &c.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

FIFTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 5 AUGUST, 1886, IN THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

46 FOURTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1890.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 2nd May, 1890.

COMMISSION.

The following Bill received the Royal Assent:—

1. South Indian Railway Purchase.

BUSINESS OF THE GRAND COMMITTEES.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): My Lords, there were three Bills which passed the Second Reading here not very long ago in which many of your Lordships take an interest—the Industrial Schools Bill, the Reformatory Schools Bill, and the Juvenile Offenders' Bill. I think it might be convenient if the noble and learned Lord, who is Chairman of the Standing Grand Committee on Law, to which those Bills were referred, can state to the House when he thinks that Committee will be able to take those Bills into consideration.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, at the last meeting of the Committee the Open Spaces Bill still remained uncompleted, several clauses having to be considered. The Bill of my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack also has to be considered, and the labours are yet incomplete of the sub-Committee on the Partnership Bill, which is still in progress. Inasmuch as those measures stand in front of these three Bills, it would probably be more convenient that they should not be commenced until Tuesday week.

*VISCOUNT CROSS: I understand that some noble Lords have Amendments to move upon these Bills. I think I must make an appeal to those noble Lords who wish to move Amendments that they will place them as soon as possible on the Paper, so that the Home Office officials may have time to consider them before they come on for discussion in Committee.

VOL. CCCXLIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 63.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, it will be in the recollection of your Lordships that the noble and learned Lord thought it right to postpone the discussion on the Second Reading of this Bill until to-day. If the object and operation of the Bill is simply to preserve existing rights further postponement would be unnecessary; but should there be any great encroachment in point of jurisdiction I should desire to have an opportunity of alleging reasons why your Lordships should not assent.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I will, of course, at once accede to the request of my noble and learned Friend, and I will fix the Second Reading for Thursday next.

Second Reading put off to Thursday next.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN BILL.

A Bill for the better protection of children—Was presented by the Lord Chaworth (E. Meath); read 1<sup>a</sup>; to be printed; and to be read 2<sup>a</sup> on Thursday next. (No. 68.)

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE.

Report from, That the Committee have added the Lord Leigh and the Lord De Ramsey to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c., for the consideration of the Industrial Schools Bill, Reformatory Schools Bill, Juvenile Offenders Bill.

Read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 2nd May, 1890.

The House met at Two of the clock.

H.M.S. ICARUS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state the number of desertions from H.M.S. Icarus since she has been under Commander Annesley, and the number of punishments inflicted on members of the crew; and whether any complaints have reached him as to the discipline on board the vessel, and what course, if any, the Admiralty will take in the matter?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Commander Annesley was appointed to the Icarus on July 6, 1886. The total number of desertions between July 1, 1886, and September 30, 1889, was 28. During the same period the total number of summary punishments awarded was 619, and there have been three court-martial cases. No complaints as to the discipline on board have been received at the Admiralty, but I shall be quite ready to look into any facts that the hon. Gentleman may have in his possession.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask whether the noble Lord has seen the statement in the Western Morning News, asserting that since June, 1888, the punishments have been greatly in excess of any former period, and that the complaint is not limited to the men, but includes some of the officers as well. Under these circumstances, will the noble Lord have an inquiry made, as I understand the vessel is about to arrive at Plymouth?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I do not attach much importance to newspaper reports, but if the hon. Member will place me in possession of his information, I shall feel it my duty to have an inquiry made.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I will submit to the noble Lord the substance of some of the statements which have reached me, and which, I think, warrant the questions I have put.

CRACKED SOVEREIGNS.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea Town): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to call in cracked sovereigns, which are of frequent occurrence, and, not being readily passed in currency, occasion serious inconvenience to those, especially of the working-classes, who may have received them in payment of wages?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Cracked sovereigns and half-sovereigns, if not below the legal weight, and cracked silver coins of all denominations, are accepted and exchanged at the Bank of England and its branches. It would be impossible to call in such coins, and I am informed that they can hardly be said to be of frequent occurrence.

MR. DILLWYN: Would it be possible to provide that change should be given at the Post Office, as great inconvenience occasionally occurs to poor people who are paid their wages on Saturday night, and find that they cannot get their money?

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not see how any inconvenience or difficulty can arise, because persons who accept these coins will know that they can get them changed at the bankers.

THE CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) ACT.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been drawn to the account, in the Journal of Jurisprudence for April, of a trial in the High Court of Justiciary, in Edinburgh, of persons charged with theft, from which it appears that, before the jury had considered and delivered their verdict, reference was made to previous convictions against the prisoners; whether such reference to previous convictions was in express violation of Section 67 of "The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887"; and if the Government will, under the circumstances, recommend any alteration or remission of the sentences?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I find that the proceedings to which the question relates form the subject of a Petition for release of the persons convicted, which is at present before the Secretary for Scotland. The hon. Gentleman will, therefore, not expect me to answer the question.

KEW GARDENS.

SIR JOHN ELLIS (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the labourers and constables in Kew Gardens are paid at the same rate of wages as in the London Parks, under the control of Her Majesty's Office of Works; and, if not, whether he will state the amount of the difference in the rate of wages respectively, and on what grounds the difference is made, the duties being analogous; whether a gatekeeper, after being in the service 34 years, has been recently dismissed at the age of 72, with a gratuity of £34 without pension; and whether, being still capable of lighter work, he could be retained on the staff at reduced wages?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, University of Dublin): In the London Parks, labourers are paid from 21s. to 24s. per week. At Kew they are paid from 18s. to 20s. per week. The difference is in proportion to the rates of wages which obtain generally in London and the suburbs respectively. J. Lywood, a gatekeeper, has recently been retired, at the age of 70, after 29 years' service, with a gratuity of £34. Under the Act of 1887, this is the maximum compensation that could be given to him. I am afraid there is no other work in which he could be employed.

FAIR RENTS.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, so far back as November 1887, Daniel Kearney, of Coolegad, County Wicklow, served an originating notice on his landlord to have a fair rent fixed, and that the case has not since been heard, Kearney having to pay the full rent all the time; and whether anything can be done to accelerate the movements of the Sub-Commissioners?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners report that an originating notice was received at their office in the case mentioned on 31st January, 1888. The case will be listed for hearing in its turn. Every effort is being made to dispose of the cases now outstanding.

In reply to Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.),

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said: The amount of arrears in the Land Court are being diminished.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): How is it that the proceedings in connection with the Court should be confined to Ulster, and why should one province of Ireland have a preference over any other?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that such is the fact, but if the hon. and learned Member will put a question on the Paper, I will make inquiry.

Mr. M. HEALY (Cork): Is it not the fact that in the County of Cork that sometimes when the tenant has succeeded in getting a fair rent fixed he has found that in consequence of the delay in hearing the case he has had to pay rent two years in advance?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information on the subject.

HOLYHEAD HARBOUR.

Mr. LEWIS (Anglesey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether an estimate was made by Sir John Hawkshaw, or other person, for removing the Platters Rocks inside Holyhead Harbour; and, if so, what was the estimated costs of removing them down to 25 feet below low water mark and down to 20 feet; whether there has been a new survey of the Platters lately made, and whether, with the improved machinery now in use, they could be removed down to 25 feet at so much less cost than the estimate made by Sir John Hawkshaw; and whether the Department has in its possession a plan of the Platters Rocks; and, if so, whether there would be any objection to produce it?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): In 1888, Sir, John Hawkshaw estimated the cost of removing the Platters Rocks in Holyhead Harbour down to 26 feet below low water at £250,000, and down to 20 feet below low water at £70,000. In December last Mr. Hayter, who has been connected for many years with the harbour, and is thoroughly conversant with the latest improvements in engineering machinery, carefully examined the question, but gave me no ground for believing that removal to the depths mentioned in the hon. Member's question would be less expensive than the sums mentioned by Sir John Hawkshaw. I am considering whether a partial removal to a less depth may not give practically all the advantages which the class of vessels which now use the Harbour of Refuge can desire. Plans and sections were prepared for the purpose of making the Estimates to which I have alluded, but they are not in a form which could well be produced to Parliament, except at a large expense.

ARMENIA.

Mr. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when it may be expected that the hitherto unpublished Papers relating to the condition of things in Armenia from 1881 to 1889 will be presented to Parliament?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Papers in question are not in print and are voluminous. Their publication would not be of any public advantage. Those lately presented appear sufficiently to describe recent events, and to show the attitude of Her Majesty's Government in regard to them.

Mr. F. STEVENSON: Is it the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to present any Papers relating to the state of Armenia between 1881 and 1889?

*Sir J. FERGUSSON: No, Sir.

LUNACY AND THE INSUFFICIENT ASYLUM ACCOMMODATION.

Mr. WILLIAM CORBET: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware that the numbers of registered lunatics in Great Britain and Ireland have increased from 55,525 in 1862 to 111,979 in 1889; whether he has observed from the Reports of the Lunacy Commissioners that, notwithstanding the great increase of asylum accommodation annually provided for a long series of years, a large amount of additional accommodation is urgently required; has he any evidence to show that drink contributes a large annual percentage to the number of lunatics; and will the Government take into consideration the adoption of some means of dealing with the subject?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am not in possession of the exact figures for Ireland, but the numbers of registered lunatics in England and Wales were—January 1, 1862, 41,129; January 1, 1889, 84,340. I am informed by the Lunacy Commissioners that extra accommodation is required in some counties, but in many others it is sufficient to supply probable future requirements for some years to come. The Table 34 of the 43rd Report of the Lunacy Commissioners shows that in the cases of 18,290 out of 136,478 persons admitted into institutions for the insane, intemperance in drink was stated to have been the cause, or one of the causes, of insanity. The Government will always be ready to consider any suggestions for dealing with this subject.

GALLANTRY AT SEA.

MR. GILES (Southampton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will consider the desirability of awarding to Mr. Barker, the third officer of the steamship Colonist, a better reward than a bronze medal for rescuing the master and crew of the bark Hebe, when the captain of the steamship Erus received a piece of plate, and the third officer a gold medal for attempting and failing to do what Mr. Barker and his boat's crew so gallantly effected at the imminent risk of their lives?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Mr. W. H. Parker (not Barker), the third officer of the steamship Colonist, was awarded the bronze medal of the Board of Trade for gallantry in connection with the rescue of the crew of the Hebe, consistently with the practice of the Board of Trade when dealing with exceptional cases of rescue of a British crew by a British vessel. The rewards granted to the officers of the North German Lloyd's Steamship Ems (not Erus) were, consistently with the practice of the Board when recognising the services rendered to British seamen by foreigners, of a different character. The medal awarded to the third officer was a Foreign Office gold medal, not the Board of Trade gallantry medal.

THE NEW CODE.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Instructions to Inspectors are in any way intended to curtail the liberty of classification which is granted by the New Code; and, if not, whether he will consider the expediency of issuing some authoritative explanation of the paragraphs in the Instructions which are held by many teachers to be restrictive in their character?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Nothing in the Instructions is intended to restrict absolute liberty of classification. It is not anticipated that teachers will find it expedient in the interest of their scholars to use this liberty to excess; but Her Majesty's Inspectors will be instructed not to interfere with any classification that does not impair the efficiency of the school, nor retard the due progress of the scholars as a whole.

THE ACCIDENT AT THE CARLISLE STATION.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to lay upon the Table the Report of the Board of Trade Inspector respecting the fatal railway accident outside Carlisle Station during March last?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am sorry that there should have been any delay in this matter. I expect that the Papers will be laid on the Table in the course of next week.

EXCISE LICENCES.

MR. AGG-GARDNER (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Clause 9 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill is intended to prohibit any person to whom an Excise licence is granted from carrying on the trade or business mentioned in the licence in various premises, or whether a person will be permitted to conduct a business in more than one set of premises provided he takes out a licence for each set?

MR. GOSCHEN: The clause is not intended to prohibit a person from carrying on an Excise trade in various premises. It merely requires a licence to be taken out for each set of premises in which such a trade is carried on.

MANCHESTER ASSIZES.

SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware that no notice of the opening of the Assizes on the 3rd of May was sent down to Manchester till the 25th of last month, thus leaving only eight days' interval during which the suitors could give notice of entering causes for trial, whereas 10 full days notice is required by law, the consequence being that only two causes, which happened to have been set down previously, will stand for trial next Saturday; and whether it is in his power to take any steps to prevent a recurrence of the grave inconvenience experienced by suitors on this occasion?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have communicated this question of my hon. Friend to the Lord Chancellor, who is now making an inquiry into the matter.

POST OFFICE—OFFICERS OF THE SECOND DIVISION.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state why he recently declined to receive a deputation of second class officers of the Savings Bank Department (Major Establishment of the General Post Office) on the subject of their re-classification with the "Second Division" of the Service, although he personally received a deputation of telegraphists on a recent occasion; and whether the same classification will be applied to the Secretary's Office, Accountant General's Office, and Money Order Office, as is to be applied to the second class of the Savings Bank?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): In reply to the hon. Member, I intimated to the officers to whom he refers my reason for not receiving the deputation. That reason was that, having made myself acquainted with all the facts of the case, and having come to a final decision, which, in my opinion, is a just and proper one, I have no intention of departing from that decision. The case differed entirely from that of the telegraphists, with regard to most of whose requests I have not yet arrived at a decision. As regards the last part of the question, I will, when the interests of the Service permit, give the hon. Member the information he asks for.

MR. A. WILLIAMS: Is it the fact that a Memorial has already been presented signed by 71 of the members of the Accountant General's Office, asking the right hon. Gentleman to consider the grievances of the clerks in this matter?

*MR. RAIKES: I am not quite sure. I believe there has been some communication, but I will ascertain.

MR. A. WILLIAMS: Is it not the fact that these Civil servants are under the impression that their case has not been sufficiently made known, together with their objections to the new scheme. Would it not be better, under the circumstance, for the right hon. Gentleman to allow a deputation to see him in order to explain their position?

*MR. RAIKES: I am always glad to receive a deputation if such a course would facilitate a decision; but when a decision has been arrived at, there is very little use in receiving a deputation. I believe that the scheme which has been determined upon is more favourable than any other that has been suggested.

MR. A. WILLIAMS: Would it not tend to remove a misconception which prevails in their minds if the right hon. Gentleman would receive a deputation and explain matters?

*MR. RAIKES: I am always anxious to receive and to give information.

CHELSEA SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the limits of £30 in one year, and the maximum limit of £200, prescribed by law for deposits in Trustee Savings Banks were habitually violated at the Chelsea Savings Bank, and that, by the advice or connivance of the officials of that bank, some depositors opened four or five accounts; whether any report upon this subject has been received by the official liquidator; and whether any claim has been preferred by the National Debt Commissioners against the trustees and managers for interest obtained from them on such illegal accounts?

MR. GOSCHEN: There is no doubt that excessive deposits have, in many cases, been permitted, and that there have been grave irregularities. Connivance (whether active or passive I cannot say) on the part of some of the officials there must have been. I have not seen any report to the official liquidator upon this subject. No claim has yet been preferred by the National Debt Commissioners, as they have not as yet official information on this point, but the matter will not be lost sight of.

LABOUR IN PORTUGAL.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if Her Majesty's Government has any official confirmation of the report in the newspapers that the Portuguese Government has introduced the eight hours' day into all its State workshops, arsenals, &c.?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, Sir; but at the Berlin Labour Conference the Portuguese Delegates stated that a day of eight hours' work is guaranteed to the labourers in the State tobacco factories, about half of whom are females.

THE ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

MR. FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will favourably consider the insertion into the Elementary Education Bill, which the Government have undertaken to introduce during the next Session of Parliament, of provisions prepared with a view to relieve the managers of public elementary schools from the hardships which many now suffer, from the pressure of the 17s. 6d. limit and from their liability to the payment of rates?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): My hon. Friend has referred in his question to the Elementary Education Bill which the Government have undertaken to introduce next Session, and he has asked me to give him certain specific engagements as to the provisions of that Bill. I must remind my hon. Friend that the Government have announced that in the scheme of assisted education which will be embodied in their measure they intend to provide that voluntary schools shall be enabled to take the part they have hitherto filled in meeting the necessities of elementary education in England. They cannot this Session state the specific provisions of the Bill they hope to introduce, and I trust my hon. Friend will be satisfied with the general assurance I have now given him.

THE LENGTH OF THE SESSION.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government have come to any decision as to the best means of securing the rising of the House of Commons at an earlier period of the year than has been the case in recent years?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry to say that the Government have not yet been able to come to any decision as to the best means of securing this most desirable object. I am afraid the subject is more difficult than the hon. Member supposes.

MR. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: I shall return to this subject after Whitsuntide.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can say on what day the Second Reading of the Employers' Liability Bill will be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not yet in a position to name a day.

MR. D. CRAWFORD: Will it be taken next week?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid not.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): Considering the importance of the Bill, and the interest taken in it by the working classes, will the right hon. Gentleman undertake that the Bill will be brought on at a time when it will receive adequate discussion?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Undoubtedly it will be my duty to do so.

POSTMASTERS' PAY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the difficulty in classifying and placing on scales of pay, with annual increments, the general body of Postmasters has now been got over; and, if so, when will the new arrangement come into operation?

*MR. RAIKES: No, Sir; the objections to the arrangements suggested by the hon. Member remain the same. The system of paying salaries with a regular increment according to scale does not appear to be properly applicable to appointments such as Postmasterships, the duties attached to which are liable to increase or decrease with the growth or diminution of local business, or owing to changes in the Postal Service. Under the present system the remuneration can be adjusted fairly and accurately in accordance with the increase or decrease of work, so that if the business grows less, or remains stationary, the salary need not be raised. Under the scale system the Department might be paying a Postmaster an increasing salary for decreasing or stationary work. The present method is the most advantageous to Postmasters who, on their appointments, at once receive the maximum salary which the amount of business will then justify.

IRISH JURORS.

DR. FOX (King's Co., Tullamore): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that, on the trial of Jeremiah Davoren, at the late Tullamore Assizes, no less than 70 jurors were ordered by the Crown to stand aside, including all the Town Commissioners and the Chairman of that body, with all the elected Poor Law Guardians and the Chairman of that body; and whether he will take some steps to save these jurors from this grave inconvenience, expense, and insult?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that at the trial mentioned the Crown exercised its right to order jurors to stand aside, and that the defence also exercised its right of challenging jurors from serving. I have no information as to the avocations of the jurors so ordered to stand aside or so challenged. Under the existing Jury Laws all persons liable to serve as jurors are bound to attend, notwithstanding the fact that but a small proportion of their number can actually be required to serve. This is of the essence of those laws, and must continue so long as those laws exist.

Mr. Patrick O'Brien

IRISH PIERS AND HARBOURS.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will give the Return down on the Paper relating to the construction, cost, and condition of piers and harbours in Ireland?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The hon. Member will find full particulars in a Paper which has already been laid upon the Table.

GREYSTONES HARBOUR.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he has received a resolution, passed at a meeting of the inhabitants and fishermen of Greystones, calling his attention to the fact that the harbour just completed at that place is already nearly filled up with shingle, asking to have a north groyne constructed to prevent further mischief, and that the present accumulations may be dredged out; and whether the Government intend to take any steps to make the harbour accessible?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; I have received the resolution to which the hon. Member refers, and the subject is receiving attention. The decision must depend upon how the available surplus is to be disposed of; but the Irish Government are considering the matter.

MR. CLANCY: Is there any surplus from this fund?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Or has it to be taken from the fund provided by the Land Purchase Bill?

MR. JACKSON: It is hardly necessary to answer the last question. There is, or rather will be, a surplus available from the Sea Fisheries Fund when some loans are repaid which extend over a period of time. Not very much has been paid at present.

MR. GEORGE SANDES.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether an inquiry has been ordered by the Government into the charges recently made in this House against Mr. George Sandes, J.P., Listowel, County Kerry; and, if so, where the inquiry is to be held, by whom it is to be made, and whether it is to be open to the public?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Executive Government have no power to order an inquiry in the case in question. The Magistracy are under the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who, as I have already stated in this House, has been in correspondence with the gentleman mentioned. As this question appears on this morning's Paper without previous notice, time has not admitted of my ascertaining how the matter at present stands.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Has the right hon. Gentleman put himself in communication with the Lord Chancellor and conveyed to him the accusations which have been made in this House? I understand that there is an investigation going on.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I apprehend that the Lord Chancellor is fully acquainted with all that takes place in this House.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider it worth while to remind the Lord Chancellor of the affidavits which have been filed in this case? Is there any chance of a thorough investigation taking place?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not the least doubt that the Lord Chancellor will order any inquiry that may be necessary.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why should it take two months before the Lord Chancellor thinks fit to take action? That has not been the course pursued in reference to charges against Members of the Nationalist Party.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Member seems to think that the more serious the accusation the more easily it can be disposed of. That is not the case.

JOHN DALY.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Report on the prison treatment of John Daly will be distributed to Members?

MR. MATTHEWS: I hope that the Report will be in the hands of Members next week. It has been in the hands of the printers since the 26th ult.

THE TEA DUTIES—A CORRECTION.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I regret to have to inform the House that a serious mistake was made in the computations of the price of tea per lb. purchased in the East End of London and given by me to the House in the Debate on the Budget Resolutions. The tea was bought, as I explained, in halfpenny-worths, but the analyst who examined the tea and made the computations of the cost per lb. understood the officer who handed him the samples to say that they were penny packages, not halfpenny packages, and accordingly the cost came out double what it ought to have been. The calculations ought to have been checked before they were sent in to me; but they were hurriedly made on the morning when the samples were received, so as to be ready for me to have them at the House by 2 o'clock. I can only say that both the Customs House officers and myself are extremely sorry that such a mistake should have occurred.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): May I ask what will be the order of business for next week; and whether, as the Government propose to take the Budget Resolutions first, the Tithe Bill is likely to be reached?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Budget Resolutions will be taken next week, and the Tithe Bill will follow after the Budget has been disposed of.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Is it intended to proceed with the Budget Resolutions day by day?

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Are the Committee stage of the Budget Resolutions and the Committee stage of the Licensing Bill to be both taken before the Tithes Bill?

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is intended to proceed with the Budget Bill from Sitting to Sitting, and to take both the Second Reading and the Committee stage and also the same stages of the Local Taxation Bill before taking up the Tithe Bill.

THE ALLOTMENTS BILL— PROCEDURE.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I rise for the purpose of submitting to you, Sir, a question upon which I am sure the House will desire your guidance. Upon the Allotments Bill there are various Instructions to be moved, and upon the first Instruction the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has an Amendment in a form which is quite new to the practice of the House. The acceptance of that Amendment by the House clearly would amount to a declaration that upon this Bill there should be no Instruction. It is, in fact, a new form of Parliamentary Closure. If it were to be adopted, it would in effect establish a closure by a side wind without any discussion in this House. It is quite plain also that it would shut out, as it is intended to shut out, from debate all the subsequent Instructions which appear on the Paper. I say nothing in regard to this particular Bill, but it may well be in other instances that the first Instruction is not the most important when proposed to be moved, and, therefore, any hon. Member by moving a trivial Instruction might enable a Government commanding a majority to prevent practically any Bill they may introduce from being enlarged beyond the scope of the original Bill. Without imputing any bad motive, I quite understand the circumstances which have disposed the right hon. Gentleman to meditate this closure. There are a great number of Instructions on the Bill, and anybody who has been for a number of years in this Assembly will be aware that when you endeavour to shut out discussion in one form it is likely to arise in another, and no doubt the restriction on Debates in Committee has led to the great multiplicity of Instructions. In regard to these Instructions, I wish to point out that the last of them stands in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who proposes to incorporate with the Bill the clauses of the Allotments Act Amendment Bill. I wish to know from Mr. Speaker whether it is in accordance with the practice of this House, and the spirit of its discussions, that forms of amendment should be used which would absolutely preclude the bringing on of subsequent Instructions. I put the question subject to the express opinion that there ought to be only a moderate use made of the right of moving Instructions.

*MR. SPEAKER: The House is indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for having called attention to this matter. No doubt the Amendment standing in the name of the right hon.

Sir W. Harcourt

Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board is not out of order. It resembles the Motion familiar to the House that the House do pass to the Orders of the Day, by which the House disembarrasses itself of matter which it does not wish to pass judgment on, and proceeds to its appointed business. The Motion, I acknowledge, is prima facie to be regarded with some suspicion as a form of closure, but, on the other hand, I must call the attention of the House to the fact that there are a great number of Instructions on the Paper, more than one, I think, being in the name of the same hon. Member. This is the first Session, I think, that this practice has been extensively adopted, and there are two other Bills in regard to which notices of a still larger number of Instructions have been given. In my opinion, the House ought to take notice of this. The new rule that the Speaker should leave the chair without question being put would obviously be somewhat modified, if not robbed altogether of force, if a great number of Instructions are put down so as to prevent the Speaker from leaving the Chair—Instructions which, in the case before us, might occupy the House for several Sittings; and if one hon. Member is to be entitled to put down more than one Instruction in his name it gives him a greater right of speaking than he has on the Second Reading of the Bill itself. I only wish to put the matter as fairly as I can in both aspects, because there are inconveniences on both sides. I quite admit that the Motion standing in the name of the right hon. Gentleman would, if carried, exclude every Instruction on the Paper, some of them of importance, which the House might very properly wish to discuss. I imagine the right hon. Gentleman put down his Motion as a protest against the growing abuse of the rights of hon. Gentlemen. I am not for a moment imputing any blame to any individual hon. Member, but the collective result of all these Instructions is practically to defeat the meaning and spirit of the Standing Order. I would much rather this matter were arranged by compromise than that it should come before me to decide as a point of order. The Instruction standing in the name of the Member for the Rugby Division (Mr. Cobb) is in order; but other Instructions in the names of the Members for the Ashburton Division (Mr. Seale-Hayne), the Eye Division (Mr. F. Stevenson), the Lichfield Division (Sir J. Swinburne), and Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) are mandatory, and therefore out of order, or otherwise irregular.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Perhaps I may be allowed to explain that I did not put down the Instruction which stands in my name in the belief that it was in any way out of order; but I thought it was necessary, if possible, to include some of the provisions of another and a very important measure.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government had no option, as it appeared to them, but to meet what was obviously, from their point of view, an endeavour to smother the Bill. [Cries of "No!"] Well, I will say a new effort by which the further progress of the Bill would be impeded. But I should be exceedingly glad to meet the suggestion which has been thrown out by the Chair and to endeavour to arrive at some understanding which would facilitate the progress of the measure. If hon. Members would proceed with the first Instruction which is ruled to be in order we could arrive, in the course of an afternoon, at an understanding by which the Speaker would be able to leave the Chair and the House go into Committee. We should then be in a position to make progress with the Bill, and it would not be necessary for my right hon. Friend to move the Amendment of which he has given notice. Her Majesty's Government are bound to retain in their hands the power to press forward a measure which they deem to be necessary when it is met by proposals which are altogether unprecedented, and the effect of which undoubtedly would be practically to smother the measure.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If the attempt of the President of the Local Government Board to choke off opposition is successful will it not still be open to hon. Members to move Amendments in Committee?

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I would submit as a point of order that the Amendment which the President of the Local Government Board proposes to move is not a regular Amendment at all. The right hon. Gentleman proposes an Amendment, as I understand, by which the House declines to widen the scope of the Bill; and I would ask whether such an Amendment is regular?

*MR. SPEAKER: In past times it was an old-established practice to move that the House should pass to the other Orders of the Day.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): Reference has been made to the fact that there are two Motions on the Paper in my name. Perhaps I may be allowed to explain that after I had given notice of an Instruction in the regular way, the right hon. Gentleman gave notice of his Motion declining to extend the scope of the Bill; and the further Motion which appears in my name has reference to the right hon. Gentleman's proposal.

*MR. SPEAKER: As I understand the hon. Member's Amendment to the Amendment of the President of the Local Government Board, it is to make an exception in favour of his own Instruction; but I have already pointed out that the Instruction itself is out of order. It is impossible, therefore, to move an Amendment with a view of bringing in an Instruction which is out of order.

LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Do I understand that the Government propose on Monday next to take the Second Reading of the Local Taxation Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope it will be possible to do so immediately after the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

MR. BUCHANAN: Will it be put down immediately after the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think that the course the Government are about to adopt in the matter amounts to a breach of faith, inasmuch as the Bill does not apply to Ireland. In England and Scotland the Local Authorities will be allowed to suspend licences, and why should fresh licences be created in Ireland? My object is to prevent new licences being created in Ireland.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That is a fair question for Committee.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The money will accumulate, and cannot be used for any other purpose.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): May I ask whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not distinctly say that the Bill would apply to Ireland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot say what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Then I beg to give notice that I shall oppose the Second Reading of the Bill unless it is made to apply to Ireland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR, who had been temporarily absent, said: I understand that some question has been raised in my absence with regard to the extension of the provisions of the Licensing Bill to Ireland. Not having, as yet, County Councils in Ireland, it is not possible to apply the whole of the English machinery of the Licensing Bill to Ireland, but I have no objection to the principle of the suspension of licences being extended to Ireland. I will consider that point in conjunction with my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If I bring in a Bill for the purpose of suspending licences in Ireland, I presume that I should receive the support of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: When Mr. Bruce, in 1871, introduced a Bill for the suspension of licences the Bill covered the whole of the three Kingdoms. Why, then, should Ireland be excluded from the present Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already stated that, at present, Ireland has not got the local machinery.

MR. CHANCE: We are told that the money is to accumulate. Is it to accumulate at interest, and who is to get the benefit?

\*MR. GOSCHEN: It will be in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, who will allow an interest of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. upon it.

MENAI BRIDGE.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ALLOTMENTS ACT (1887) AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 147.)

Order for Committee read.

*(3.35.) MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): In moving the Instruction of which I have given notice, I shall endeavour as far as possible to avoid all controversial matters, and try to approach the subject with a sincere desire not to treat it as a mere political contest, to be turned to the advantage of this or that Party, but to deal with it in the interests of those classes for whom so many on both sides of the House are conscientiously striving, and with a wish to contribute towards a settlement of the allotments question. Now, I am very glad to gather from what has fallen from the First Lord of the Treasury that the President of the Local Government Board in all probability will not move the Amendment of which he has given notice; and I sincerely believe that, if he does not move it, he will contribute towards our getting through the business of the day, and I may assure him, not only on my own behalf, but on behalf of others, that if this Amendment is not moved no advantage will be taken of it.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Perhaps I may be allowed to say that after what you, Mr. Speaker, have said, I shall not move the Amendment.

*MR. COBB: I am glad to find that the Instruction which I put down on the Notice Paper, without any knowledge that any other Instruction was going to be put down—I never saw the other notices until they actually appeared on the Paper—I am very glad to see now that the terms of my notice are so wide in their scope that they include the objects sought to be attained by the other notices. My Instruction, it will be observed, treats of two distinct matters. First, I propose that the Committee shall be instructed to create popularly elected Local Authorities in smaller areas than the present areas of Sanitary Authorities, and of course I need not say that I point to Parish Councils. Then, secondly, I propose to confer on these authorities larger powers than the present Sanitary Authorities now have for acquiring and managing land for the purposes of allotments. I am very anxious in my remarks to put with perfect clearness the issue I wish to raise. I shall, of course, go to a Division on my Motion, that is if I do not persuade the Government to agree to it, which I hope I may succeed in doing; but if the House goes to a Division, the issue before hon. Members will be perfectly clear. Those who vote for my Instruction will vote in favour of Parish Councils having power to acquire land for allotments, and those who vote against me will be expressing an opinion that it is better that Parish Councils should not have that power. Now a few words on the first part of my Instruction, as to what Local Authority is to have the power of acquiring land for allotments. I think everyone will agree, whether they agree with other remarks I may make or not, that the success of an allotment system mainly depends upon the authority which is to put that system into force. It seems to me, with regard to the Bill which the Government have introduced, that we do not want so much to have an appeal from the authority which is admitted to be an inefficient authority, but we want to have an efficient authority to administer the Act in such a way that there shall be no occasion for any appeal from its decisions. Now to come to the question, which is the question after all, what is the best authority to exercise power in regard to allotments? I remember very well when the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board brought in the Allotments Bill in 1887—in July I think it was—he said—“We think that the area of the county is too large;” he was speaking of the area over which the authority which was to have control of allotments ought to rule; that was, of course, before County Councils were inaugurated. Now, I agree absolutely with the right hon. Gentleman in that remark. But what do the Government now propose? The right hon. Gentleman in the first Amendment which he put down to my Instruction said that the whole scope of the Bill now before the House was to provide an appeal from the Sanitary Authority. Now I think that is hardly so. It seems to me that the scope of the Bill, at all events in certain cases where the Sanitary Authorities fails to carry out their duty, goes beyond this. The Bill is an admission that in certain cases there are failures of duty on the part of Sanitary Authorities, but then it does not simply provide that there shall be an appeal to the County Council, in the sense in which we generally understand an appeal, namely, to correct the failure of the Sanitary Authority, and to compel that authority to do its duty; but it actually hands over in these cases all powers of every description, and all authority under the Allotments Act of 1887 to the County Council. In fact, in these cases, the Bill dissolves the smaller authority. [Cries of "No."] Yes, it is so. The Sanitary Authority is dissolved for the purposes of the Allotments Act, and its powers under that Act are given to the County Council. It comes to this: that the Authority is driven away, ousted from the smaller area, and transferred to the County Council, whose powers extend over the whole county, which is admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to be too large an area for the purposes of the Allotments Act. This, in fact, is not an appeal Bill, but a Bill for creating a new Allotments Authority altogether, and that in an area which the right hon. Gentleman recognises as too large for the purpose. Then the question arises, what is the proper authority for the purpose, and within what area should it exercise control? The Government have admitted that the Sanitary Authority—in rural districts the Board of Guardians—is not a satisfactory authority. The right hon. Gentleman the other night, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said he had never pretended that the Sanitary Authority was an entirely satisfactory authority; and I think there is no Member on this or the other side, who has any knowledge of local administration in the rural districts, who does not know that the right hon. Gentleman is quite right in saying this. Go into any village and ask any man, from the artisan and labouring classes whether the Board of Guardians does its duty in that village, and I am afraid that in 19 cases out of 20 the reply will be very unsatisfactory. Further, even if the people had confidence in the Board of Guardians, which I say they have not upon the whole; if Boards of Guardians were really anxious and willing, which I am afraid in too many cases they are not—in fact, the very introduction of this Bill shows that in some cases they are not—they are absolutely unfitted for the carrying out of the powers under the Allotments Act, because they are acting in too large an area. The reason is obvious. Guardians come from different parishes, and those coming from one parish may be absolutely ignorant, and often, in my own experience, are absolutely ignorant, of the wants and wishes of the people in another parish. A Guardian, as a rule, knows nothing of the local requirements of any parish in the Union except his own. Now, the scheme of the Allotments Act of 1887 in rural districts is that separate allotments shall be provided for each separate parish; and not only that, but that the rents of those allotments are to be paid in each parish by the men in the parish; and that if there is any excess of expenditure, if the rents are not sufficient to pay the cost of the allotments, then the extra cost is borne not by the whole county or Union, but by the parish in which those allotments are situated. Surely then, this being so, and the provision of allotments being regarded under the Act as an absolutely local parochial matter, why in the world is the parish not to be the area for allotments, and why are not Parish Councils to possess authority to acquire land for allotments and to manage them? Of course, when I refer to Parish Councils, I mean—and this goes without saying—Councils popularly elected on the one man one vote principle, and under the protection of the Ballot. What objection, I ask, have the Government to Parish Councils? In July, 1887, when the right hon. Gentleman introduced the Allotments Bill, I remember he gave us, so far as I was able to understand his speech, and so far as I can understand it from reading the speech again, two objections to the parish, and they were these: He said he thought, in regard to the acquisition of allotments, that the organisation of the parish was not efficient. That was his first objection. His second objection was that there was such a large number of very small parishes. Now, everyone who looks into the subject must admit the force of both of these objections. I admit it myself. The right hon. Gentleman emphasised the expression of his view in another interesting speech in August, 1887, upon another stage of the Bill. He said then, speaking of Parish Vestries (and Parish Councils would, I imagine, be elected by the Vestries), that under its present organisation the Parish Vestry was the most likely Body to be open to the influence of landowners, and he gave as his reason that in the Vestry there was plural voting and there was not the protection of the Ballot. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman so far. But we have never asked that Parish Councils should be elected under plural voting and without the Ballot. My Instruction, which I am now moving, refers to a popularly-elected Body, and, of course, one of the first things to do is to reform the Vestry and make it a really popular Body. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman, in the following month, in September 1887, promised us that at the earliest possible date a Bill would be introduced placing all Local Government on a more popular basis, and he was very particular in saying that he did not at all confine his remarks to County Councils, but to every Authority in rural districts, and, of course, that would include Parish Vestries. One word in reference to the smallness of parishes. We know what an immense number of very small parishes there are. I forget the number, but I know there are scores of parishes with not more than 25 inhabitants, and including not more than five or six ratepayers. Of course, I agree that it would be ludicrous in a parish of this sort to have a Parish Council; but these cases could be easily met by a provision for adding such minute parishes to the adjoining parishes, and providing some minimum population, say 200 or 300 inhabitants, which is a matter for discussion and arrangement. So far as I can see, the two objections raised by the right hon. Gentleman in 1887 can be easily met under my Instruction. I should like to know why the Government seem so afraid of Parish Councils. The Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot be afraid of them, because we all remember the Bill which he introduced, if I remember rightly, in 1869, when he was a Member of the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and in his speech upon that Bill no one could have praised the parish more than the Chancellor of the Exchequer did. Over and over again he said he considered the parish was the proper unit for Local Government, and he spoke of the chief men in the parish and other matters to which I need not now refer. Again, when the right hon. Gentleman was candidate for Edinburgh in 1885 he confirmed the view he had expressed in 1869, and in much stronger language. Of course, I know what the answer to me will be. The President of the Local Government Board will say that this is all very well, but that it involves a large reform, and will require a large Bill. Now, my experience in this House has not been long, and I do not presume to say that my opinion is valuable; but I can say, after giving much attention to this subject, that I believe that if at this stage my Instruction is accepted and the Committee sets to work to amend the Bill, giving to Parish Councils authority over allotments, giving them power to acquire land and to manage allotments, I say I believe that in the long run an immense deal of time will be saved, because obviously in the end we must come to what I am now proposing. Now, I may be allowed a few more words in order to show how important this matter is. It has progressed very fast in the last few years. It stands in a very different position now to that which it occupied in 1885, when agricultural labourers had the vote given to them by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. It has gone forward not only in the last five years, but a good deal within the last three years, aye in the last two years, and even within the last twelve months. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian is in favour of the proposals which I now make, and expressed his approval in plain language in his speech at Manchester last December. The leaders of the Liberal Party are in favour of it, as appears from the speeches of Lord Rosebery and of the right hon. Members for Derby and Newcastle (Sir W. Harcourt and Mr. Morley). The principle is also approved by a statesman who is not now in this House, but who knows I suppose everybody will admit, more perhaps about Local Government than any other man in the country—I mean Sir Charles

Dilke. In 1885, in his celebrated speech, which no doubt is in the memory of nearly everyone in the House, the speech delivered in Halifax in October of that year Sir Charles Dilke distinctly expressed and advocated the view that the parish should have the power to acquire land compulsorily for allotments and to carry out all the powers in the Bill then before the House, and which was introduced by the hon. Gentleman who sits beside me (Mr. Jesse Collings). Further, I may quote the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), because in a speech which, if I remember aright, he made the day after Sir Charles Dilke spoke at Halifax—a very forcible speech—one of the many speeches which he made in 1885, and which I admit to the full did an immense deal to press on the question of allotments—in the speech I refer to the right hon. Gentleman in so many words adopted Sir Charles Dilke's scheme in every detail, and used words which I will read to the House. I am quoting from the authorised edition, edited by Mr. Lucy, of the Unauthorised Programme [Mr. JESSE COLLINGS: Hear, hear!] My hon. Friend says "Hear, hear," and I agree with him. The effect of this speech upon me is just the same to-day as it was in 1885, and I have just as much respect for the sentiments it contains, and I may add that many of us liked those sentiments none the less because they formed part of an Unauthorised Programme. The words the right hon. Gentleman used were these:

"I will only say briefly of them (alluding to Sir Charles Dilke's proposals) in a sentence that they comprise the idea of a thoroughly popular Local Government in every village, in every Union, in every county, which shall be given the largest powers and widest discretion, by which the local affairs of the people shall be conducted without supervision or interference."

Now, we say that not only are allotments not free from supervision and interference, but that there is a great deal too much supervision and interference. From the Instructions and the Amendments which the hon. Member for Hornsey has given notice of, and which might almost have been copied from the Bill which I introduced in 1887, I am glad, also, to find that there is a strong opinion on the other side of the House that Parish

Councils or Committees must be the Local Authority to deal with allotments. I may mention another Authority, whom I daresay some hon. Members on the other side may not care to accept, but who, undoubtedly, is acquainted with the wants and wishes of agricultural labourers. I mean Mr. Joseph Arch, and his opinion shortly expressed in a letter to myself is that—

"Any Allotments Act to really benefit the labourers must place the acquisition of land in the hands of Parish Councils elected by the ratepayers."

It is notorious to every hon. Member who has had the opportunity of getting the opinion of artisans and labourers at public meetings that this is also their view. I gather from what was said on the Second Reading that the Government seem to point to District Councils as the Local Authority to deal with allotments, but let me say at once that the same objection applies to this as to Sanitary Authorities and Boards of Guardians as respects area. Why, as a rule, is the work of the Guardians not well done, and why are they unpopular? Mainly because in dealing with any particular parish, from want of local knowledge, most of them are ignorant of the subject before them. Upon this point the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian spoke at Manchester in December last. In speaking of allotments, he said—

"Perhaps not even the County Council can know the exact circumstances of every portion of the county. The members of District Councils might not be minutely acquainted with them. You must go to the doors of the men who are immediately concerned. You must get from them and from their immediate neighbours the fullest advantage of local knowledge."

But now a few words on the second part of my Instruction, as to granting larger powers. That necessarily includes not only giving the Local Authority additional powers, but also the simplification of, and removing restrictions from, the powers they now possess. I am not going to deal with this large question at any length, because I feel that I shall be touching on subjects that are raised by the Instructions of other Members. It will be found that other Gentlemen have taken action on this matter since the passing of the Allotments Act of 1887. For instance, after I introduced my Amendment Bill in 1888, a Bill was introduced by the hon. Member for South Essex, and it is backed by several hon. Members on the opposite side of the House. It meets a great many difficulties which we on this side raised in the Amendments which we proposed to the Allotments Bill of 1887. It would have been better if some of those Amendments had been carried—such as the one providing that no Act of Parliament should be required to confirm the Provisional Order, such as that extending the size of allotments, and such as that providing that there should be no payment of rent in advance. But there is one power—and I think probably it is the most important power—which is contained in two of the Instructions put down on this Bill, and that is the power proposed to be given to the Sanitary Authority or the Parish Council of leasing land compulsorily for the purposes of allotments. It is obvious that would be a much cheaper operation, if it could be adopted, than the purchasing of land. It would avoid considerable expense, and the less the expense the less the rent the allotment holder will be liable to pay. I want to know, and I have never yet been able to understand, so I shall be obliged personally if the President of the Local Government Board will explain why it is that he is so much afraid of this compulsory leasing power. There is nothing new in it. It is included in the Irish Labourers' Amendment Act, 1885, the authorities under which possess compulsory leasing powers. In 1887 we on this side proposed Amendments to give this power, and in 1888 I included it in my Allotments Amendment Bill. I cannot understand why the Government should not put in a clause giving the Local Authority power to acquire land compulsorily by lease. Of course, I cannot expect the right hon. Gentleman to adopt my advice; but I know he has great respect for County Councils, and it happens that in the county a part of which I have the honour to represent there is an active County Council. A member of that Council is a gentleman who has devoted more time than most of the members to the question of allotments. I refer to Mr. Darlington. He is a Conservative, and I had the honour of being opposed by him at the election of 1885, but he paid me the high compliment of adopting the principle which I am advocating, and which I had previously included in my Bill of 1888, in a resolution which he proposed and carried at the Warwickshire County Council in favour of compulsory leasing. I beg to press upon the right hon. Gentleman to meet us on this point, if he cannot on any other. I put it to the Government that this Bill will not settle the Allotments Question, but if my Instruction be adopted, it will go a long way towards securing that settlement. I believe the Allotments Question will never be settled until the powers are put into the hands of a Parish Council. I think it will not be finally settled until we do away with the individual relations between landlord and tenant as to allotments, and until, in every case, the allotment holder is the tenant of an authority in the election of which he himself has a voice. I appeal—whether hopelessly or not remains to be seen—to the Government to accept this Instruction. If they will do so, I can say for myself, and I believe I may say it for my hon. Friends on this side of the House, that we will do everything in our power to forward the measure, which will be accepted, if so enlarged, with gratitude all over the country. If the Government will not accept the Instruction, we have a perfectly plain issue before us, and we shall divide upon it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert Clauses in the Bill, creating by popular election Local Authorities in smaller areas than those of the Sanitary Authorities, and to confer upon them larger powers for acquiring and managing land for the purposes of allotments than those now vested in Sanitary Authorities under ‘The Allotments Act, 1887.’”—(Mr. Cobb.)

(4.7.) Mr. F. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I rise for the purpose of seconding the Instruction moved by the hon. Member for the Rugby Division. I should like, in the first place, to accentuate still further the point that it will be necessary to enlarge the powers of acquisition, and among them the compulsory powers of leasing. There is nothing new in the suggestion; it was embodied in an Irish measure in 1885 and in the Scotch Crofters' Act of 1886. Anyone who is acquainted with the rural districts knows it is much easier, simpler, and more expeditious to acquire land by compulsory hiring than by purchase, which involves to a greater extent the intervention of lawyers. The most effective manner of amending the Allotments Act would be to enlarge its powers. Now, what is to be the nature of the authority to which the Government propose there shall be an appeal from the Sanitary Authority? It is the County Council. That, no doubt, is a step in advance, inasmuch as it is an appeal from an authority not elected upon a popular basis to an authority which is. But the improvement is not so great as at first sight appears, because the County Council cannot have all the knowledge which is required for dealing with local questions effectively. In Suffolk there are two County Councils, one for East and one for West Suffolk. They have made inquiries each in a different way. The West Suffolk Council made inquiries through the instrumentality of the members of the Council, each member conducting the inquiry in the Division he represented. In some cases the investigation was thorough, because the member was energetic; in other cases there was practically no result at all. In the case of East Suffolk the inquiry was made by means of letters addressed to public officers in each parish, and here, again, the result was not satisfactory, owing to the great uncertainty as to the nature of the inquiry. In some cases the officers got the information asked for, in other cases they were either unable or unwilling to get it. But in the case of neither Division was the result satisfactory; because, though they may have got some knowledge of the number of allotments which are held, there was no possibility of obtaining adequate information as to the demand for them. The moral is that County Councils as now constituted are too large to make inquiries in the way in which inquiries should be conducted. The solution which commends itself to many minds is that every parish should be entrusted with powers for dealing with its own affairs, and there is no point on which keener interest is felt than that of dealing with allotments. Of course, as has been pointed out, it will be necessary to differentiate between the parishes, as some may be too small. In some they might be left to manage their own affairs by means of Vestry meetings held at an hour when the labourers can attend, and at which the voting shall be by ballot, and polls taken when necessary on the "one man one vote" principle. And then, when we come to the larger parishes, I think there could be no better authority than Parochial Councils elected by ballot. There is a growing conviction on the part of those interested in this matter that it will be absolutely impossible to settle the allotments difficulty until you have conferred upon those most concerned the management of public affairs. I trust the Government will make the acquisition of allotments more easy and will not confine this Bill to the creation of a power of appeal. I think it is incumbent on the Government to do something in order to meet this difficulty of the non-government of parishes at the present time.

(4.17.) MR. E. H. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): This is not the first time this question has come before the House, and I have endeavoured to discover on what new grounds the formation of these Parish Councils is recommended. In certain parishes no doubt a Parish Authority might be constituted, and could deal with the Allotments Question, but there are very few of those parishes. If I could see a way to the practical solution of this difficulty, I should be in favour of the formation of Parish Councils. But I have failed to find out what the work is that the Parish Councils are to perform. Hon. Members have spoken as if the formation of these Councils would be easy and certain of success. But some parishes are too small.

*MR. COBB: I suggested that very small parishes should be added to larger adjoining ones.

MR. LLEWELLYN: And the last parishes which should be grouped together are those which adjoin, as in many cases there are feuds between the inhabitants which have been carried on for generations, and I have in my mind's eye several parishes where it would be a positive folly to try and group them. What machinery has a parish at present, or what is it likely to have, for carrying out the Act? It would be necessary to create the machinery and to appoint public officers, and the expense of that would fall on the parish alone. At present the preliminary stages of the Act are carried out by the Local Sanitary Authority, which cannot take a step without the authority of the parish, because the expense has to be borne by the last-named Body. An Authority would not ignore an application for allotments without giving reasons for so doing; they hold an inquiry on the spot, and no step is taken without the authority and co-operation of the parish. It is only natural that it should be so.

*CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I can give an instance where it has not been so.

MR. LLEWELLYN: I know of no case in which the Sanitary Authority has taken the responsibility without first consulting the area immediately interested. As usual, several hon. Gentlemen have abused the Guardians; but I consider it is unfair and ungenerous on the part of hon. Members with no experience of Boards of Guardians themselves to bring such charges against men who do both good and hard work. An hon. Member has said that he is looking forward to the time when all allotments will be held under a Public Authority. But will he bear in mind the difference in the position of tenants under a Public Board and those under private individuals? A man may have a bad year, his crops may fail and his animals die; consequently he cannot pay his rent. If he holds under a Public Board, that rent must be paid punctually on the day it is due; no leniency can be shown. But if he holds his allotment under a private landowner, he may have time given him to recover himself and many ways may offer to enable him to discharge his debt. I think that this Bill is an improvement, and will be considered to be so by the country, and I hope the House will see the necessity of passing it. The Bill will go a long way towards meeting the requirements which are felt, and improving the present Act, which in a great many cases is thought to be a vast boon, and is greatly appreciated.

*(4.26.) MR. R. T. GURDON (Norfolk, Mid): May I point out that there are two kinds of parishes in the country—close parishes, which are in the hands of one or two large landowners, and in which there is no difficulty about allotments; and what are called open parishes, in which there are a large number of small owners and occupiers? Here there is considerable difficulty in getting allotments, although there is plenty of land on the outskirts of the parish which is of no use at all. I think it will be generally agreed that allotments are of no use to a labourer unless situated within easy reach of his own home. But in these open parishes the land in the centre is probably let in small holdings of 15, 20, or 25 acres to men not very far removed from the position of labourers, and who would think it very hard to have the holdings reduced 10 or 11 acres in order to supply allotments. It is very little consolation to Naboth when you take away his vineyard to say that you do so for a good purpose. We are accustomed to have Boards of Guardians abused in Debates in this House; but I believe they have, as a rule, done their duty well in connection with allotments. I know several gentlemen who have spent days and even weeks driving about the country persuading, cajoling, and even threatening farmers and landowners to give up land which was desired for allotment purposes. Of course, there is considerable difficulty in carrying out the Act, because there is a certain amount of unpopularity attaching to the enforcement of it. The burden should, therefore, be placed on the shoulders of a pretty strong Body. I am anxious not to overburden County Councils, but I do not think there is danger of that in the Government proposal. I think the Council will have no difficulty in doing the work, and as to their not having sufficient local knowledge, of course they will appoint a sub-Committee to make all necessary local inquiry, and upon the information gathered the Council will be able to bring the whole affair to a satisfactory conclusion. I cannot support the Instruction, because I regard it as a movement in a retrograde rather than a forward direction.

*(4.30.) MR. RITCHIE: I have no wish to shorten discussion unduly, but I hope the House will not consider it necessary that the discussion of this Instruction should be of a lengthened character. I further hope the House will support the Government in the position they propose to take up, which is that this is a Bill of a very simple character, with one object of a practical kind. That object is the setting up of a Court of Appeal over the existing Sanitary Authority, and I have every hope that whatever may be the proposals made, and whatever arguments may be used, the House will not be drawn away from that object to any other suggested amendments of the original Act. If every time a small amendment of an Act is proposed the House allows its attention to be directed to other proposed amendments of the original measure, a blow will be struck against small amending Bills when experience shows an amendment to be extremely desirable, useful, and necessary. Unquestionably, the hon. Member for the Rugby Division has raised a very large number of extremely important questions in connection with the Instruction he has moved. He desires, in the first place, to substitute for the existing authority, Parish Councils; and he acknowledges himself that if Parish Councils be adopted it is essential that the variations in the size of parishes should be taken into account, and that there must be division of the larger parishes, and amalgamation of the smaller ones. Now, anyone who knows what the existing feeling in parishes is, will thoroughly understand the enormous difficulty in connection with this subject. I am not at all prepared to deny that when we come to deal with District Councils and the whole question of local administration, it may be possible and, in fact, desirable to deal with this difficult question of parishes; but to raise the question now and deal with it on this Motion is a very unsatisfactory way of dealing with part of a large subject. If Parish Councils are to be set up no one will be content that they should only have the duty of dealing with allotments, and, therefore, the House would have to consider many other powers, which the hon. Member and his friends may desire to confer upon these Councils. I am not here to argue against Parish Councils generally; it is not necessary to do so, and it would not be right or proper, on this narrow issue, to argue the whole question. I hope the House will see that it would be entering an arena of a large and extensive character, and it would occupy very considerable time to discuss at length the proposals embraced in the Instruction of the hon. Member, and the other Instructions of which notice has been given. Take, for instance, one proposal—that power should be given to increase the size of allotments. That raises the whole question of small holdings, and whether or not they should be placed on the same footing as allotments. Then, again, among other things, it is further proposed that these Parish Councils should have the power of acquiring land compulsorily, which will involve rating powers. [Cries of "No, no!"] Surely if power is given to compulsorily acquire land for the purpose of allotments that entails rating powers, or I do not know what does. The hon. Member not only proposes that this authority should have power to acquire land compulsorily, but that they should exercise this power without coming to Parliament at all. Now, this opens one of the largest questions it is possible to conceive in connection with local administration, whether or not the existing law, with reference to the acquisition of land compulsorily, and which provides for Parliamentary sanction for every such application, for any object, public or private, for which land can be acquired, shall be set aside in the case of allotments under powers expressly given to Parish Councils. Now, this proposition involves the possibility of a tremendous change in the law, and yet this is what the hon. Gentleman the Member for Rugby asks us to consider on a Bill which proposes merely to set up the means of an appeal to a popularly elected body against the authority which, in the opinion of some, does not on all occasions perform its duty as it should. No one objects to the proposal of the Government so far as it goes.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, I do.

*MR. RITCHIE: Well, then, one hon. Member objects ["And others"], but, as far as I understand, the principle that there should be an appeal to a popularly elected body is not generally objected to, even by hon. Members on the other side. If the proposal of the hon. Member for Rugby were accepted I say at once, without hesitation, that it would compel the Government to abandon the Bill, because the Instruction would open up so many subjects, for the consideration of which it would be impossible to find time this Session. That is my objection to the proposal of the hon. Member. I hope

I shall not be considered as being guilty of any want of courtesy if I do not enter into the merits of the proposal. My objection simply is that the Instruction would enlarge so greatly the scope of the Bill that the acceptance of it would be a death blow to the Bill. As I am the father of the Bill, I object to my offspring being destroyed in such a manner. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for North Somerset (Mr. Llewellyn) in his remarks upon Boards of Guardians, and I take strong exception to the observations of the hon. Member for Rugby, which he seemed to imply were generally applicable to Boards of Guardians, that they perform their duties badly. I do not deny that there have been some who have not performed their duty in a satisfactory manner, as there are also Municipal Councils who do not always do their duty; but I cannot condemn all Boards of Guardians any more than I would condemn Municipal Councils for the faults of one or two. But the hon. Member for Rugby knows perfectly well we did not create Boards of Guardians in order to constitute them the Local Authorities for this purpose, and in making them the Local Authorities under the Act, we acknowledged that they were not as suitable as could be desired, but they were the most suitable that could be obtained at the time; and we undertook, and I undertake again, that when we come to the constitution of District Councils one of the duties that will have to be thrown upon them will be the administration of the Allotments Act. It must not be supposed that because I am not prepared to assent to this Motion and do not now go into the whole argument—pro and con—it must not be supposed that the question of parishes is entirely lost sight of in the mind of the Government. It must not be assumed that because I decline to accept the Instruction now, that when the time comes to deal with the question of Local Government in smaller areas within the county, and to set up authorities for dealing with allotments, among other purposes, it must not be imagined that this question of parochial administration is one we decline altogether to consider. For the reason I have given that this is simply an Appeal

Bill, I ask the House not to go one jot or tittle beyond its purpose, for if they do it will lead us too far afield, and we shall embark on a course which will lead to the destruction of the Bill.

*(4.40.) MR. STANSFELD (Hali-fax): The right hon. Gentleman has met your suggestion, Sir, in such a handsome way, declaring that he will not move his Amendment, that, so far as we are concerned, we can assure him that he need be under no apprehension that this discussion will be carried beyond the present Sitting, and I think he will hardly grudge us a discussion to that extent upon a subject in which we take a genuine interest, and an interest which should be above the suspicion of obstruction to the passing of the measure. We did not obstruct the measure before, and have no disposition to do so now. The number of notices on the Paper are not evidence of any such desire, but rather an indication of the deep interest Members feel and desire to express, and this I maintain, the sceptical smile of the leader of the House notwithstanding. Before attending to the remarks of the President of the Local Government Board, I wish to refer to a statement by the hon. Member for Rugby, against which, I understand, the right hon. Gentleman protested, though he did not deal with it in his speech. The hon. Member for Rugby said the acceptance of the appeal would oust the control of the Sanitary Authority in the district, and I understood the right hon. Gentleman to object to the accuracy of the statement. I believe the objection is founded on the 3rd clause, but if, as I understand, the right hon. Gentleman proposes to omit this clause in Committee, then the objection will no longer apply, unless it should apply to any Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman. I must not go into Committee Amendments now, but I may point out that the clause would certainly oust the Sanitary Authority so far as allotments are concerned. The right hon. Gentleman has said quite truly that it is not a fitting or a just thing that we should, if we ever do, attack generally or in general terms the conduct and the administration of the Poor Law and of the Sanitary Laws by Boards of Guardians in this country. I agree with him, and having been President of the Local Government Board, I know something of the operations of Boards of Guardians, and have reason to understand and respect them. But the right hon. Gentleman has confessed that they are not the best authority to entrust with the administration of the Allotments Act, and this for simple reasons easily stated. In the first place, the area of their authority is too large and their functions too many. I do not think I am saying anything disrespectful to Boards of Guardians when I express my belief that they fulfil their duties as Poor Law administrators with far greater success, and with the sacrifice of more time and labour, than is the case with their administration of those Sanitary Laws, duties which I, myself, was instrumental in fixing upon them. It is natural that they should primarily have regard to the first functions entrusted to them, other duties taking a secondary place, and I think that some time we must relieve the Guardians of their sanitary functions and the powers in reference to allotments, transferring the control to authorities within smaller areas. There is another objection to which I refer, and it is not the fault of the Guardians that the method by which they are chosen is not a popular method; they are elected on the plural vote and without the protection of the Ballot. County Councils are elected on household suffrage and with the Ballot. The two systems cannot exist together, and if they come into contact you cannot prevent Boards of Guardians losing their status until they are elected on the same basis as County Councils. There is a third reason, and with that I approach the question of parishes, upon which I observe there is a natural division of opinion. I have never endeavoured to be absolute in the expression of my opinion, but this I do believe; that it is essential for the perfection, for the development of Local Government—for the training of the people for Local Government—that it should be, as far as possible, brought home to the doors of the humblest, and, therefore, I agree in thinking that Parochial Councils or Vestries, with power to appoint Committees, are essential in the future. I do not say you must take the parish as a unit; undoubtedly, you will have, in some cases, to group parishes, and this may be attempted by the right hon. Gentleman or a successor. Whatever the unit of Local Government may be, upon that unit must be imposed the duties fitted for that particular area in which they exist. That area may be called the parish of the future. Though the hon. Member for Rugby has spoken largely, and with enthusiastic conviction, of the creation of Parochial Councils, his Motion is not exactly worded in this way, and affords a margin for variations of opinion as to the best method of carrying out his proposal—

“That the Committee should have power to insert clauses creating by popular election Local Authorities in smaller areas than those of the Sanitary Authorities, and to confer upon them larger powers for acquiring and managing land for allotments.”

That this is a perfectly sound view it is difficult to gainsay. Under the existing Act, even when amended by this Bill, the machinery is cumbrous, costly, tedious, and uncertain. I do not think you will do any good whatever, even with smaller areas, until you simplify the machinery. You cannot prevent this being a parish question to whatever authority you give the power to deal with it. I share the opinion of the hon. Member that it is impossible to take any further step towards enlarging local powers until you have created these smaller units. The hon. Member has spoken of larger powers, but I will not go into that subject. I think there ought to be larger powers in whatever authority deals with allotments and most important, in my view, is the power of compulsory purchase at fair market value. Anyone who looks back at the history in recent years of all attempts to improve the sanitary condition of our towns, by pulling down unsanitary houses and erecting sanitary dwellings, must know the immense difficulty always has been the cost arising from the fact that the owner of the unsanitary property, who has no right to any profit at all upon dwellings in such a condition, is allowed to have an extra profit on that account. He gets more for the property than if it was in a sanitary condition, besides exacting an extra 10 per cent. because of the compulsory sale. The moment it is admitted that it is for the public benefit that the land should be taken, then I maintain the owner should be required to sell it at the fair market value. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who has had great experience in public improvements in the city which he represents, said in June, 1886, that the ratepayers of Birmingham had been mulcted in 15 to 50 per cent. more than the real value on property purchased for public improvements, and that, in his opinion, a fair value only should be paid for land bought for public purposes. I entirely adopt that principle. I hope the President of the Local Government Board will understand that this Instruction is not moved from any want of respect for him, or want of belief in his intentions, for I believe in his intentions, but those who support the proposal desire to take this opportunity of putting on record their view in the terms of the Instruction which I feel it my duty to support.

(4.55.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): Things are so absolutely bad in regard to allotments in the Division I represent, that I feel strongly tempted to support this Resolution. Under the Rural Sanitary Authority in South-East Essex, with rent at £1 an acre, under cultivation, whenever we can get a tenant, which is an exceptional thing with us, when land is going out of cultivation wholesale, and with three derelict farms within 400 yards of my own house—under these circumstances we find it impossible to get land for allotments under 40s. an acre, and we have great difficulty in getting it at that. Under the circumstances, one is almost tempted to clutch even at the straw held out by the hon. Member for Rugby. I cannot, however, help thinking, after what the President of the Local Government Board has said, that it would be better to let the Government deal with the question when they see a chance, always under the supposition that the Parish Council is the ultimate solution of the allotments question. I regret that the Resolution of the right hon. Member for Bradford cannot be taken, because it embodies the provisions of a Bill I have introduced on the subject.

(4.57.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): The Instruction of the hon. Member for Rugby is in two parts, the first having reference to the setting up of a new authority, and the second the enlargement of the power of the authority to acquire land. It appears to me that this second part practically carries out the Instruction of which I gave notice. I am glad to hear the hon. and gallant Member who has just sat down say he would have been prepared to support my Instruction. I may say that I referred to the measure of the hon. and gallant Member merely by way of explanation, and that it was through misunderstanding the clerk's reply that I inserted the specific reference to the Bill. It seems to me very unfortunate that, having before us this Bill dealing with allotments, we should not have power to deal with questions relating to that subject upon which every Member in the House seems to be agreed. At all events, I trust the right hon. Gentleman will agree to the second part of the Instruction. When the present Act was passing through the House, two years ago, we predicted that it would not have the effect expected by the right hon. Gentleman, and although it has had some indirect effect in inducing landlords to give allotments, which we always expected, it has had little or no effect in inducing Local Authorities to buy land compulsorily. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, even now, to accept the half of the Instruction of the hon. Member for Rugby Division, and, to allow the House to go into these important matters.

(5.4.) MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): The hon. Member for Rugby has put before the President of the Local Government Board a task before which he may well quail, in the construction of Parish Councils for the special purposes of this Bill. The machinery which I propose to employ is very different from that proposed by the hon. Member for Rugby. Instead of Parish Councils I propose that we should make use of the long established and most successful Local Authority which we possess—namely, the ancient Vestries of our parishes. Speaking of the Act of 1887, the hon. Member for North Somerset said—

“The Rural Sanitary Authority dare not carry out the Act. It must wait until it is instructed by the parish, so it is quite clear the ordinary operation of affairs by natural selection has marked out the parishes as the proper bodies to be entrusted with this duty.”

The cry about the difficulty of small parishes is a mere bugbear. Out of 15,000 parishes in this country there are only 773 which have a population of under 50 persons. The hon. Member for Rugby proposes to entrust compulsory powers to the Parish Council. It is quite impossible for parishes, as parishes, to give effect to compulsory powers. It may be regarded as a singular opinion, but I think that the transaction of local affairs by heaping them pell-mell upon a few men and withdrawing them from the great body of ratepayers is not a wise or a salutary mode of conducting local affairs. We are asked at the periodical time to vote for certain persons. Into their charge everything is entrusted, and it matters not how much opposed the ratepayers are to the way in which their affairs are administered, they are for a long term completely helpless. In many parishes there are now Ratepayers' Associations. What can be more absurd than that the ratepayers should elect a Local Board, and immediately afterwards proceed to elect another Board, called the Ratepayers' Association, to watch, defeat, and obstruct the Local Board? I prefer the ancient mode of Local Government in England by which all the ratepayers are brought into and kept in local knowledge, and their interest sustained in business in which they all share. If the business is merely done by a few persons it may be too late when an election comes round to undo what has been done against the wishes of the electors. As to this Bill, I fear that, as it stands, instead of curing, it will intensify the suspicion with which our legislation is already regarded. There is no disputing the failure of the Act of 1887, and what we ought to do is to try and detect the causes of failure which are contained in that Act, so as to avoid them in the legislation which we are now considering. I do not think that these causes have been recognised with sufficient precision, and the very nature of the Bill now before the House shows it. I take it that the causes of failure of the Act of 1887 are the large area of the authority and the remoteness of the meeting place. Only a few persons can serve as Guardians; indeed, people have to be coaxed to become Guardians. You may say it is very desirable that an allotment holder should be on the Allotment Committee or Authority. Of course it is, but it is absurd to suppose that an allotment holder can drive five or six miles and be at the place of meeting by 11 o'clock in the morning. A third cause is the want of intimate local knowledge and the apathy consequent upon it. It is hard to accuse the Sanitary Authorities in this respect; it is their misfortune, and not their fault. I have had a very varied experience in almost every form of local administration. I have been a Guardian for many years, and I confess I know hardly anything of the parishes excepting the one I represent. To some of them I have never been. It seems to me that this Bill is taking a still deeper plunge into the very same cause of failure. The area will be far larger, the meeting place will be still more remote, and the local knowledge will be much less. I believe that the Standing Committee proposed will be useless in operation, and I contend that it would be far better for the attainment of the object in view to build up from below, where knowledge and interest in the matter lie, than to break down from above by cutting up the County Council and making a Standing Committee. The working of this Bill will mean officialism, thorough and almost unchecked. First you have your local inquiry, your inspector and your lawyer, and, of course, enormous expense. The labouring man will see all this, and he will turn away from the Bill. On every ground it is desirable to allow the ratepayers of the parish to take the matter into their own hands, and, if possible, to acquire land for allotments by voluntary agreement among themselves. They are on the spot, and know all the circumstances, and there can be no stronger inducement to economy and prudence than for people to know that the money they are spending is their own and for their own purposes. By adopting this course, too, we shall promote the development of parochial action, whereas the Bill will have a contrary effect, and will lead to friction, unnecessary expense, and dissatisfaction. Allotments are intended to benefit the condition of the labouring poor, but I maintain that this object cannot be fully attained unless the people are enabled to share in the work themselves. I hope that on this side, at any rate, we may share in this work, because I do not think anyone can doubt that there is no more Conservative thing we can do than quicken the parochial life of the country.

* (5.20.) MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I promise not to detain the House long; I rise for the purpose of addressing myself mainly to two points. In the first place, however, I wish to say that I think the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board took rather a narrow view of the scope of this Bill. He said it was simply a measure to provide an appeal to the County Councils, but I have read it, and I find that, in addition to that, it will give the County Councils power to administer the Allotments Act—to become, in fact, an Allotments Authority—enabling them, amongst other things, to acquire land by compulsory purchase. The two points I desire to refer to are these: the principles of compulsorily leasing land for the purposes of allotments, and the principle of cheapening the present method of acquiring land by compulsory purchase; they come within the scope of the Bill, and I sincerely hope that when the measure is in Committee the President of the Local Government Board will introduce provisions dealing with these two points. It has been admitted that the Act does not work well. In answer to a question some days ago the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board stated that 1,800 allotments had been provided under it, and as there were, according to the last census, about 550,000 agricultural labourers in the country, that will give only one allotment to about every 300 labourers, a proof that the Act has not been very effective. I will give the right hon. Gentleman a piece of my own personal experience in this matter. A short time ago some 25 labourers came to me and asked for allotments. I said I should be glad to give them allotments, but was anxious to test the operation of the right hon. Gentleman's Act, and I suggested that they should apply to the Sanitary Authority in order that a properly constituted Allotments Authority should be set up. These labourers went away, and in a month's time they came back to me and said they had been to the Sanitary Authority, but found that so much expense and difficulty would be involved that they would prefer taking the allotments from me, and if this difficulty occurs in the case of a willing landlord, those which must be faced in the case of an unwilling landlord must be almost insuperable. The figures quoted by the right hon. Gentleman show that I am correct in this. One of the reasons why the Act does not work is the cost of acquiring the power to obtain land by compulsory purchase through a Provisional Order, and I will give three instances in illustration, taken from the Return which was granted on my motion in 1888, and issued last year, selecting those cases only in which there are only one owner and one occupier. In the first case it cost the City of Bath £80 to acquire the power to obtain possession of only three poles of land for street improvements; in the second case it cost the Bridlington Local Authority £388 in respect to 21 acres required for a public walk; and in the third case the Rural Sanitary Authority of Newport paid £220 for the power to obtain three acres and one rood of land required for the construction of a reservoir. In these cases the cost merely of obtaining the necessary power exceeded, many times, I presume, the value of the land itself. Now, I sincerely trust that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board will see his way when the Bill is in Committee to introduce a cheaper mode of acquiring land for allotments; otherwise I am confident that failure will attend this Bill also. As to compulsory powers, the Amendment that stands on the Paper in my name is a very simple one, and is intended to give Local Authorities power to hire land compulsorily on equitable terms as to rent and length of lease. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman does not see his way to introduce clauses in the Bill to carry out this object. I drew attention to this when last we had the subject of allotments before us, and I was largely supported in my view—amongst other Members by the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings). My proposal is one which must commend itself both to the Local Authority, which has to obtain the land, and to the landowner. The Local Authority would be relieved of the necessity of raising money by loan for the purchase of allotments, and the landowner would be benefited, as it would save him from the necessity of parting with, say, the fee simple of a field in the middle of his estate which he might desire to retain possession of, but might not object to let on lease. I beg to disclaim the slightest intention of in any way obstructing the Bill. My Amendment is a simple one, supported on both sides of the House, and I do trust the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to accept it when the Bill is in Committee.

*(5.34.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I can assure the hon. Gentleman opposite who has complained of the failure of Boards of Guardians to put this Bill into operation that in my part of the world the Boards of Guardians try to do their duty to the best of their ability, not only so far as the Poor Law is concerned, but so far as the powers of this Act are concerned. As to the statement of the hon. Member who last spoke about labourers going to him, and not being able to get allotments from the Rural Sanitary Authority, if he is not a Guardian—and I presume he is not, from the tone of his remarks—I would advise him to get himself elected, when he would be in a position to enforce the case of his friends on the attention of the Local Authority. I can give my experience of two Boards of Guardians in connection with the Allotments Act. There have been several applications for allotments before us, and in each case there has not been the slightest trouble experienced by the labourers in obtaining what they wanted at a very fair rate. I only mention this because so many hon. Members on the opposite side of the House hold that the Allotments Act has been inoperative. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey, speaking from his experience as a Guardian, says that he knows no more about "neighbouring parishes" than he does about a foreign country. Well, all I can say is that that is not my experience. I am familiar, not only with neighbouring parishes, but with every road and every cottage and almost every field within a radius of 20 miles of my own house. No doubt it would be a very nice thing if we could have these proposed Parish Councils; but, according to my experience, it is always a most difficult thing to collect people to attend even vestry meetings. When we have vestry meetings, either for the purpose of electing Churchwardens or Guardians, we always experience the greatest difficulty in getting half a dozen people to attend them; and if, in addition to the vestries, we are to have another parish authority, you will be overburdening the people with elections. I do not think the people want elections of this sort. They already have elections for Members of Parliament and for County Councils, and now you wish to add to their burdens by giving them elections for Parish Councils. This is not called for, at any rate in my part of the country. I do not know what may be the state of things in other parts of the country, but in Hampshire the Boards of Guardians do all that is necessary; and I believe that even without an appeal to the County Council allotments will be given whenever they are required.

(5.37.) MR. A. ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): Under any circumstances, I do not think the Board of Guardians can be a satisfactory tribunal to the man desiring allotments, as the landowner may have six votes at their election whilst the labourer has but one. The tone of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board is extremely encouraging compared with what it was two years ago, because it shows that the question of the parish is going to be one of the most important points in his next Local Government Bill. I would venture to ask him whether this question of Parish Councils is to be an integral part of his District Councils Bill—which he has told us is already prepared—and will be introduced when we make way for it? The part that the parish will have to play in the future will be a very important one; and the sooner the right hon. Gentleman grapples with that part of the subject of Local Government the better it will be. The only way in which an interest in Local Government can be developed in the mind of the agricultural labourer is to bring the Local Authority near his own home, and thus to educate him for exercising the new responsibility which has been thrown upon him.

(5.41.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): We have had a very interesting discussion on the main points of Local Government, but there has been very little said about this Bill. I agree with the hon. Member for Hornsey (Mr. H. C. Stephens) in his desire to revive the parish life.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that it is not the Bill, but the Instruction which is now before the House.

(5.42.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Let us see how the matter stands with reference to the agricultural labourer and his present position. The Act of 1887 has been said to have been inoperative. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not know whether that "hear, hear" means that it has had no operation, or that it has had an insufficient operation. Over 8,000 men have received allotments by the direct and indirect operation of the Act of 1887. Hon. Members seem to think an indirect operation is of no use. Let me call attention to a case in a Midland parish where we brought before the landlord the existence of this Act, the provisions of which he was not aware of. The landlord said, "If it is the law of the land that allotments are to be provided I will provide them," and the result of our application to him was that we got as much land as was wanted at 10s. an acre, and the men are very well satisfied. This is what I call an indirect operation of the Act. I quite agree with those Members who say that the Boards of Guardians have not been altogether a satisfactory body to administer this Act. Some of them, however, have acted in a most satisfactory way. At Kingsclere the Local Authorities have been most assiduous in supplying all the wants of the men. In one case they positively went out of their way to secure a solitary allotment for a man who lived by himself a long way off the other labourers in the parish. I could give hundreds of similar cases. At the same time, there are some Boards of Guardians who have refused to do anything. We have always been told that the great defect of the Act of 1887 is that the Local Authorities can refuse to act if they choose, and that there is no Court of Appeal. Well, this Bill will provide a Court of Appeal in a cheap and easy way. Shortly after the Bill was introduced the Labourers' Chronicle stated that it entirely did away with the defects of the Act of 1887 in this respect—although I admit it has since changed its tone. Now, Sir, why cannot we provide this remedy? I have a long list of cases in which men would be supplied with allotments immediately if a Court of Appeal were provided. I should be very glad to see a measure passed in the direction indicated in the proposed Instruction; but it seems a monstrous claim that the Government should take it bodily and put it into their Bill. The hon. Member for Rugby (Mr. Cobb) says the issue of the vote we are about to take is for or against Parish Councils.

*MR. COBB: What I said was for or against Parish Councils being the authority for dealing with allotments.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: To my mind the real issue upon which we are going to vote is, whether we are or are not to defeat the Allotments Bill. It is evident, from what the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has said, that if these Instructions are carried there is an end to the Bill. I cannot help sympathising with the Government in this matter. They have given us an Allotments Act, which they are now about to amend, and I have not heard any hon. Member speak against the Bill as far as it goes. The hon. Member for Rugby, as I understand, does not suggest that if his Instruction were adopted, it would not be necessary to re-arrange parishes in some way. The parish of Sutton, in his own county, contains 13,000 acres, whilst there are other parishes with about 500 acres. I know a parish in my county with as many as 60,000 acres, and, quite near it, a parish with 700 acres. The enormous amount of detail, and the enormous labour that would be involved in carrying out a measure of that character, afford good reason for the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, that it would be an absolute impossibility to get the Bill through this Session. Are the labourers to wait for another 12 months before they have the remedy which is now offered to them, and which the adoption of the Instruction would take out of their hands? I did not understand whether the hon. Member wished to give these Councils rating powers, in order that they might have funds for the purchase of the land, or whether they are simply to manage the allotments. If he means to give them rating powers the intricacy would be much increased; whilst if they are only to manage the allotments the system will not be much better than that which will be constituted under this Bill. I say, then, do not bring forward these proposals at the present time when their effect will be to delay a measure which hon. Members cannot deny supplies a great want, and will be for the great benefit of the labourers. If these Instructions are carried, as I have already said, you kill the Bill. Is that a prospect hon. Members like to contemplate? I do not like to contemplate such a prospect. I know of no legislation in this country which has not been built up step by step; and I hope my hon. Friends are not going to prevent the taking of such a tremendous step forward as this Bill will enable us to make. I think it would be better, and that it would be more consistent with all our views, if we assisted the Government in this matter. I do beg hon. Members not to persist in a proposal the effect of which will be to smother a measure which clearly tends to benefit the class we all seek to serve. To my knowledge there are some scores of labouring men who cannot get allotments now, and who will be able to get them under this Bill if it be allowed to pass into law.

(6.0.) SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I have to ask the House to consider in what position we stand, and in what position the Government stand, in reference to this Instruction, and also what are the objects of the Instruction. As I understand it, its object is to declare that the Bill as introduced by Her Majesty's Government—not that it is bad in itself—would be improved by being enlarged. That is the declaration of the Instruction. Now, Sir, who is the person who gets up and denies that proposition? It is my hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division (Mr. J. Collings). The hon. Gentleman has himself an Allotment Bill (No. 2) on the Order Paper, the only justification for which is that it contains a great many things which are not in the Government Bill, and yet the hon. Gentleman gets up and says the Government Bill ought not to be enlarged. That, to my mind, is a most extraordinary position. It is as much as to say that although there are a number of things which require to be amended or enlarged, he will, nevertheless, take every opportunity of preventing their being dealt with. Well, Sir, our position is a very difficult one. We say, by this Instruction, not that we desire to throw out the Bill, but that we admit there is a necessity for such a measure, and we wish to add something to it. Now, I suppose I must take the mind of Her Majesty's Government from what is done by the hon. Member for Bordesley. He, in fact, is the interpreter of the mind of Her Majesty's Government. He says, "For Heaven's sake don't enlarge this Bill, because anything that is added to it will destroy it."

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I simply repeated the words of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The eloquence of the hon. Member simply consists in repeating the sentences of Her Majesty's Government, not only on this question, but upon all other questions. Whatever Her Majesty's Government say the hon. Member for Bordesley repeats, and probably he thinks that that repetition adds a strength and force to what the Government say that otherwise it would not possess. No doubt we perfectly understand the position of the hon. Member for Bordesley, and I think it is also thoroughly understood by the people outside this House. For my part, I think Her Majesty's Government are more reasonable and intelligible on this subject than the hon. Member for Bordesley gives them credit for being; and I believe there are hon. Gentlemen on their own side of the House who would also desire that this Bill should, if possible, be extended, and that things should be inserted in it which are not in it. I believe, with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), that this Instruction may be divided into two parts. The first part of it enables the election of the Local Authority to be incorporated in the Bill, and that, undoubtedly, is an important matter, and would require extensive and distinct machinery, and I daresay that the adoption of this Instruction would lead to a very interesting discussion as to the character of the Local Authority. I listened with some interest to the remarks of the hon. Member for Hornsey, who stated that the Parish Authority would be a most appropriate authority for dealing with the objects of this Bill, while the present Sanitary Authority or the County Councils would be altogether inappropriate. I also listened to the speech of the hon. Member for North Hampshire in glorification of the Boards of Guardians. I do not wish to disparage those Boards, but I must say that they are bodies who know very little indeed about the parishes, and of whom the parishes themselves know nothing at all. I can cite my own experience of Hampshire, in which I reside. I remember that when the Local Government Bill was under discussion I happened to be down in that county at Easter, and I thought I would go to the vestry meeting. I found there three farmers and a clergyman, and I was informed that the rate had been increased. I suggested that it might be well to inquire why the rate had been increased, and that proposition was received with acquiescence. I said, Would it not be better to look a little into the accounts? but they said, We have not any accounts; and I think they added that for eight or nine years no accounts had been published by the Board of Guardians in reference to the administration of the rate. That was my first introduction to the mode of administering relief by the Boards of Guardians. An hon. Member opposite has said, How is it possible that the Sanitary Authorities should go against the wishes of the parishes?

MR. STEPHENS: That was not my argument at all.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member referred to the case of the Parish of Cottenham, the details of which I do not propose to go into. But I may state that letters were addressed to the Local Board on the subject of the refusal of the Local Authority to make allotments there, when the matter was discussed at some length. I have here a letter from the Chairman of the Sanitary Authority, who says that the whole matter was gone into, and the Sanitary Authority would do nothing in it. The Chairman also said he knew nothing about Cottenham. That is the statement made by the Chairman of a body which would have the management of allotments in the Parish of Cottenham.

Well, I think it would be wise to introduce provisions into this Bill which would have the effect of amending such a state of things. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has said that this question would arise when we dealt with District Councils. For my part I cannot understand why he is not dealing with District Councils this year. As it is, the matter is to be postponed until we come to deal with that subject. I think that this discussion has shown how unfit the Sanitary Authorities or Boards of Guardians are to deal with matters of this description. The Instruction now before the House would confer further powers for acquiring and managing allotments. Well, is the House or are the Government opposed to that? Is the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bordesley opposed to it? At any rate, the House ought distinctly to understand that the issue we are about to divide upon is whether or not larger powers for this purpose should be given by this Bill. Do not let there be any mistake about that. The Instruction does not compel anything; it merely enables the Committee to consider this matter, so that when we consider the Bill in Committee we may propose a new area of Local Government. If hon. Members approve of this Instruction let them vote for it. Do not let there be any hoodwinking in reference to this question. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has said that he would rather drop the Bill than introduce provisions which would be too heavy to be carried into the Bill. Hon. Gentlemen opposite have said that they desire to see larger powers given. Well, then, let them vote for this Instruction. If they do not desire to see larger powers given, let them vote against the Instruction. Well, then, they say that the Government will drop the Bill. Why should they do so, when clauses can be introduced in Committee, and the Committee can decide whether they should be adopted or not. I would vote against clauses which I thought would destroy the Bill. I do not want to destroy, but to enlarge the Bill; and I do not want to enlarge it in a manner which would overweight it. I want to introduce into it such useful provisions as it could properly bear. I admit the weight of the argument of the President of the Local Government Board. I do not think we could frame a new and complete system of Local Government in this Bill. But there are several things I should like to put into it; for instance, the power of hiring instead of buying land. It is unreasonable for the Government to say—"If you agree to that we will drop the Bill." Do you mean to confine the amendment of the Allotments Act within the four corners of this Bill or do you not? In my opinion, you act unwisely simply to confine your Bill to the establishment of an Appeal Court. If the Boards of Guardians have failed to act, the County Councils are not likely to act. In one or two cases you might get something done; but the proposal is not going to give a vitality to this legislation which it does not possess already. The constitution of the County Council is utterly inappropriate for this sort of work. How could the County Council deal with the acquirement of little bits of land for the purposes of allotments perhaps 50 miles away? It is not done by Boards of Guardians; it is geographically impossible. The County Council can no doubt deal effectually with main roads, county bridges, asylums, and police management; but to suppose that it could take charge of the management of allotments is entirely to misconceive the whole character of the business. What we really want to do is to give larger powers, and clauses might be proposed in order to see whether or not any of them could be adopted. The President of the Local Government Board has pleaded in favour of his own child. That is a very proper parental sentiment. The apology that he has made for that child is the old apology—"It is such a very little one." We want to feed up his little child into a promising bantling. That is really the object of this Instruction. I can assure him that we have not the smallest disposition to destroy his child, but we would rather have seen twins. I hope the Government will not regard this Instruction as hostile to their Bill. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that there is no desire to press clauses that might not reasonably be accepted. Why not take this opportunity? Why not open the door to useful amendment? If you say "No, we consider our Bill so perfect that we exclude from it everything else," we cannot accept that condition. We desire to enlarge and improve it, and it is upon that ground that we divide in support of the Motion.

*(6.25.) THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): Sir, I do not intend to follow the right hon. Gentleman through the course of his speech. He referred to the apology of my right hon. Friend as a very old one. I think we may say much the same of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. It is a very old speech, and it consisted chiefly of offering the Government some advice which the right hon. Gentleman has been good enough to offer us in a previous occasion. We much regret that we were unable to accept the right hon. Gentleman's advice then, and we are in much the same position now. I can well understand that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby would be very glad to induce the Government to accept his advice so as to embarrass their business, and he would be equally ready to turn round and abuse them for not properly conducting the affairs of the country. The right hon. Gentleman has attempted with all his wonted charms and seductions to win us over; but we will not fall into the trap laid for us, and we will manage our own affairs in our own way. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Seale-Hayne) waxed very eloquent over the vast expenditure that would be incurred in obtaining Provisional Orders for the purposes of allotments. The hon. Gentleman has ignored the provisions of the Allotments Act under which a Provisional Order is put in a Confirming Bill brought into this House and taken before the Committee upstairs. If the Bill is opposed, the Committee have the power, if they think that the expenditure caused by the opposition has been improperly brought about, to lay the costs upon the opponents. That power does not exist with regard to other Provisional Orders, and it is manifestly unfair to compare the case of a Provisional Order for the purposes of allotments with the Provisional Orders for other and wholly different purposes.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: The cases which I cited were unopposed.

*MR. LONG: The hon. Member quoted cases, so far as I remember, from certain towns in reference to their improvements and other matters. I hope before very long we shall be able to tell the hon. Gentleman what is the actual cost of obtaining Provisional Orders for allotment purposes. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey spoke of the necessity for lawyers and surveyors. I can assure the House that under the provisions of the Allotments Acts there is no need for the services of lawyers and surveyors, and it is quite possible for the land to be obtained at an agreed price, and then to obtain a Provisional Order at a very small price indeed. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) made a suggestion with reference to the price paid for land taken compulsorily, and said that by the working of the Sanitary Laws there had been great difficulty in securing the removal of unsanitary buildings owing to the cost. He suggested that the cost might well be reduced. That is all very well where an individual has allowed his property to become unsanitary; but where a man is not in such default, I do not think the House would say that he should be punished by having his land and property taken on just the same terms that he would have received had he been in default. The right hon. Gentleman told us the Bill was going to be a failure because it gives these powers to the County Council; but I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is aware that County Councils have expressed a desire to have these powers and their readiness to use them. I am convinced that they will carry out the Bill. The issue is a very simple one: it is the carrying of an amending Bill, which will remove existing difficulties, or the consideration of proposals which it is impossible to carry out. The discussion has been very full and complete, and I hope we may now be allowed to get the Speaker out of the Chair and the Bill into Committee.

DISESTABLISHMENT AND DISENDOWMENT OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

*(9.2.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): Mr. Speaker, for the third time in this House I rise to move:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Church of Scotland ought to be disestablished and disendowed."

On the two former occasions the Motion was defeated, but only by an English majority. It was supported by a large majority of the Scotch Members. In 1886 the majority of Scotch votes in its favour was three to two, and in 1888 they were as two to one. In 1888, 38 Scottish Members voted, and two paired, in support of my Resolution, and only 20 voted against. And, to show the direction in which public opinion is running in Scotland, I may add that the bye-elections which have taken place since the constitution of the present Parliament have resulted in the return of an even greater proportion of Members supporting my views. In 1877 the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington), when leader of the Liberal Party, and when the passing of the Patronage Act had made Disestablishment a prominent question in Scotland, said, speaking in Glasgow—

"All I can say is that whenever Scottish opinion, or even Scottish Liberal opinion, is fully formed on the subject, I think I may venture to say on behalf of the Liberal Party as a whole that they will be prepared to deal with the question as a whole without regard to other considerations."

I am sorry the noble Lord is not in his place. I think it must be held that Scottish opinion is fully proved on this subject when, 13 years after the noble Lord's utterance, the total vote at two successive elections of all sections of Liberal Members from Scotland, including that over which the noble Marquess himself presides, was on the first occasion as four to one, on the second five to one in favour of my Motion. Not only so, but the bye-elections since 1886 show that out of 12 Liberals, orthodox and heterodox, returned to this House by Scotch constituencies, 11 support the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland. The noble Lord has such a reputation for courage and straightforwardness that I am certain, when these facts are brought to his notice, I may rely upon him for his support. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, at the time to which I refer, was not the official leader of the Liberal Party; but since he has resumed his natural position as its leader he has always expressed his adhesion to the doctrine laid down in the words of the noble Lord. Very recently he made a speech at St. Austell, and from what he said in that speech I think I may confidently rely upon his support. Then there is another statesman in this House—one of eminence—I refer to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In the last Parliament he sat for a Division of Edinburgh, and he was naturally cross-examined as to his views upon this question. His replies on the occasion were oracularly ambiguous. But time has unriddled the oracle, and I now claim his vote. I do not want to misrepresent his position, and, therefore, I will describe it not in my own, but the words of one of his supporters—Lord Wemyss—who thus spoke of it in a meeting which he addressed at Glasgow, in October, 1885. After paying a high tribute to him, and speaking of him as one to whom Cross-Bench men looked forward with hope, the noble Lord went on to say—

"Mr. Goschen came to be heckled and collared on the question of Disestablishment, and what was his answer—not in a speech. In a speech a man says 50 things which he would rather not see in print. But when you come to be heckled you have time to think what you are going to say, and you answer carefully. Well, what was Mr. Goschen's careful answer to this question of the Established Church? 'My convictions.' Well, what are his convictions? I read it in the Daily Review, so I suppose it must be all right, 'My convictions,' replied Mr. Goschen, 'are the wishes of the people of Scotland.'"

["Hear, hear!"] An hon. Member says, "Hear, hear!" So say I, when the Scottish Members in two successive Parliaments have twice expressed the wishes of the Scottish people upon my Motion in the only manner in which those wishes can be unequivocally and constitutionally expressed, namely, by an overwhelming majority of their votes in support of my proposition. Knowing that the right hon. Gentleman's convictions are the wishes of the Scottish people I have a right to claim his support. I only regret that he no longer occupies a seat for a Scottish constituency, so that greater local weight might attach to the expression of his opinions in the shape in which events have at length consolidated them. But though the enormous preponderance of the Scottish vote ought, in my opinion, to be sufficient to convince the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale it has not been sufficient to convince my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Glasgow, whose views of everything which concerns the Church of Scotland are cast-iron and adamant, and proof alike against the teachings of experience and the logic of facts. That the hon. Member for Partick and the hon. Baronet the Member for Ipswich have adopted his words, speaks more for the heartiness of their approval than for the fertility of their resources. These hon. Gentlemen declare that there is no reason, either as regards the present position of the Church of Scotland, or the position of the people of Scotland, why a proposal should be entertained for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of that Church. The Representatives of the people of Scotland, selected in successive Parliaments under the widest franchise, and with the protection of the Ballot, may record their votes as they please; the bye-elections can afford what additional indication they may of the feelings of Scotland, but to the impenetrably armour-clad mind of my hon. Friend, these facts afford not the smallest reason why any attention should be paid to the matter. There is, according to him, absolutely no reason, so far as regards the wishes of the people of Scotland, why the proposal should be entertained, not even after the results of the bye-elections, and the unequivocal expression of opinion by the large majority of Members in this House. Such a position seems to me so obviously to constitute either a libel upon, or a treason to, our whole system of Parliamentary representation, and I do not think it is necessary to waste further time in endeavouring to refute it. I can only express my astonishment that a doctrine which is so utterly subversive of the whole of the fundamental principles of our Constitution should be advanced in identical terms by three Members, who claim to belong to the Constitutional Party, without calling for condign and summary reproof and repudiation from their Colleagues. But, says the hon. Member for the Glasgow University and his supporters, there is no reason, as regards the present position of the Church of Scotland, why the proposal should be entertained. He does not qualify his assertion. He does not say there is no adequate reason. He says, "There is absolutely no reason whatever." That is an assertion which, I venture to say, is as unblushingly audacious and untenable as that which I have just characterised. What is the position of the Church of Scotland? Now, Sir, prior to the disruption of 1843, the Established Church embraced the majority of the population of Scotland. At various dates, comparatively small bodies had lived off from it, but prior to the Disruption the Established Church of Scotland embraced the vast majority of the Presbyterian population. Between 1832 and 1842 the Established Church of Scotland entered into a historical and momentous struggle with the Civil Courts of the country. The struggle arose out of the rights of patrons to intrude unacceptable ministers on unwilling congregations; but in the course of the struggle a number of most important points of ecclesiastical polity evolved themselves on which the decisions of the Civil Courts were at direct variance with the most cherished doctrines of the Church of Scotland. To give one single example. One of the most cherished doctrines of the Church is the headship of Christ—that is to say, that the Church derives its spiritual jurisdiction direct from our Saviour. In one of his judgments the President of the Court of Session, referring to the doctrine, said—

"That our Saviour is the head of the Kirk of Scotland in any temporal or judicial sense, is a position which I can dignify by no other name than absurdity."

Now, Sir, the result of this long struggle was that, in the year 1842, the strain between Church and State became very great, and the General Assembly of the Established Church drew up a protest and claim of right. In that document 12 principles were laid down, which the Established Church considered of most vital importance, but which, in their opinion, had been contravened by the decisions of the Civil Courts, which, to quote the words of the protest, in determining these points against the Church—

"Had exercised powers not conferred on them by the Constitution—had invaded the jurisdiction of the Courts of the Church, had subverted its Government in opposition to God's Word, in violation of the Constitution, and in disregard of divers express enactments of the Legislature."

The General Assembly drew up this protest and claim of rights for submission to the Sovereign and the Legislature, and wound up with an appeal to all office-bearers and people of the Church who were willing to suffer for their adorable King and Head, to stand by the Church, and to unite in supplication that He would turn the hearts of their rulers to redress their grievances, "or otherwise"—I ask the House to note these words—

"Or otherwise that He would give strength to this Church, office-bearers and people, to endure resignedly the loss of the temporal benefits of the establishment and the personal sufferings and sacrifices to which they may be called, and would inspire them with zeal and energy to promote the advancement of His Son's Kingdom in whatever condition it may be His will to place them."

Well, here we have formulated by the entire Established Church of Scotland a number of points in which the law, as interpreted by the Civil Courts, was subversive of the doctrines of that Church. You have a demand made for the redress of these grievances by legislation, and the position taken up was that unless the grievances were remedied there was no alternative but to shake off the trammels imposed by State connection, and, at whatever cost, to assert the spiritual freedom of the Church. That protest came before the Government, and the Legislature, and the Church was informed that its claims were incompatible with the position of the Established Church. And, thereupon, those of its people who adhered to the doctrines of the National Church as laid down in its solemn protest—those men in whose mouths the words “suffering” and “sacrifice” were more than idle wind proceeding from the teeth outward—those who were willing to undergo suffering and sacrifice for conscience sake—these men went forth from the Establishment claiming that they were the rightful Representatives and heirs of the traditions of the Church of Scotland, which they said, and rightly said, was national, not because it was established, but because it was free. Now, those who were thus driven forth from the National Church did not at once demand Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church of Scotland, but when they did make the demand, the circumstances under which it was made rendered it vastly more weighty. They did not make it, as might have been expected, when smarting under a sense of injustice and embittered by the sacrifices they had to make. They endured those things patiently. They worked on for something like 40 years, during which, at the cost of incredible labour and sacrifice, in many instances, in the face of every obstacle which bigotry and intolerance could suggest, at the cost of a pecuniary expenditure of close on 11 millions sterling, they reared an ecclesiastical system which extended over Scotland, and which rivalled the Establishment in its influence and importance. During those 40 years nothing was done to remedy their grievances or to render possible the return to the Establishment of those who had gone forth from it, until, at length, at the instance of the supporters of the Establishment, Mr. Disraeli brought in and carried his Patronage Act; not with the object of re-incorporating the Free Church, but for the purpose of inducing desertions from other Scotch Churches by which the Establishment might be strengthened. There was no pretence that the Act would lead to a re-union of the Church. “I have always said,” stated the Duke of Argyll, “there is no hope whatever for the re-union of the Free and Established Churches except on the ground of Disestablishment.” The object of the Act was to induce large numbers of lay members of the other Churches to return to the Establishment under the pretext that the most substantial of the grievances that had been alleged should be redressed. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) described it was “an attempt to steal back piece-meal what had been driven forth wholesale,” and resented accordingly. Under these circumstances the Free Church was at length compelled to admit that an Establishment so identified with a policy of antagonism and aggression, backed up in that policy by a powerful political Party and State Endowment, constituted a standing menace to its usefulness in the great sphere of Christian work which, at such great cost, it had opened up. The Free Church was at length compelled to admit that under the altered circumstances the maintenance of the Establishment was unjust and inexpedient, and since then, by constantly increasing majorities, the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland has voted in favour of the proposition now before the House. And yet the hon. Member for Glasgow University sees no reason why this proposal should be as much as entertained. Why, in reply to an argument of the hon. Gentleman himself it was pointed out, in 1886, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that there was not another example in Christendom of a Church enjoying the advantages of State Endowment and State Establishment existing alongside two other Churches of almost equally numerous membership, adhering to the same doctrine, more strict in the enforcement of its discipline than the Established Church, which, having been driven forth from the Establishment, in consequence of their uncompromising adhesion to its principles, now found themselves subjected to the disadvantage of State prestige and State Endowments being used by the Establishment as a lever for their disintegration. There is no reason, forsooth, in the present condition of the Church in Scotland! It is admittedly the Church of the minority of the Scottish people. It does not claim more than 46½ per cent. of the people of Scotland, and we altogether repudiate that claim; still we will take it at their own figure as 46½ per cent. They do not, on their own figures, embrace more than 56½ per cent. of the Presbyterians of Scotland. That leaves 43½ per cent. of the Presbyterians belonging to other Churches. Is that a minority which can be utterly disregarded in the discussion of a question of this sort? The number of Established churches, although there was some quibble about mission stations—is less than the number of other Presbyterian places of worship; and there can be no question that the attendance at the dissenting Churches is greater than at the Established Church. Its revenues are less than half the revenues of the other Presbyterian Churches. What right, then, has this one portion of the Presbyterian Church to exclusive privileges—to exclusive State support—especially when those advantages are used for aggression against the other Presbyterian Churches? I do not complain of the Established Church being aggressive. If it were not aggressive it would show a lack of vitality; but I ask why should the State aid one portion of the Presbyterian Church, and enable it to extend its bounds at the expense of the Presbyterian and other Churches, which are as pure and as zealous in the work they have to perform? We used to have the Act of Union thrown at us, and to be told that the Established Church was guaranteed by that Act; but hardly was the ink dry on the Act, than its most important provision with regard to the freedom of the Scottish Church was thrown overboard by the passing of the Patronage Act of Queen Anne. Only last year, too, the provision which exacted a theological test from every Professor in a Scottish University was swept away. That, perhaps, explains why the old stalking-horse of the Union did not appear in the Amendment to his Motion. We are told that the Established Church of Scotland is doing good work. Will hon. Gentlemen deny that the other Churches are doing equally good work? We are told that without State aid the spiritual wants of the poor of Scotland must be neglected. I hold that to be a libel on all the other Churches of Scotland. The Free Church provides almost exclusively for the wants of the poor in the Highlands of Scotland, and the United Presbyterian Church in Orkney and Shetland. In many of the Highland parishes the position of the Established Church is almost as great a scandal as almost anything that could be picked out of the history of the old Irish Establishment. In a statement which has been distributed amongst hon. Members will be found a list of 13 Highland parishes, embracing a population of over 13,000 souls, and in not one of the parishes are there to be found more than 10 Communicants of the Established Church, whilst in the whole of them that Church claims only 63 Communicants. I could quote scores of instances of the same kind. Even in counties like Caithness, or Ross and Cromarty, where the State subsidy amounts to £6 or even £10 per head of the Communicants, the position of the Established Church is most wretched and deplorable. We are told that the Established Church is rapidly enlarging its boundaries. We claim that the other Churches are doing the same. But if it is increasing more rapidly than the other Churches in Scotland it must be in consequence of the legislation which has been undertaken by this House against the vote of the vast majority of the Scotch Representatives. If any disproportionate increase has taken place in the Established Church, it must have been at the expense of the sister Churches. But we do not admit that the Patronage Act, or the policy since pursued, has in any way strengthened the Established Church. On the contrary, we believe it has been a source of weakness to her by embittering the relations between the Established Church and the other Presbyterian Bodies, and it has convinced a large majority of the people of Scotland that the continued maintenance under present circumstances of the Establishment, so far from being a boon to their religion is a curse. The endowments of the Established Church amount to about £350,000 or £400,000. This, it is said, is the patrimony of that Church, but it is not the patrimony of a Church. It is the patrimony simply of the Ecclesiastical Establishment for the time being. The endowments are the remnant of the patrimony of the old Roman Catholic Establishment—the patrimony of the Episcopal Establishment. Then they formed the patrimony of the pre-Disruption Presbyterian Establishment, and then of the post-Disruption Erastian Establishment. They are as much the patrimony of the Establishment as the property of the Board of Works or the Post Office may be said to be the patrimony of those Departments, and they are as much the property of the nation as that property. In their history and origin they are infinitely more clearly the property of the nation than certain educational endowments, the destination of which has recently been altered with such ruthless hands by a Royal Commission, of which the hon. Member for Glasgow University (Mr. J. A. Campbell) and Lord Balfour of Burleigh were prominent Members. I say it comes with a very bad grace from that hon. Gentleman and that noble Lord to accuse us of spoliation after the very active part they have taken in putting in force, on much more debatable ground than we propose to invade, the doctrines we advocate, and especially when, as in the case of the Madras College, St. Andrews, they have sometimes carried out their policy with a cruel disregard of the vested rights of individuals, who had earned those rights by life-long service of the public, and who, owing to the decrees of the Commission, have been thrown upon the world to live as best they may. An attempt has been made to drag a red herring across the trail by suggesting that the endowments should be distributed amongst the Presbyterian Bodies. That proposal has had no practical support and has already been denounced by the leading Representatives of the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church. The hon. and learned Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay), when he, a few years ago, introduced a scheme for the re-union of the different Churches, spoke of bringing in a subsequent Bill dealing with this branch of the subject, but nothing more has been heard of it, probably owing to the difficulty being recognised of making this suggested adjustment of the endowments. But it is no scheme of that kind that the people of Scotland want. What, through their Representatives in this House they have twice decided that they want is not any more tinkering with the Establishment. What is wanted is the severance of all connection between Church and State, perfect religious equality among the people, and the appropriation of the endowments, now monopolised by one sect, to public uses, careful regard being had to all vested interests. And, Sir, with the view of again testing the feelings of this House, and especially of the Scottish Members, on that question, I beg to move the Resolution that stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "In the opinion of this House, the Church of Scotland ought to be disestablished and disendowed,"—(Dr. Cameron,)
—instead thereof.

*(9.40.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I rise with some diffidence to second the Resolution which has just been moved by the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow. It is not to some of us a new subject. It so happens I was one of a deputation which waited on the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (The Marquess of Hartington) when he visited Scotland and made the first official declaration in regard to Disestablishment, and it may not be out of place that, as the proposer represents one of the largest cities in Scotland, the seconder should be the Representative of one of the largest counties. Now, I claim to approach this subject very dispassionately. It so happens that in my own constituency there is a large majority of electors belonging to the Church of Scotland, and it is quite a mistake to believe that the feeling in the Church of Scotland is unanimous against Disestablishment. I have the honour to have among my strongest supporters elders and office-bearers of the Church of Scotland. But although we approach this subject dispassionately, we approach it none the less earnestly. It is not my intention to go into statistics. Were we to go into statistics, and were we to prove that there is in Scotland a large majority in favour of religious inequality, it would, in my opinion, be a stronger argument against that majority imposing on the minority their religion, or any liabilities in regard to it. I have all my life belonged to a denomination which dates back 150 years, and has always held that the religious vitality of the Church itself is a perfect security for its temporalities. We can depend, and do depend, on our most resolute faith in the goodwill and feelings of the people to maintain the Christian communities to which they are attached. On the present occasion we are asked to make merely a pious declaration of our opinions, and are not entering upon legislation. But, in our view, that is both necessary and right. A subject of this kind ought to be approached with caution. We ought to look at the interests of all concerned, and I believe it would be in the interests both of those in favour and those against Disestablishment that we should have the fullest and freest discussion of this subject before we come to legislation. It is to some of us a matter of very great interest that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, to whom we look as a Scottish Member to give us some declaration on the subject, has already in the Parliament of 1885 given it as his opinion that at that time this subject was not ripe for legislation. But that is no reason why we should not discuss it at the present time, in prospect of legislation in the future. Now, although we have several Amendments on the Paper they are all the same in substance. The Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities declares in his Amendment that there is no reason, as regards either the present position of the Church of Scotland or the wishes of the people of Scotland, which calls for our interference. I put this proposition to my hon. Friend: that it is not for us to show that there is any call on our part to interfere; but it is for my hon. Friend to show that a minority of the people of Scotland should have for their own disposal large funds which belong to the whole people. There is one thing to which I think attention should be called. Before the Disruption the Church of Scotland came to the Legislature and called their attention to the growing population in the cities, for which there was no temporal provision made in that Church. The Legislature said to them, even so long ago as 1838, that they were not prepared to extend these ecclesiastical privileges in Scotland. Having this stated to them, it was necessary that provision should be made for those for whom the Church of Scotland in the disposal of her endowments made no provision; and when the Church of Scotland send out their statistics—as they are doing now—they always conceal from the public the important fact that where there have been two or three Chapels of Ease or quoad sacra churches established, the central churches have never gone the length of what they declare to be their own convictions, and which I think they would do if they had their own convictions as deeply as they profess to have. If it is essential for the cause of religion in Scotland that the parish churches should be endowed, why does not the Church recognise the principle of distributing the endowment with the other Churches belonging to their own denomination? The hon. Member for Peebles (Mr. Thorburn) brings forward a somewhat different Amendment, in which he says that—

“As the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of Scotland has not been put before the people of Scotland as a test question, this House declines fundamentally to disturb the present ecclesiastical arrangements in that country.”

Now, what does my hon. Friend mean by that? Do the upholders of the Scottish Establishment really seriously propose to this House that any other means should be taken to ascertain the wishes of the people of Scotland than by going to the ballot-box? If seems to me if our friends are prepared to say that we should take some exceptional plébiscite different from the ballot-box, they give up their whole case because they fear the tribunal. I do not propose to follow the arguments used in the Amendments any further; but I do notice that it is being constantly stated, and those who favour Disestablishment are reproached by being told, that we have no mandate from our constituents. [“Hear, hear!”] In response to the feeble cheers I hear from the benches opposite, I would ask, have the Party opposite any mandate? What is the mandate? Was it not the whole argument at the recent Election that this matter should be left alone during the present Parliament? ["Yes" and "No" from the Ministerial Benches.] There seems to be a difference of opinion on the point among the supporters of the Establishment, which I leave them to settle among themselves. Who is to blame for breaking the truce? The hon. Member for Inverness was the first to introduce a Bill on this subject, while the hon. Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen is every year bringing in fresh legislation. What right, then, have our friends to say that those who now favour Disestablishment disturb the peace of Scotland and break the solemn promise given at the last Election? I claim, however, some consideration for the hon. Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen, whom I have frequently followed into the Lobby on educational questions. My hon. Friend was elected by the University vote and although the ministers of the Church of Scotland are constantly telling us that they approach this subject from no Party point of view, out of 310 clerical votes only 15 were given for the Liberal candidate. Does my hon. Friend ask that the endowment and establishment of the Church ought to continue on the ground of its being the Church of the majority? If that is the argument, what have we to say to the Roman Catholics in Ireland, who are in a majority in that country? If we are not to take the numerical strength, are we to take the purity and true religion of the Church? If so, who are to be the judges? Is the House of Commons to be the dictator, and, if so, where is the spiritual independence which has been the glory of the Presbyterian Church in ages past? Now, take another argument. Our opponents say if there is no endowed Church the people in certain districts will be destitute of religion. What is the ground for saying that? The poorest districts of Scotland are the Highlands. Voluntary churches support the whole of the Highlands almost, and the Church of Scotland spend £40,000 a year on congregations, the average membership of which is 5½. It is not true that those who want the Disestablishment of the Church desire to divert the endowments. The claim is that the money belongs to the Church, and that the Church is the Church of the people. The Established Church is upheld by Parliament out of public funds, and every one is agreed that not a penny of that money should be diverted. All we want is that the money shall be applied to some universal purpose, of which all parties may partake alike. On a previous occasion the Lord Advocate said that the question was merely one of envy and personal jealousy. I am not sure upon what foundation this statement is based by the right hon. Gentleman, because our claim is that the envy and jealousy is largely created by the disunion which exists in the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland, and the only means of uniting that Church is by the Disendowment and Disestablishment of the Established Church. Instead of this attitude being assumed in a spirit of jealousy and envy, I claim that it is assumed in the interest of true union, and to put an end to all feeling of jealousy. The learned Lord Advocate made another statement, which was very remarkable. He said the temporalities of the Church of Scotland were "an increment of spiritual means." I confess I have not been able to come to any conclusion as to the meaning of that statement. I have got it from Hansard, and if the right hon. Gentleman has been misreported I shall be glad to hear any correction. Dr. Chalmers, in a remarkable utterance, has said that the Church might cease to be an Establishment, but that in all the high matters of sacred and spiritual jurisdiction she would be the same as before. I put the opinion of the great leader formerly of the Church of Scotland, and later of the Free Church, against the opinion of the Lord Advocate on this point. We are asked whether Disestablishment would promote union. We are aware that two proposals have been made—one of levelling up, and the other of levelling down. The first proposal has been found to be impracticable, and union on that basis has been declared impossible. It is, therefore, left to us to seek union on the basis of Disestablishment and Disendowment. I appeal to the House to give serious consideration to a subject which is causing great irritation and great injustice in Scotland. I would ask whether the present is not a great opportunity of effecting Christian union among the religious denominations of Scotland. At no previous period has there been such a disposition to meet the Church of Scotland fairly, and to consider her great history and her good work. We are ready to meet the Church of Scotland on any terms which may be considered fair and just in the interests of Scotland, and I beseech hon. Gentlemen opposite who have been bound so long to the temporalities of that Church to trust to the free-will offerings of the people, having no fear that the Church will not maintain its cause without State connection and without State or patronage endowment. I have great pleasure in seconding the Motion.

* (10.6.) MR. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): I must oppose the Motion just moved and seconded. I recognise the friendly spirit in which my Friends opposite have referred to me; and I hope that, though I shall be obliged to speak somewhat decidedly on the opposite side, I shall not be less friendly in my remarks than they have been. I must demur altogether to the account given by the Mover of the Motion of the nature and causes of the Disruption movement in 1843. The controversy at that time was not as to whether there was or was not a spiritual Headship of Christ, but whether or not it had been invaded by the Courts of Law; and the position taken up by the majority of the Church was confirmed by decisions in the Courts of Law afterwards in quieter times, which fully established the spiritual independence of the Church within its own province. Then my hon. Friend gave a somewhat fanciful account of the nature of the Church's action in regard to the passing of the Act for the abolition of patronage. That Act was not passed for the purpose of inducing desertions from the Free Church, but in order to relieve the Church of Scotland from a defect under which it had long suffered. The Church had always protested against the system of patronage. The controversy was not as to whether there should be patronage, but how patronage was to be modified or got rid of. Parliament never said that the Church, in passing what was called the Veto Act, had done a thing that was in itself wrong or inexpedient or objectionable, but simply that it had done a thing it had no power to do. I claim that, the Church of Scotland has never said anything against the work of its neighbours, or attempted to interfere with that work or refused to recognise the good work of its neighbours. My hon. Friends have both twitted me—[“No!”]—well, they have referred in a facetious and not altogether flattering manner to what they regard as inconsistency on my part in two different lines of action—firstly, in opposing this Motion; and secondly, in carrying through the work of the Educational Endowments Commission. With regard to extending the benefits of her endowments, the Church of Scotland has repeatedly and in the most generous and decided manner invited the other Churches to suggest some way in which they might unite with her, consistently with her character as a National Church, to share in the work of the National Church, and share in the endowments of the National Church. My hon. Friend said that the Educational Endowment Commissioners have interfered with existing arrangements, and introduced new systems. We did so because we were commissioned to re-organise the endowments, so as to carry out better the intentions of the founders and to make the endowments more useful considering the changed circumstances of the time. On the same principle the Church has also sought to make her endowments more useful; but if she gives up the principle of a National Church, she will be going directly in the teeth of the intentions of the pious founders of these endowments. My hon. Friend the Member for East Aberdeen (Mr. Esslemont) has asked me whether I would continue the endowment and establishment of the Church of Scotland on the ground of it being the Church of the majority of the people, and if so, whether I would extend the same principle to Ireland and other places. The Church of Scotland has come to us with obligations with regard to her and in connection with the other parts of the Kingdom. We have in the Church of Scotland a branch of the same great Protestant Church as the Church of England. We have in Scotland a Church not out of sympathy with the Church of the majority in England, but representing in Scotland the same sentiment as the latter represents in England. [“Oh, oh!”] I mean the Christian Protestant sentiment of the great majority of the people. The hon. Member (Dr. Cameron) has quoted the opinion of Dr. Chalmers four or five years before the Disruption. I will quote a sentence uttered by Dr. Chalmers four years after the Disruption. "I can afford," said Dr. Chalmers, a few days before his death in 1847,

"To say no more than that my hopes of an extended Christianity from the efforts of voluntarism alone have not been brightened by my experience since the Disruption. We rejoice, therefore, in the testimony of the Free Church for the principle of a national Establishment, and most sincerely do we hope that she will never fall away from it."

I do not wish to tax the attention of the House any more than is necessary with statistics; but, at the same time, it may be inevitable that some statistics should be referred to. The proposal of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron) is a serious proposal. It is one which will, if carried, involve a greater change than has been experienced in Scotland since the Union. He referred by anticipation to the objections that might be adduced on the ground of the Treaty of Union. I will not dwell on the Treaty of Union. No doubt it has been interfered with in many respects, but I do not know that on that account anything that is a prominent feature of the Treaty of Union is not deserving of serious consideration. The maintenance of the Church as by law established is a prominent provision of the Treaty of Union. It has a prominent place in the Coronation Oath of the Sovereign of the United Kingdom, and I say that any proposal to abolish the Church as an Established Church under such circumstances ought to be approached with consideration and care. I hold that to justify this Motion there ought to be distinct proof that the people of Scotland wish the Church to be Disestablished and Disendowed, and that there is something in the position of the Church to justify such a wish. I deny that there is any proof of either. As to the wish of the people of Scotland, we had an indication of it a few years ago, when shoals of Petitions were sent in to this House against Mr. Dick Peddie's Disestablishment Bill. There has been no change of sentiment in Scotland since that time. I may also refer to the very significant declaration made by the electors of Mid Lothian, who, to the number of 67 per cent., signed a declaration that they were opposed to the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland. The Disestablishment Council of Scotland have circulated, to some extent, a printed statement in this House. Neither I nor any of my Friends received a copy of it, and it was only through the courtesy of an hon. Friend opposite that I now have a copy of it. That document states that, "The people of Scotland have long demanded redress," from having an Established Church. When and where have the people of Scotland spoken to that effect? Proofs are adduced in the statement, but they are from ecclesiastical and political sources alone. The Synod of the United Presbyterian Church and the General Assembly of the Free Church are cited as having passed resolutions in favour of Disestablishment, but these Church Courts are not the people of Scotland. Nor do they represent all the members of their Churches. We know that many Free Churchmen are strongly opposed to Disestablishment; and as to the United Presbyterian Church, although votes have been carried unanimously in its Synod, those who have personal acquaintance with its ministers and members have been aware that there are many in that denomination who have no sympathy with the Disestablishment movement. We now have proof of this, for on the 16th ult. a large and influential meeting of lay members of the United Presbyterian Church was held at Glasgow to memorialise the Synod against the existence and action of the Synod's Committee on Disestablishment and Disendowment. It was declared at that meeting that the Memorialists held "various opinions," as by the constitution of their Church they were at liberty to do "as to the wisdom of the policy of Disestablishment and Disendowment; but that they were "at one in the belief that agitation in support of that policy by a Committee acting under ecclesiastical authority" was "inexpedient." Another proof given in the printed statement that the people wish for Disestablishment, is that at a meeting of 400 Home Rule Liberal delegates, held in Glasgow in November last, it was agreed that Disestablishment in Scotland "must be kept in the front rank of the Liberal Programme." There has thus been a resolution in favour of Disestablishment by a certain political organisation and by certain Church Courts. But these are not "the people of Scotland." To say so is an error of the same nature, though not of the same degree, as that of the historical tailors of Tooley Street, who represented themselves as the people of England. I would ask, where have there been any public meetings in Scotland in favour of Disestablishment, for, say, the last five years? But as to the wishes of the people of Scotland, what do we know? Last year the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, speaking at St. Austell, expressed himself to the effect that "The sense of Scotland had now been sufficiently and unequivocally declared" by two votes in this House. But what had the right hon. Gentleman previously said? In November, 1885, addressing his constituents in answer to a question "whether he would would take the vote on the Resolution of the Member for the College Division as indicative of the state of Scottish opinion," he said—

"If I am right in saying that every Liberal voter ought to support a competent Liberal candidate, whatever be his opinions on the Church question, then, of course, it follows that no such resolution can be accepted as conclusive, because, as I said, the men were elected on the general grounds of Liberalism and were not elected on the Church question."

So much for the Parliament then sitting. What of the present Parliament? It was elected on the question of the government of Ireland and not on the Church question. At the elections in Scotland the Church question was scarcely mentioned. It follows, therefore, that a vote on the Resolution of the hon. Member can no more be accepted in this Parliament than in last as conclusive of the opinions on this question of the people of Scotland. And what were these two votes? In 1886, out of 72 Scotch Members, 25 voted for the Motion, and in 1888 38 voted for it. On a subject upon which the Representatives had no mandate from their constituents, the vote of a bare majority is held to be an unequivocal declaration of the sense of Scotland! But it seems to me we have a somewhat better criterion of the opinion of Scotland than can be got from any vote in this House taken in that way. I refer to what happened at the last two bye-elections, where the candidates who advocated Disestablishment were unsuccessful, and the candidates who were opposed to Disestablishment were returned. So far, then, as the evidence of elections goes, the most recent information gives the sense of Scotland against this Motion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, in addressing his constituents in 1879, put aside the idea that there was any danger of this question being disposed of without a fair trial and a full consideration of the case by the people of Scotland. Such a fair trial and full consideration is exactly what the Church demands. The Committee on Church Interests, who are authorised to speak for the Church in this matter, have said that they would acquiesce in any method in which a decision of the people could be taken on the question by fair and honourable means, and as a distinct and separate issue. The Disestablishment Council in their statement have objected by anticipation to a plébiscite. The Church is not afraid of a plébiscite. It has never asked for one. It does not demand any particular way of taking the decision. But it claims that if the opinion of the people is to be taken, it must be taken on this as a separate question, and not mixed up and entangled with questions of Party politics. As to the position of the Church, there is no warrant for such a Motion as this of the hon. Member for the College Division. The numerical strength of the Church is undoubtedly of some importance in a question of this kind, but it is not the only thing to be considered. The question is not how many members there are in the Church of Scotland, but what proportion of the people of Scotland have any wish that the Church should be disestablished. The Church has many ardent defenders who do not belong to its communion. The Petitions the other year to which I have already referred had the signatures of 150,000 persons who were not in the communion of the Church. Still, the number claiming the Church as theirs is a question of importance, and how is the information to be obtained? [An hon. MEMBER: "Census."] A Census would give us most valuable information on that point, and I hope it is not too late yet to have a column in the forthcoming Census giving religious denominations. But it is not the fault of the friends of the Church that such a Census was not taken on the last occasion. But in the absence of that, some approximation to precise information may be obtained from the statistics of the Registrar General. From these it appears that 47 per cent. of the marriages in Scotland are solemnised in connection with the Church of Scotland. Deducting Roman Catholic marriages and irregular marriages, the proportion of Protestant marriages solemnised by the Church of Scotland is 53 per cent. The communicants of the Church number 581,568, and those of all the other Protestant denominations 520,730, showing a majority for the Church of Scotland of 60,800. In the statement which they have issued, the Disestablishment Council venture to say that there are good grounds for calling in question the large membership claimed by the Established Church. This serious charge of misrepresentation is made upon the ground that taking the statistics of congregations of the churches in Perthshire, the numbers connected with the various churches would exceed the whole population of the county; and, coming to the conclusion that there must be a mistake somewhere, in the Church of Scotland or the Free Church or the United Presbyterian Church statistics, they assume that the fault must be with the Church of Scotland! The Church of Scotland challenges scrutiny of her statistics. The membership in the different parishes is published in the Year Book, and the accuracy of the figures can easily be inquired into; and as this case has been so directly mentioned in statements by our opponents, I, holding the position of Convener of the Church Committee on Statistics, undertake to make inquiry in any case where it is thought by any of our friends that explanation is required. The Disestablishment statement, which has been circulated, refers to the fact that the increase of Church membership, as reported last year, was not so great as in previous years; but no mention is made of the fact that this difference is due to stricter rules having been introduced in revising communion rolls. The statement compares the increase in the different Churches in the last year, but avoids the comparison of the last two or four years, which would have shown the following increase—for the last two years, for the Church of Scotland, 10,539; for the Free Church, 5,129; and for the United Presbyterian Church, 900; or for the last four years, for the Church of Scotland, 25,946; for the Free Church, 9,199; and for the United Presbyterian Church, 2,981. I may mention that the statistics which will shortly be published will show an increase for the Church of Scotland in the past 12 months of about 7,000. No one with any acquaintance with Scotland can doubt that the Established Church is steadily and, in many places, rapidly increasing throughout the country. The Disestablishment statement calls attention to its position in the Highlands, and gives statistics with reference to 12 parishes in which the Church membership is very small. Ever since the Disruption of 1843 the Church has been weak in some parts of the Gaelic Highlands, and the 12 parishes mentioned are the worst, that is, the weakest, of the weak places. Yet the case is not so bad as it is represented to be. Let it be remembered that these are 12 parishes out of 1,330. Then, they are all what are called Parliamentary Churches, in remote parts of the Highlands—churches for which it was very difficult for many years to get ministers, and several of them remained closed for some years after 1843. It must be remembered, too, that the figures quoted represent the number of communicants in each parish, not the number of the congregation. The significance of the distinction between communicants and congregation will be understood by all who know anything of Church life in the Gaelic Highlands. It must not be supposed that there is no Church work done where membership or even congregations are very small. The Church of Scotland is admittedly weak in numbers in the four northern counties. But even in those counties its position has been steadily improving for some years past. Turning again to the Registrar General's statistics, the marriages during the last year for which a Report is published, connected with the Church of Scotland in Caithness were 63 out of a total of 187, in Sutherland 26 out of 72, in Ross and Cromarty 44 out of 285, and in Inverness 112 out of 362. In Argyleshire and Perthshire the Church of Scotland is more influential and numerous than the Free Church. And it is to be remembered with respect to the Highlands that, however small the congregations of the Church of Scotland may still be in some places, there is no sympathy, or very little sympathy, in the Highlands with this movement for Disestablishment and Disendowment. The United Presbyterian Church, which claims to be the most thorough-going representative of the voluntary principle, has almost no place whatever in the Gaelic Highlands. I make out only six congregations in the North Highlands belonging to that Church. The Free Church is the strong Church in that district, but it is the Free Church as founded by Dr. Chalmers and others, holding the principle of National Establishment; and the Marquess of Lorne, when a Member of this House, presented a Petition signed by 51,000 persons belonging to the Free Church in the Highlands against Disestablishment and Disendowment. Now, to have done with this question of statistics, I must notice the extraordinary error, which is unaccountable in a paper emanating from a Council sitting in Edinburgh, as to the number of churches belonging to the various Religious Denominations. The Church of Scotland is represented as having only 1,325 churches; but the fact is that it has 1,330 parish churches alone, 174 non-parochial churches, and 146 mission stations, or a total of 1,650. Then this statement makes a more serious charge against the Church than any I have yet mentioned, with regard to the appropriation of money belonging to the poor. This charge refers to the ordinary church-door collections. These are now applied, since the Poor Law Act was passed, by the Kirk Sessions—the office-bearers of the different parishes—to aiding poor persons, so far as they see fit, and to the general expenses of the Parish Church, so far as not met by the assessment on heritors. A Report by each Kirk Session is annually sent to the Board of Supervision, as is required by statute, but the Board does not interfere with the discretion of Kirk Sessions. The congregations, who give the collections, know perfectly well how the money is expended by the Kirk Sessions, and we know that if it were ordered to be expended in the relief of the poor rate there would immediately be an end to the collections. There is no misappropriation of money where it is applied as the donors understand and intend. This “flagrant misappropriation,” as the statement calls it, is a gigantic mare’s nest. The Established Church is the Church of the poor. The parish minister is there for the purpose of giving his services to rich and poor alike, and the poorest in the congregation have the same claim upon him as the richest. Reference has been made to the public endowments of the Church, and the question has been raised as to whose patrimony these are. They are not the patrimony of the Church, but of the people, but for a particular purpose—for the maintenance of religious ordinances. They represent what has been saved of the endowments of the old pre-Reformation Church, and they are not given now at the expense of anyone. They almost all had their origin in private religious gifts, but they are now given at the cost of no one. The stipends are paid by the heritors not out of their own pockets, but from the teind, which is a burden upon their lands; and so also for the maintenance of the ecclesiastical buildings there is an assessment on the heritors, but it is no grievance to the heritors to pay this, for they inherited or bought their property subject to these burdens. It is the land which provides these endowments. These endowments are not the property of the country as a whole—they are the property of the several parishes; and it would be an injustice to propose to take the endowments of the different parishes and put them into a general fund. The endowments of a parish belong to that parish alone. But it has been asked by the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire (Mr. Esslemont) why have not the holders of these endowments—why have not the parish ministers—divided the endowments with the ministers of new churches built within their parishes? The answer is because the money is not sufficient; the old parish endowment is not more than is necessary for the support of one man. Instead of asking the parish minister to give assistance out of his stipend, the Church has erected new parishes and endowed them by voluntary subscription. Since 1843 there have been 366 parish churches added where they were needed. In most cases new churches have been built; but where there was a church already existing it had to be cleared from all debt, and an endowment found for it. This the Church of Scotland has done by voluntary effort without one farthing of State assistance. It is said this is an argument for voluntaryism, but it is nothing of the kind. This liberality was evoked because of the establishment and endowment principle; because these churches were to be in connection with the Established Church they were founded, and subscribers bestowed their favour on them, and they have given their favour in the form of permanent endowments. Aggression on the part of the Church, then, has been not aggression against its neighbours, but against irreligion. It is said that the Church Interests Committee under my noble Friend Lord Balfour of Burleigh is forcing Disestablishment to the front, but what the Church Interests Committee is doing is only to urge Churchmen to make sure of the sentiments of candidates on this particular question, whatever may be their position as to political parties. Is it not time to do this? Is it not necessary when Home Rule Liberal leaders have agreed that Disestablishment "must be kept in the front rank of the Liberal programme"? I suppose a reference to giving "a new lease of political life to the Tory Party" may account for this Paper not being circulated among hon. Members on this side of the House, and yet I suppose we must not say this is a political movement—this cry for Disestablishment! The plea of religious equality is put forward; and here we leave the field of Scotland for that of the wide world, and come upon really what is the main argument of the opponents of the Church—an argument which is aimed against having an Established Church anywhere. I hope our English friends will take note of this fact. Now, I grant that there cannot be absolute religious equality with an Established Church—because there is necessarily a distinction, whatever it may amount to, between a Church that is recognised and a Church that is not recognised by the State, as the Established Church. But this inequality, although it is inevitable, need not be serious or amount to a grievance to any one. It does not amount to a grievance to any one in Scotland. If there are privileges connected with the Church that press unfairly on non-Established Churches and amount to an injustice, let them be removed by all means; but I know of no such injustice in Scotland. The only thing in Scotland that is a grievance in connection with the Established Church which I can think of at the moment, is the incidence of the ecclesiastical assessment for Church and Manse buildings upon feuars. It is a grievance, because feuars did not expect to be made liable to the assessment. It is only by a comparatively recent decision it is found it must be so. An effort has been made to relieve them of that grievance, without injury to any one, but assistance has not been received from the Opposition. From the way in which the subject of religious equality is sometimes spoken of it would almost appear as if dissenters from the Established Church think it a hardship to be recognised as Dissenters. Now, I do not understand this. They dissent because they are more scrupulous than members of the Church, in their view of some points of doctrine or practice, and they ought not surely to object to this being known. They glory in their position, in one sense, and yet we find them sometimes resenting the recognition of their position. But if we are to have absolute religious equality, a good deal more will have to be done than the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church of Scotland. We have a Protestant Monarchy and a Protestant Constitution. We recognise our National Protestantism as a guarantee to us of our civil and religious liberty. Even our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen are protected in their liberties by our Protestantism. It is in their interest as well as in that of others that our Protestant Constitution be maintained. Our laws, our State, our public life are based on the recognition of the Christian religion; but all this will have to be surrendered if absolute religious equality is to be our guiding principle. If, then, we are not prepared to dispense with an Established Church as connecting the State with Christianity, how does the case stand in Scotland? I put aside, for the moment, all arguments connected with the past—with the historic past—and ask attention to present circumstances alone. This Church has the largest membership of any in Scotland. It represents, both as to religious creed and as to Church government, the opinions of some 80 per cent. of the Scottish people; and it enjoys the acquiescence and goodwill, in its position as an Established Church, of the great body of the people. It is, therefore, not a Church to be disestablished and disendowed. We have arrived this year at the bi-centenary of what is known in Scottish Church history as the Revolution Settlement; surely the occasion is not to be celebrated by passing such a Resolution as the one now before the House!

(10.55.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has thought it worth while to refer to a declaration of mine which I will presently allude to. He has already referred to a declaration made, as he stated, by the electors of Mid Lothian, showing the majority of constituents in that county, which he stated at 67 per cent., to be adverse to the disestablishment of the Scotch Church. If my memory serves me, that declaration did not embrace all the parishes of the county; but certain of those parishes were left out on principles which no doubt approved themselves to the promoters of the declaration. I will not enter upon a discussion of that declaration, because an attempt to appreciate it with exactitude might lead me into invidious remarks. What I say, in answer to my hon. Friend, is that I shall be most happy to answer the electors of Mid Lothian for my conduct in respect to that declaration, and for the vote I am about to give to-night; and not only so, but I shall be thankful to Her Majesty's Government, and to the hon. Member if he uses his influence with Her Majesty's Government in that direction, if they will give me that opportunity at the earliest possible moment. Then the hon. Gentleman will receive the fullest satisfaction, I have no doubt, at all events with regard to that portion of his speech. The speech of the hon. Member has suggested, to my mind, this question—Upon what ground of principle is the Established Church of Scotland defended? The whole of his speech has consisted of observations in detail, showing how respectable and creditable the Church of Scotland is, in the activity and devotion of its members, which no one will dispute, or showing that some particular piece of evidence alleged by the promoters of this Motion is of smaller value than they have esteemed it to be. In point of fact, the hon. Gentleman has not looked at the crop in the field, but at the gleanings he could pick up. He has endeavoured to construct a case out of almost infinitesimal particulars on which to justify the continuance of the national establishment. It was stated, I think well, by my hon. Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire, that the burden of proof in a case of this kind rests with those who maintain the principle of establishment. ["Oh, oh."] Is it not so? ["No, no."] Is it not so? ["No."] Then it is contended that, when one religious body out of a number is invested with exclusive possession of national treasure for the purposes of religious worship, that one privileged religious body is under no obligation whatever to show reasons for the preference. That is the doctrine of those Gentlemen who cry "No." I am not saying whether they show reasons or not; but I am saying it is their duty to show reason. What are the reasons upon which the maintenance of a religious Establishment may be defended? I am not going to argue this question on abstract principles. Many Members of this House lay it down as a first principle of politics that in no case can the maintenance of a religious establishment be defended. I do not intend to argue the question upon that ground, and I leave that principle apart, without either affirming or denying it. I look at this case as a case to be decided upon its own merits with reference to the wants and the circumstances of Scotland. Now, Sir, I ask what are the grounds upon which the existence of a religious establishment can be pleaded? As far as I know they have always been these four—either that the religious establishment was performing some special religious work in the country—for instance, such as the care of the poor—which no other body could perform, or that it was testifying to the maintenance of certain truths and doctrines which no other religious body could so effectually maintain, or that it was the Church to which the decided majority of the people belonged, or, finally, that it was the Church to which either the decided majority of the people belonged, or, even without belonging to it, yet wished to maintain in the position of the National Church Establishment. Those are the arguments which have often been pleaded, and which possibly might prevail with a majority of this House for the maintenance of our interest in a religious establishment. But how can any of those four arguments be maintained in the case of the Church of Scotland? That is the question which I propose to try. It is idle to say that the Church of Scotland is doing good work. It is a body composed of men who, as far as the laity are concerned, may, I believe, bear a fair comparison with the members of other religious communions, and as far as their clergy are concerned, everybody acknowledges the merits of their devotion to their duties; but those qualities the Church of Scotland shares with all the other religious bodies known to exist in Scotland, and consequently they are qualities which form no ground whatever for the preference of an exclusive position. As far as the poor are concerned, in my opinion it would be idle to contend that the Established Church of Scotland was concerned with the poor of that country in any sense except in that important sense in which every religious communion of the country is concerned with them by exercising a most beneficial influence, so that that ground for preference for the Established Church does not exist. Well, Sir, as regards the question of testimony to particular truths, which I refer to rather as what has been historically available in other times than as a topic which would very much avail at the present period. It was greatly urged in the case of the Church of Ireland that it was necessary to maintain it as a protest against the real or supposed influence or the possible influence of the Roman Catholic Church in that country. Now, Sir, is the

Established Church of Scotland to be maintained upon the ground that it is the only and the essential defender of the principles of the Presbyterian religion in Scotland? Why, Sir, it would be ludicrous to adopt such a plea in defence of the Established Church of Scotland. If there are in Scotland to be found those who in a peculiar and pre-eminent sense are the representatives of the Scottish Reformation and its principles, they are to be found, not in the Established Church of Scotland, but in the Free Church of Scotland and in the United Presbyterian body. These are the persons among whom the distinctive principles of the Scottish Reformation are maintained; and I was surprised when I heard the hon. Gentleman opposite quietly stating that the Church of Scotland was really in substantial correspondence with the Church of England as to the position it occupied in the religious world of that country. The hon. Member seems to blot out from his recollection everything that happened between the time of Mary, Queen of Scots, and the time of the Scottish Union. What were the relations between the Presbyterians of Scotland and the representatives of the English Church in Scotland during the reign of Charles II., at the period of the Revolution and at the period of the Union? Why, Sir, the history of this country—a highly honourable history in many respects of free and courageous assertion of conscientious convictions—utterly contradicts the statement of the hon. Gentleman, and testifies to the sharp antagonism which at that period prevailed between the representatives of the Church of England and the genuine and thorough-going Presbyterians of Scotland. I will not enter into the question whether in every case the existence of an Established Church is a grievance to those who do not belong to it; but I am inclined to think it is not altogether unreasonable if the members of the Free Church of Scotland and of the United Presbyterian body regard it as a grievance in Scotland; and on these two specific grounds. In the first place, it is they who went out into the desert, so to speak, relinquishing all the temporal advantages of Establishment, and undertaking all the responsibility at a moment's notice of provision for themselves, not because they differed from the historical basis of that Presbyterian Church, but because they were anxious to maintain it intact in its full force and integrity; and, secondly, because in 1874 a measure was passed in relation to Church patronage the whole effect of which could only be—and I am bound in honesty to say that in my belief the intention only was—to draw back piecemeal and man by man as far as possible from the Free Church and the United Presbyterian body—and from the Free Church particularly—those whom in 1843 they had compelled to undertake the responsibility of provision for themselves. According to modern principles, perhaps the fairest of these arguments to which I have referred for an Established Church is that it is the Church of the decided majority of the people of the country. But is the Presbyterian Church of Scotland the Church of the decided majority of the people?

*MR. J. A. CAMPBELL: Certainly.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Then you maintain that it is certainly the Church of the decided majority?

*MR. J. A. CAMPBELL: Yes.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I admire the boldness of that assertion. I hope the hon. Member will have an opportunity of producing his arguments and proofs; but what I have observed is this: that as we have heard of those who are more Royalist than the King and more Popish than the Pope, so here is a Gentleman, sitting on the benches of this House, who claims for the Established Church of Scotland, and who offers to prove a great deal more than the representatives of that Established Church claim for themselves.

SIR A. CAMPBELL (Renfrew, N.): The Presbyterian Church.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I beg your pardon, I said the Established Church. Surely no hon. Gentleman supposes I am saying the Presbyterian Church is not the Church of the majority. On the contrary, it has been urged that if you accede to the Motion of my hon. Friend you will lay the foundation for reuniting in one religious communion three-fourths of the people of Scotland. Then it is admitted that the Established Church of Scotland is in a minority. ["No."] If it is not admitted by hon. Gentlemen opposite it is admitted by the representatives of the Established Church, who have circulated among us for our information a statement which represents their case, as it was very natural they should represent it, in the most favourable form. What is that statement? It is a statement of the number of marriages according to the rites of the different religious communities in Scotland, and, according to that statement, the marriages performed according to the rites of the Established Church of Scotland are a trifle under 47 per cent. of the whole. I understand the hon. Gentleman to maintain that according to the laws of his arithmetic 47 per cent. is more than 53 per cent. Because, unless that is so, by the assertion of the champions of the Established Church it is the Church of the minority of the population. I am bound to say that, in my opinion, these statistics represent the case too favourably for the Established Church. If the same figures were taken for England I think you would find that between three-fourths and four-fifths of the population appeared by the marriage statistics to belong to the Established Church. Every one knows that marriage statistics represent on behalf of the Established Church more than is her due. It is admitted that the Established Church of Scotland is the Church of the minority. How is it with regard to the fourth of the grounds I have referred to—namely, that although it may not represent the religious convictions and associations of a majority of the population, yet it does represent the wish of a majority of the population that it should be maintained as the Established Church of the country? In my opinion, that is a question which we ought most carefully to examine and probe to the bottom. My noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) was the leader of the Liberal party in 1877, when he used these words in this House, and was received with cheers when he used them:—

"All I can say is that whenever Scotch opinion, or even Scotch Liberal opinion, is fully formed on this subject I think I may venture to say on behalf of the Liberal Party as a whole, that they will be prepared to deal with the question."

After my noble Friend had made that declaration I took an early opportunity of expressing my full concurrence with him in the spirit of that declaration. In the spirit of that declaration I waited until the evidence in the case, according to the best of the powers I had of testing it, should come to be clear and conclusive. I think, Sir, we have now reached that point. I cannot doubt that the declarations of the people of Scotland on this question are sufficient to leave no doubt in the minds of Members of this House, if they believe in the Parliamentary representative system under which the country is governed. It is all very well for the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down to refer to Petitions presented, and to pass by entirely the question what is the sense of the regularly chosen Representatives of the people of Scotland; but I contend that the greatest weight is due to the opinion of Scotland, Constitutionally expressed. It appears to me that whatever view Gentlemen may take of the movement, be it a great or a small one, that now exists in Scotland with the view of establishing what is termed Home Rule in that country, whatever may be the view each individual takes upon it, it ought not to bear upon, and hardly can have a bearing adverse to the Motion of my hon. Friend. If we are favourable to the establishment of Home Rule in Scotland we will vote for my hon. Friend, but if anyone be opposed to the establishment of Home Rule in Scotland, or if anyone desires to suspend his judgment, at any rate until he has full evidence, if he does not desire to stimulate unnaturally and fictitiously the progress of this Home Rule movement in Scotland, the wisest thing he can do is to give large scope and large weight and influence to the answer the Scotch people give in deciding Scotch questions. I am glad to see the Chief Secretary for Ireland in his place, because I wish to make an observation or two upon a speech he made upon this subject on a former occasion. He then brought forward and paraded before us what he thought would be a very effectual bugbear to deter us from the course we wished to pursue. He said—

"If you are prepared to urge that Scotch questions shall be decided according to Scotch opinion, you must be prepared to urge that English questions shall be decided according to English opinion. And if you act on that principle, where will you, the Liberal Party, be then? For since 1868, you have never had a Liberal majority in England."

Such is the statement of the right hon. Gentleman—a most imposing and terrifying statement, most effectual and admirable if it had had the slightest basis in fact. It is the practice of the right hon. Gentleman to assume to be true that which he wishes to be true, unless he happens to know it is false. This is entirely false. He paraded before us this most amazing proposition—that from 1868 onward there had been a majority of English Members opposed to the Liberal cause. How does that stand? It stands thus. Whenever we have had a Liberal majority in the aggregate, we have had a Liberal majority in England also. There have been five elections since that date. In three, there have been Liberal majorities; and in two, Tory majorities. In the Parliament of 1868 there was a Liberal majority, and there was a Liberal majority in England of 42 voices. In the Parliament of 1880 there was a Liberal majority, and there was a Liberal majority in England taken alone of 79 voices. In the Parliament of 1885 again, there was a Liberal majority, and there was a Liberal majority in England of 47 voices. Therefore, Sir, I may say two things. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman little knows the material of which the Liberal Party is made if he thinks that through fear of damage to their Party interests in England they are prepared to impose false principles on Scotland adverse to the fair consideration of their claims. This was an assertion which, if it had been a fact, would, no doubt, have been very telling, but it is pure fiction invented in the ingenious brain of the right hon. Gentleman. Well, that was the case with regard to Liberal opinion in England. What is now the state and what has been the progress of recent opinion in Scotland? The hon. Member who has just sat down says that on account of two Divisions in this House I intend now to cease from the course of abstinence which I pursued in 1886 and 1888, and vote in favour of Disestablishment. It is quite true that I do so intend to vote, but it is not true that I look simply at the fact that there have been two Divisions in this House. Let me point out to the hon. Member that there is a great deal more in the circumstances before us than the mere occurrence of two Divisions. What were these two Divisions, and what are the other signs now before us as to the movement of opinion in Scotland? In the first place I will say it is quite true that, in 1885, a kind of truce was established, and it was understood in the Parliament of that year—so far, at least, as the Metropolis and the metropolitan county were concerned—it was quite understood that the Returns that might be made were not to be taken, so far as some of us, at least, thought, as giving decisive indications in regard to the question of Disestablishment in Scotland. That truce was brought to an end, at least, in my judgment, and I believe in the judgment of many others, by the able action of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Inverness, who declined to recognise the status quo, and brought in a Bill regarded by us as of an aggressive character, thus entirely putting an end to any understanding of that kind. However that may be, with the Parliament of 1885 the whole matter passed away. Since then, it is true, we have had two Divisions, and are to have the third Division to-night. But have we nothing before us but the fact that there have been two Divisions? In the first place we have this—that in both those Divisions a majority of Scotch Members voted in favour of Disestablishment. How do the figures stand? They are capable of being presented shortly and simply. In the Division of 1886 the Scotch Members voting for Disestablishment were 24, those voting against it 16, and 32 were absent. That is to say, that three to two of Scotch Members voted in favour of Disestablishment, and nearly one-half were absent from the Division. That is my case, because my point is this—not only that the opinion of the Constitutional Representatives of Scotland is in favour of Disestablishment, but that it is increasingly in favour of it; that there is a regular and steady movement in Scotland, the evidence of which cannot be mistaken, all tending in that direction. That was in 1886. What happened in 1888? There declared for Disestablishment in the Division of that year 40 Scotch Members, against it 20, and there were absent 12. Instead of there being three to two, the numbers voting in favour of Disestablishment were two to one, and instead of one-half, or nearly one-half, of the Scotch Members being absent, we had exactly only one-sixth of them absent. And then what was the case with the gross majority in this House, composed, I need not say, of English Members, voting down the sense impressed on behalf of Scotland, supported by Wales and by Ireland? The gross majority in 1886 was 112; in 1888 it sank to a majority of 52. Was there no other indication of opinion in Scotland at that time? We have seen that the Scottish majority increased, that the number of Scottish absentees diminished, and that the aggregate majority diminished. Are there no other indications? Yes, the current elections. The hon. Member says there were two elections in Scotland, and desires us from those two Divisions to understand what was the opinion of Scotland. Let him enlarge his vision. Instead of keeping in view the two elections which, as he truly says, have taken place in Scotland, let him take into view the 14 elections which, excluding one or two Ministerial re-elections, constitute, I believe, the whole of the Scottish elections since 1886. Out of these 14 elections, three persons have been returned to vote against Disestablishment and 11 to vote in favour of it, and not accidentally returned to vote in its favour, but when the question has been fully ventilated and discussed and brought in every possible and imaginable form before the Constituencies. I must own that it does appear to me that there is no doubt at all, either about the condition of opinion in Scotland, if we are to adopt the usual constitutional practice of ascertaining what that opinion is, or as to the direction in which that opinion is moving. I think it quite worth while to mention another indication which is to be drawn from the action of Her Majesty's Government themselves, or, at any rate, from the action of the body which the Government has appointed. It will be remembered that we made an endeavour last year to obtain in the Scotch Universities Bill a change in the law with respect to theological tests; that change in the law was refused by Her Majesty's Government, who, notwithstanding, so far recognised the circumstances of the time that they made an arrangement under which a Royal Commission was to be appointed for the consideration of the subject. That Royal Commission has sat, and I believe that it has taken the bulk of the evidence that it is to take. I believe I am not wrong in stating that in Scotland the confident anticipation prevails that the Commission will recommend the abolition or the essential alteration of the theological tests. I mention that, because I do not intend to quote prejudiced opinion on the subject. I only quote what I understand to be the general opinion in Scotland with respect to this question. I only mention that as another indication of the movement in Scotland and the state of Liberal conviction upon this subject. The hon. Gentleman says, "Oh, no, there ought to be a dissolution on the question. There ought to be a specific reference of this question, unmixed with other questions." Now, Sir, is that a rational statement? That is a demand for a dissolution of Parliament, and for an election at which the people are to consider nothing except the question of Establishment in Scotland; 40,000,000 of people inhabiting these islands are to elect a new Parliament and grant a new lease of power for seven years, in order to determine whether in a country in which the voluntary system is more perfectly organised than in any other country, except, perhaps, America, 18,000 people are or are not to continue to enjoy two or three hundred thousand a year! I do not think, when the hon. Gentleman sees his own proposal described in the light of fact, he can suppose it is to be entertained for a moment. We know perfectly well, Sir, what the opinion of the people in Scotland is; and if we believe in Parliamentary Government, if we believe in the representative system—and I do not think there can be any serious doubt as to the hon. Gentleman's belief in them—we must take, and can only take, the deliberate and repeated acts of the legitimately-chosen Representatives of the people as conclusively showing the conviction entertained by the people. I do not believe there ever was a country where the question of Disestablishment is so simple as in Scotland, or where it could be introduced so entirely without shock or serious trouble. The hon. Gentleman said it would be the greatest change since the Union. Now, Sir, I join issue with him on that point, and I claim his assent as a fair-minded man to this proposition—that it would not entail one-tenth of the violence of change that was entailed by the disruption of 1843; 700,000 people in the Church of Scotland, and the majority of ministers at that time, at once abandoned the advantages of Establishment, gave up their churches, gave up their schools, gave up their colleges and their mansees that sheltered their wives and children, and walked out trusting in Providence to find a substitute for them where they could. What violence of change at all to be compared with that would take place in this instance? There may be differences of view as to the spirit in which changes of this kind should be carried into effect, and I have a very decided opinion that they ought to be carried into effect with a considerate and tender hand. I may refer here, I think, to the Disestablishment of the Irish Church. I do not refer to the Act of Disestablishment as it finally passed, because that Act contained concessions to the action of the House of Lords, which certainly upon their own merits I could not then pretend to justify; but I take the Act as it passed this House originally, and I say that that was an example of fair and considerate treatment; and I hope when the time comes, when in some other part of the United Kingdom the same principle may be applied, it may be applied in a similar temper and in a similar spirit. I think equity dictates that method of procedure, and I am quite sure that policy strongly and powerfully recommends it. It is easy to show in abstract argument that those enjoying an exceptional privilege do not derive from that enjoyment any claim for the future; but in this country we have acted in ecclesiastical matters and in all civil matters, in every detail of the Public Service, on the opposite principle, and the possessors of a privilege, when that privilege is recognised as unjust or impolitic, and when accordingly a legislative sentence has been pronounced upon it, have always been considerably and generously treated. What is the case of the Church of Scotland? I believe there is no case so simple as the case of that Church. People talk of separating disestablishment and disendowment; but without disendowment, disestablishment would be an actual shadow. There is no secular power, there is nothing that can be grasped, belonging to the Church of Scotland except the advantages of stipend. I make no doubt that private endowment would be recognised. It would, perhaps, be a generous thing on the part of the Free Church and the United Presbyterians, if they consented to forego a share in the private endowments, given in great part by members of their own body before the Disruption. Although they might in argument make a very fair and legitimate claim to them, I nevertheless believe that the liberal and generous sentiments in favour of actual possession would remain. Then there is another question—the question of the manse and fabrics—and that question is the only one known to me with respect to which even the difficulty of a couple of hours' discussion would be entailed in order to determine what should be done. The House is aware that in Scotland the fee-simple of the manse and ecclesiastical fabrics does not lie with the corporation sole, the parish, or the cathedral. The heritors now possess them, but they can only use them for the purposes of the Church, and if you take them from the heritors it may fairly be said, I think, that the heritors would obtain an immediate and fortunate relief from the contingent demands which are made upon them from time to time for the enlargement of the parochial stipends. That would be a benefit to the heritors, and it might not be inequitable that they should be called upon to surrender their title to the manse and fabrics. If that were done, it might happen, I think, that the House would do in this case what was done in the case of Ireland, and award compensation for these ecclesiastical fabrics to the Church when disestablished, and with regard to the manse, at any rate, some fair and equitable provision should be adopted. There is no sign that a change of this kind would be attended with any difficulties. On the contrary, when it comes it will come through the recognition in this House of what is due to the claims of Scotland—through the recognition of the principle laid down by my noble Friend near me, with regard to which I have no indication as to his intention to act upon it or to cast it behind him. On that subject I have no information, but the principle is a sound, just, and good principle, and I hold myself indebted to my noble Friend for having uttered it. I need only follow him on the path which he has opened for me, and, on the unquestionable evidence which has now been placed before us in the most Constitutional form, I shall be acting upon a moderate application of this principle both of good sense and of justice, to which we must look for the satisfaction and peace of the country and the permanence of its institutions.

(11.42.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of the stage which has now been reached in this question. The right hon. Gentleman has put an end to that long period of doubt and suspense during which it was thought possible to keep the peace between Radicals and good Churchmen. He has now put an end to that period of balanced ambiguity which was the state of the Liberal Party in the last 10 years. He has now taken a step which is irrevocable and irretrievable, and we shall hold him to it. This is no vague and rhetorical attachment to the principle of Disestablishment; he has shown that it is all out and dried, and that we should be the most unreasonable people in the world if we thought that so plain-sailing a question required a dissolution. He said that those enormous masses of people had other things to deal with at an election than such easy operations as this. It is cut and dried, and he has told us that he has so far worked out the problem—worked it out in the dark—that it is a question which would take a couple of hours' discussion, and accordingly the people of Scotland have notice to-morrow morning that their affairs have been settled for them, and that this great question, which would require the most earnest consideration of the nation, is now merely to be put in train when that happy opportunity shall arise. The right hon. Gentleman has discussed the question of Scotch disestablishment for the first time for a great many years on its merits, and he proceeds to call upon the supporters of Scotch Establishment to show cause for the continuance of its existence. Why was not that method of argument adopted until to-night? He has put a number of questions as to whether the Scotch Establishment occupies a peculiar position as to the care of the poor, as to whether it bears testimony to particular truths, and as to whether it is the Church of the majority. All these are old-standing questions. They were present in the General Election in 1880, in which he took so large a part; they were again present in 1885, and not once was this aspect of the question mooted. But, further, the right hon. Gentleman has had occasions for telling the people of Scotland what his views were as to his duty and their duty on the subject. In 1885 he went down to Scotland, and with the greatest amplitude and exactness he defined his position, and I must recall his attention to what he said on that occasion in reference to the mandate which the Parliament of 1885 was to receive on the subject. He says now that he founds upon the legitimate and responsible position of Parliament as constitutionally representing the people of this country on all subjects. But in 1885 he told the people of Scotland that they were safe in sending supporters of Disestablishment to Parliament, because Disestablishment was not to count in Parliament. In those days the Liberal Churchmen took serious alarm, and so many opponents of the Church were being accepted as Liberal candidates that there was a serious revolt in the Church. The right hon. Gentleman went down to Edinburgh and announced that his errand was to procure union in the Liberal Party, and proceeded to point out that there was no reason for the supporters of the Church to feel apprehension on account of the supporters of Disestablishment getting into Parliament, because it was part of the contract that that question would not come on in that Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman said that a Liberal Churchman need not feel that in voting for a Liberal candidate he was in any way voting for the Disestablishment of the Church; and accordingly the right hon. Gentleman is responsible for having taken away the authority of that Parliament upon this particular question, and he is responsible for having made it impossible to quote the opinion of that Parliament on the question of Scotch Disestablishment as showing the wish of the people. But this was no abstract thesis, because that speech of the 11th of November, 1885, is practically a manual of the ethics and rationale of Disestablishment. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to discuss the question of abstract Resolutions, and to discuss, if I may use the paradoxical expression, the concrete case of the present abstract Resolution. He said that in this Parliament, which was thus to be packed with persons who, being themselves Disestablishment Members, were at the same time to represent the Church, he must protest against the idea that he could support an abstract Resolution in a Parliament so constructed, and would repeat the words which he had applied on another occasion to this question of abstract Resolutions—

“Until I am prepared with a plan, and until I see public opinion reach such a point that I can make myself responsible for the plan proposed, and support that plan, I decline to raise false expectations by committing myself to an abstract Resolution.”

[Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite applaud that sentiment. Do they appreciate the point of it? The very reasons which show the importance and significance of supporting an abstract Resolution precluded the right hon. Gentleman and his friends from having anything to do with an abstract Resolution in that Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman says that the state of truce and suspense came to an end with the Parliament of 1885. That is a most astounding proposition. Does the right hon. Gentleman say that any of his candidates in the election of 1886 stood upon the question of Disestablishment? If so, let him name them. But he has not only said that the aspect of affairs was altered in the Parliament of 1886 from what it was in 1885. He has put his finger on an extraordinary reason. He says that when the hon. and learned Member for Inverness brought in a Bill dealing with the spiritual independence of the Established Church of Scotland, that terminated the truce and set free the forces of Disestablishment. The right hon. Gentleman has himself referred—and I make no apology for again referring to it—to the remarkable representation which came from the constituency he honours by representing. The electors of Mid Lothian—I shall not cavil as to whether the percentage was 57 or 67—approached the right hon. Gentleman in 1885 and memorialised him against Disestablishment. He went down for election in 1886 by these men. Did he tell them that the Bill of the Member for Inverness had put an end to his obligation? Never was there a whisper in the County of Mid Lothian, or in any part of Scotland, of that most extravagant and too subtle theory. Why, if I am right, therefore, in saying that no change has taken place in 1886 in the relations of Parliamentary Representatives to their constituents, am I not right, again, in saying that this Parliament stands, in point of authority in respect to Scottish Disestablishment, precisely as its predecessor did? But I go a little further. As a matter of fact, I have defied any Gentleman to point out that he stood in 1886, as contra-distinguished from 1885, on the principle of Establishment.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD: I did, Sir.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Well, the exception, I almost think, in this case will prove the rule. But my challenge is this. Were the constituencies apprised that the great event brought about by the hon. and learned Member for Inverness had altered the relation of Members to their constituencies; and, if so, can any meeting or demonstration be pointed to where that was brought home to the intelligence of the country? There is another reason which I should like, although it may seem invidious, to press on the attention of hon. Gentlemen opposite. In 1886 I did not think it was likely that any fresh test or any fresh trial would be required of the faithfulness or credulity of the constituencies. I think in 1886 it was quite enough that they had their work cut out for them to conciliate opinion in Scotland without adding this further crux of insisting on Disestablishment. But I turn from the consideration of these facts to the position which the right hon. Gentleman has now taken up. He says that he proceeds upon the clear and unequivocal declaration of opinion by the Scottish people which he has now derived. My answer, so far as that goes on the two Divisions in this House, is contained in what I have said. Neither the Parliament of 1885, nor that of 1886, had any authority to pronounce upon that question. Nay, the right hon. Gentleman himself deprived them of that authority. But the right hon. Gentleman says he does not go only on these two Divisions. Look at the other evidence. It is of the most microscopic character. He says the Parliamentary majority has increased. I will tell you why. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government and his Friends did not vote in 1886. Accordingly, the absentees of 1886, released in 1888, to a large extent account for the change. If we are going to examine all this so closely let me point to a significant part of the increased majority. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire voted against Disestablishment in 1886, but for it in 1888. It was thought by the wicked and sceptical that the right hon. Gentleman was a sort of pilot balloon sent up to indicate or ascertain the current of opinion, and, perhaps, to come down and be credited with its direction. The right hon. Gentleman also says, as a reason for the change—“Look at your own proceedings about religious tests in the Act of last year.” The hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow must have heard that with a pang, because one of his complaints was that, by reason of the tests, adherents of the Church of Scotland enjoyed a monopoly, and now the right hon. Gentleman, who hears on good authority that they are to be done away with, says "Here is another reason for the change of my opinion." The right hon. Gentleman has made another statement which deserves the serious consideration of the people of Scotland. He has said that a dissolution is not required for the determination of questions of this kind. I would like to ask what is the reason for the passing of an abstract Resolution if there is not going to be action taken upon it. Is this question intended to have precedence of the Irish question? Are the people of Scotland who have pronounced in its favour to be deprived of its benefit until the Irish question is settled? If so, how long is that to take? Does he think he can do it without a dissolution, beyond the one to which he is looking so anxiously? I protest against political methods which have entangled the people of Scotland into the election of men warranted not to touch this question of Disestablishment, and I protest against the opinion of Scotland being derived from men whose only right as Members is to express their own opinion on this question, and not the opinion of their constituents. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has discussed this question on its merits. May I ask the House what impression the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman have made upon those who have considered this question time out of mind, and who want to know whether anything new has occurred to warrant this great proposed change in the State? Take any date you like. I will take that which the right hon. Gentleman has so often referred to, namely, the date of the Disruption in 1843. If ever the Church of Scotland was weakened to a point at which its continued existence as an Establishment might well be questioned, that was the time. But every decade has added to its strength and popularity. Reference has been made to the Highland counties, and figures, often before paraded, have once more done duty to show the smallness of the congregations of the Establishment in those districts. But in these counties there is no grievance, because the people are all in favour of the Establishment, and resist and resent proposals such as are being made to-night. Moreover, these counties do not represent the main current of life and energy in Scotland. In the places to which you would turn for the tests and signs of national preference—places such as Glasgow and the towns around it—you find the Established Church accommodating itself to the requirements of the people, enjoying their confidence, and obtaining their increased support. Let me raise another test. What is the attitude of the Established Church towards other Religious Bodies, and the attitude of the people generally towards the Church? The ministers of the Established Church are popular and leading men, well received by their coadjutors in the Dissenting Bodies, and it must be a keen nose for jealousy and ecclesiastical rivalry which would discover in Scotland anything like a standing grievance arising from the usefulness or influence of the ministers of the Established Church. These are all subjects upon which it would be easy to dilate. I do not think it necessary to do so, but I ask the House to consider one question which is of paramount importance. Hon. Gentlemen speak of money being confined to one denomination instead of being devoted to purposes of public utility. But what are the purposes of public utility which the people of Scotland would prefer to the present application of these funds? The Church never occupied a better position for defence than at the present time. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian is a profoundly experienced politician, and he, no doubt, knows what are the political interests and probable results of his present move, but if the Church of Scotland is to be made one of the objects of his threats like the educated class, or like those other enemies whom he has made for himself, then I think he will find a large and substantial decline from the sympathy and admiration which have hitherto been given to him. The people of Scotland have so high an opinion of the right hon. Gentleman that they think he may be safely trusted with a matter of Home Rule for Ireland, about which they know comparatively little, but I do not believe that he will find in Scotland—and he has not found in his own constituency—people who are so credulous as to think that he knows more about the Church of Scotland than they do. That is one of the subjects upon which, as he has himself said, the people of Scotland have thought much and have their own strong opinions. He must take the consequences of the move which has been made to-night. So far as we are concerned, we shall welcome the opportunity of taking charge—now the sole charge—of the defence of the Church of Scotland. We shall be able to point out to the people of Scotland that if they choose to support the right hon. Gentleman and his candidates they are, with their eyes open, assisting in the destruction of their own Church. And the question which they will prefer, when it comes to that, is one that will be seen at the next election if the right hon. Gentleman will take great pains to employ as much of his eloquence and his energy in pressing that question upon the attention of the people of Scotland as he does the Irish question. As I have said, we will accept most cheerfully the defence of the Church of Scotland. We will do so not because it requires political or partisan support, but merely because in this instance we shall identify ourselves with one of the deepest and most permanent attachments of the Scottish people. For my own part, speaking not only to this House, but, as far as I can, to the people of Scotland, I denounce the manoeuvre which we are witnessing as an attempt to destroy the Scottish Church behind the backs of the Scottish people.

*(12.12.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I do not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate has in the least exaggerated what has taken place to-night. The gauntlet has been thrown down and it has been taken up, and the Lord Advocate will find at the next General Election that when we come to fight this battle there will be no defection or division in the Liberal ranks. I will tell him what may explain the change in things which has occasioned him so much surprise. There has been a distinct advance in the position of the Liberal Party, because the Tory Party has made the question of the Establishment the stalking-horse on which to fight political battles. In Scotland the Tory Party and membership of the Established Church are by no means convertible terms. One of the most remarkable features in the history of the Scottish Church is that so many persons of the greatest social distinction have passed from the Church of their forefathers over to the alien creed of this country. In Scotland we know a good deal about each other. It is a small country, and we know that many of the most prominent defenders of the Established Church in the Conservative Party have nothing whatever to do with the Established Church. Rumour would even have it that in that ecclesiastical edifice of which the Lord Advocate to-night has proved himself so powerful a prop, even the right hon. Gentleman himself occupies the position of a buttress rather than of a pillar. The Lord Advocate laughs at the notion that the Bill of the hon. Member for Inverness has had anything to do with the change which has taken place in the action of Scotch Members on this question between 1885 and 1886. Well, I will give him an illustration with which I am most familiar. I will take the case of my own constituency—and I refer to it not because of anything striking or peculiar there, but because it illustrates the course I and the hon. Member for Lanarkshire found ourselves compelled to take in the election of 1886. In 1885 we of the Liberal Party were desirous to avoid raising this question, and to reserve our energies for other purposes. I, for one, stood as distinctly for Disestablishment as at the present time, but I was willing to accept the suggestion of the leader of my Party that the question should be put out of the range of practical politics for the time being. But I and other Members of the Party found that the Tory Party were pushing this question to the front. In Haddingtonshire there are 25 Established Church ministers. Of those I had the distinguished honour to receive the genuine opposition of 23 in 1885. In 1886 things had progressed. There were still 25 ministers of the Established Church there, but instead of having the determined opposition of 23 in this county, which embraces a large number of supporters of the Established Church, and is, or was, largely Liberal, I had the determined opposition of the whole 25. The constituency was still one in which there was a large Liberal majority. I found it was no use trying to keep this question out any longer. Therefore, I did what 20 others of my Colleagues did in Scotland, I declared that I would have no more parleyings about this question, and would stand as an out and out opponent to the principle of Establishment in Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate asks what it was in the Parliament which was elected in 1885 and sat in 1886 which brought this question on. Does the right hon. Gentleman forget that in the debate during that Session, on the Motion of the hon. Member for the College Division, the action of the hon. Member for Inverness was alleged as a reason for raising the question? The change is due almost entirely to the exertions of the Tory Party, who have sought to make political capital out of a cause they have not really at heart. I do not desire to approach this question in any sense of hostility to the Church of Scotland. I come to debate it on general grounds. We sit in Parliament as politicians, and we are here to say whether or not, in the existing state of things in Scotland, there is a title to maintain the Established Church any longer. It is not enough to support the proposition with which the Lord Advocate has associated himself to-night, to show, as the hon. Members for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen sought to show, that the Church of Scotland is in a prosperous and flourishing condition. It is not even enough to show that it has increased in its Membership and vitality, because it may well happen that there has been a change of mind amongst the people which makes an Establishment a thing which no longer requires to be maintained. There is a difference between different cases.

Mr. Haldane

There is no analogy between the circumstances of England and Scotland, because in Scotland the Established Church is after all but a sect; and the proposition which I maintain is, that there has been such an advance in the condition of affairs in Scotland, that there have been such changes in the circumstances of the country, that the Established Church is not only no longer needed there, but has become an anachronism. There are, at least, two other Religious Bodies in Scotland on the same level, socially, intellectually, and spiritually influential as the Church of Scotland—putting out of question the large and growing body of Episcopalians. There are the United Presbyterian and the Free Church denominations, which are in the same position as regards their ministers and members as the Established Church. No one knows Scotland better than the Lord Advocate, and I challenge him to rise and say whether there is a difference between the status of those who belong to the Established Church and those who belong to the other two Churches of Scotland? Take the case of Glasgow. There the wealthiest citizens are United Presbyterians. In Edinburgh a large proportion of influential citizens are members of the Free Church. Then as to intellectual status, the United Presbyterian and Free Churches occupy positions in no way different from that of the Establishment; and we cannot forget that they have had their Chalmers, Cunninghames, Capdlis, and hosts of other great men. You can match every great name in the Establishment, with one as great from either of the other two bodies. Men go indifferently into either of the three Churches, and it has been so for years past. Then, as to the spiritual question, does anyone who knows the work that the United Presbyterian and Free Churches are doing maintain that it is less spiritual than that of the Establishment? There is, at least, as great earnestness in what are technically the Dissenting Bodies of Scotland as in the Established Church. We have been told we ought to lay great stress on the fact that numerically the strength of the Established Church is greater than that of the other bodies. Deducting the Highland population, and that very large and fluctuating body of persons who belong to the Established Church because it is more convenient to call themselves something than to call themselves nothing, there is no numerical majority of the Church of Scotland. I say that in the circumstances which exist in Scotland there is nothing to warrant the continuance of the present state of things. We are asked to take some plébiscite of the people of Scotland. I know nothing of plébiscites, and they are un-Constitutional. We have heard to-night from the lips of the leader of the Liberal Party what are the proper means to be pursued to ascertain the wishes of the people of Scotland. This question, we have been told, will be put in the fore front of the programme of the Liberal Party, and by that declaration we mean to stand or fall.

* (12.20.) THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, Rossendale): Perhaps, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) has referred to a declaration which I made on this subject, and given some prominence to it, I may be allowed to say a few words. I entirely concur with previous speakers that it is very difficult to overrate the importance of the declaration which has been made this evening. I look upon it as important from many points of view, and not, perhaps, as most important from the point of view of the future position of the Scotch Church. Although the question has entered to-night on a new phase, I think that, as far as the fortunes of the Scotch Church are concerned, it will be extremely probable that many years may elapse and many Parliaments may come and go before the Liberal Party, committed as it has been to-night by the majority of the Liberal Party to the principle of Disestablishment, will find their time sufficiently unoccupied to permit them to deal with the question. But although I do not, therefore, think it is a matter of very urgent and pressing importance as regards the future of the Scottish Church, it is, no doubt, a matter of much more urgent importance concerning the position of a considerable number of Scotch Members. And, although, no doubt, the Party managers of the majority of the Liberal Party have charitably supposed that this change of front will place the Liberal Unionist Party in a most embarrassing position, still, from information which has reached me, I do not think it is altogether impossible that even some Members belonging to the majority of the Liberal Party representing Scottish counties may find their own position somewhat more embarrassing. Therefore, it is not altogether exclusively from a Party point of view that I regret the new position which has been taken up in this matter by my right hon. Friend. During the short period when I had the honour of being the leader, or, at all events, the nominal leader, of the Liberal Party, although I gratefully acknowledge the kind and generous and abundant assistance which on many occasions I received from my right hon. Friend, it cannot be any matter of surprise that occasionally upon some subjects I found him a somewhat unruly follower. On some questions of considerable importance, such as the question of Foreign Policy which arose at that time, we sometimes found some difficulty in reconciling our opinions, but upon this question of Disestablishment in Scotland up to the present moment I have found my right hon. Friend the most exemplary follower. The statement which I publicly made, now, I think, 12 years ago, and which has been repeated to-night with perfect accuracy by my right hon. Friend, has been found by the Liberal Party in Scotland to be a most convenient declaration. I must admit it was somewhat wanting in completeness, because when we professed, as we did honestly profess, that our sole desire was to be guided in this matter by the opinion of a majority of the Scottish people, we did not accurately define how the opinion of that majority was to be ascertained. I have always thought myself, and I think that up to a very recent time my right hon. Friend agreed with me, that if a large Scottish majority formed a very strong and decisive and resolute opinion upon this subject they would find in some manner or another the means of expressing that opinion, and of communicating it to a British Parliament. Those means have not been found, and if it is still a subject for discussion, a subject open to doubt or even to argument, whether the majority of the Scottish people are, or are not, in favour of the principle of disestablishment, I think, that fact in itself shows that up to the present time there is no strong opinion on the part of a large majority urgently demanding the Disestablishment of the Scottish Church. My right hon. Friend has told us to-night that he has found the answer to the question as to the opinion of the Scottish people in the votes given from time to time upon this Resolution by the Members for Scottish constituencies.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: And otherwise.

*THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Well, the main test has been the votes given on this Resolution. I admit that is one test, but it is not altogether a completely satisfactory test, and could not be under any circumstances. Above all, it could not be a satisfactory test unless the hon. Members who gave their votes were elected—I will not say exclusively, but to a very considerable extent—with a view to the consideration of this question. I do not say that it was necessary that the elections should have turned exclusively upon the question of the Disestablishment of the Church, but what I do say is that to render the test of any value whatever it is necessary that this question should have been distinctly and prominently placed before the constituencies when the hon. Members whose opinions are to influence the judgment of this House were elected. The right hon. Gentleman has done the very utmost that lay in his power to prevent this question from being placed in a definite manner before the people of Scotland, so as to render their votes at the last election a test with regard to it. Reference has been made to-night to the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman in the Mid Lothian campaign. I have referred to them myself to-day, and I find in them the most passionate appeals to the Liberal portion of the Scotch constituencies not to permit this question of Disestablishment to exercise any prominent influence on the decision which they were going to form, but that Liberal candidates should be elected altogether irrespective of the opinions for or against Disestablishment. If that be the case, and if the advice of the right hon. Gentleman had any effect, as I suppose it had, on the election of 1885, can it be argued that the election of 1886 turned more than that of 1885 upon the subject which we are now discussing? We know that in 1886 there was one subject brought prominently before the constituencies of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the exclusion of any other, and it is idle to suppose that the advice given to the electors by the right hon. Gentleman in 1885 was absolutely disregarded in 1886 in the face of the more pressing and important question that was placed before them. I do not find, therefore, in either of the elections, or in any of the votes that have been given in this House upon this question any satisfactory reason why we should suddenly abandon the position which I ventured to take up more than 10 years ago, when I was supported by my right hon. Friends near me, as, indeed, I was only five years ago. I do not pretend to have any strong opinion upon this question myself. I do not profess to have even a superficial acquaintance with the most elementary of the arguments which can be used upon the subject on its merits, because I have not given it any careful attention, but I am as ready now as I was 12 years ago to do the best I can to carry into effect the strong wishes, plainly expressed, of the majority of the Scotch people, whenever we can ascertain authoritatively what those wishes are. It has seemed to me, however, from the very slight attention that I have been able to give to the subject, that the difference between the various divisions of the Churches in Scotland are so comparatively slight, that the attachment felt to the Established Church of Scotland is so strong, and that the conscientious objections which are felt to endowment or to State connection are in comparison so weak, that it is a somewhat extraordinary thing that some method has not yet been discovered by which a re-construction and reform of the Scotch Established Church might be devised, which might bring together all the sections of the Scotch Religious Bodies without resorting to the extreme method of Disestablishment. Bearing in mind the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, which has been referred to to-night, with regard to abstract Resolutions, we are bound to assume that the right hon. Gentleman, before expressing the opinion which he has expressed to-night, has not only satisfied himself that the majority of the Scotch people are ardently in favour of Disestablishment, but has also satisfied himself as to the means by which that Disestablishment is to be carried out, and also that he has satisfied himself that no other method of reform and re-construction is possible short of the extreme method of Disestablishment. Well, Sir, my right hon. Friend has satisfied himself of all these things, but we do not know by what process he has arrived at his opinion; we do not know in detail what are the conclusions at which he has arrived. We have only been told to-night that the Disestablishment of the Scotch Church is a comparatively simple matter, and there is only one question that would give rise to any protracted consideration; but I venture to say that there are very few Members on this side of the House who have the slightest conception what would be the lines on which a measure of Disestablishment and Disendowment would be framed. Before we are asked to commit ourselves finally to a policy of Disestablishment and Disendowment I say it would be decent, at all events, that we should know upon what lines a measure is to be framed. Perhaps my right hon. Friend takes a somewhat less exalted view of the character of an abstract Resolution than he did a few years ago. Perhaps these abstract Resolutions, after all, are only a mode of arriving at that which we all want to know—namely, the opinion of the Scotch constituencies. They have been so used on the occasion of two previous Divisions. This Division will probably be another proof of the growing opinion of Scotland upon this subject. If that is the view we are to take of the votes given upon these abstract Resolutions, what is the position of my right hon. Friend in that case? These abstract Resolutions, we are told, are a means of arriving at the opinions of Scotch constituencies. What, I ask, is the opinion of Mid Lothian? The opinion of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has been given to-night, not on account of any knowledge which he has of the opinions of the voters of Mid Lothian, but because, he has told us so himself to-night, a majority of Scotch Members for other constituencies have on previous occasions voted for this Resolution. It has been said to-night, and I have heard it previously, that a requisition was presented—[Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: No, not a requisition"]—well, that a representation, signed by a considerable number—I have been told by a majority—of the constituents of my right hon. Friend, was presented to him begging him not to vote for the Resolution of the hon. Member for Glasgow. Has my right hon. Friend arrived at any opinion, formed any judgment—has he been able to form any judgment whether the opinion of his Mid Lothian constituents has changed on this subject? If the opinion of the Member for Mid Lothian carries no more authoritative representation of the views of his constituents than it has been shown to do, on what grounds are we to assume that the votes of other Scotch Members indicate the views of their constituents? I will only say that in the vote I shall give to-night, and which I believe some of my friends will give, we shall not be asserting that, in our opinion, the Scotch Church requires neither re-construction nor reform. Many of us believe that it does eminently require reform, and some of us believe that a re-construction of the Scotch Church, which should include other sections that are now outside its pale, is not beyond the limits of possibility. We shall certainly not be voting that an indefinite continuance of the present state of things is either requisite or desirable. We shall not be voting against a reform of the Scotch Establishment, and above all we shall not be asserting that it is necessary permanently to maintain the Scotch Establishment if it should be found that reform of that Establishment and re-construction of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland is an impossibility, and that no other solution will satisfy the settled desires and wants of the majority of the Scottish people.

(12.45.) MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh), (who was received with loud cries of "Order, order!"): I rise to say a few words on this question, which may be of no importance to hon. Members who sit below the Gangway [Cries of "Divide!"] When I rise to say a few words upon a question which is of supreme importance to the Scottish people I am met with the jeers of hon. Members. I mean, however, to protest, not merely against the decision that is to be arrived at, but also against the method in which the decision is being arrived at. At the last General Election in Scotland the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian declared over and over again that the question of Scottish Disestablishment was hardly ripe for Parliamentary discussion; but now he comes down to the House and supports the Resolution of my hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron). [Cries of "Divide!"] I am determined to have my say on this question. I am here as a Scottish Member entitled to take part in this Debate. I maintain that the manner in which the subject has been brought forward shows that no consideration has been paid to public opinion in Scotland. Hon. Members are invited to arrive at a momentous decision upon a matter which if taken in hand at all ought to be taken in hand by a responsible Minister, and to arrive at such a decision upon an Amendment to the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair. The question has not been discussed by anything like a proper number of Scottish Members; and when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian says that the feeling of the Scottish people is in favour of Disestablishment, and when he founds that statement upon the fact that on one occasion in this House a Resolution in favour of Disestablishment was carried, I ask him to consider his own remarks in reference to the weight attaching to that very Resolution. In November, 1885, the right hon. Gentleman said that the Resolution then proposed, which was the same as that now brought forward by the hon. Member for the College Division, would not be accepted as conclusive with regard to the possible opinion of the people of Scotland on the question. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that a long series of such Resolutions would be necessary, and yet he now supports the proposal on Party grounds and without discussing its merits. Liberals in Scotland have in the past been decided on this question, and they will remain decided. Many people in Scotland who a few years ago were in favour of Disestablishment are now animated by a desire to re-construct and reform the Church for the benefit of the Scottish people.

(12.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 256; Noes 218.—(Div. List, No. 69.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

It being after One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at five minutes after One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 5th May, 1890.

The Lord Bishop of EXETER—Took the Oath for the first time.

SWEATING SYSTEM.

Message from the Commons for Fifth Report, &c., of the Select Committee: Ordered to be communicated accordingly.

METROPOLITAN HOSPITALS, &amp;c.

The evidence taken before the Select Committee from time to time to be printed for the use of the Members of this House: but no copies thereof to be delivered except to Members of the Committee until further order. (No. 69.)

HERRING FISHERY (SCOTLAND) ACT (1889) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 55.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, this Bill has reference to one matter, and one matter only, namely, the amount of the penalties which are exigible under the Herring Fisheries Acts for breaches of the bye-laws of the Scotch Fishery Board. This Bill proposes to restore the amounts of those penalties to the same figure at which they stood prior to the Act of 1889. The Herring Fisheries Act (Scotland), 1889, made certain enactments with reference to penalties, but in the same clause reserved all powers relating to the Scotch Fishery Board. But in construing the various Acts, the Scotch Judges have held, notwithstanding the proviso that the amount of the penalties exigible has been affected by the Act of 1889. This Bill has, therefore, been introduced for restoring the powers which existed under the Act of 1885, and which were supposed, until the decision which I have referred to, still to exist. The words are identical with the language of the Act of 1885, and I move that the Bill be read a second time.

VOL. CCCXLIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: To which Committee does the noble Earl propose that it should be referred?

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: To the General Committee.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for General Bills.

House adjourned at twenty five minutes before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 5th May, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

LEAD POISONING.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the attention of the Board has been directed to the extensive prevalence of lead poisoning in Sheffield and the surrounding districts, due to the drinking water, and affecting about 1,000 persons, as reported in the British Medical Journal of April 26th; and whether he proposes to order an inquiry by the Board into the circumstances, and the best means of remedying them?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have received a communication from the Town Clerk of Sheffield, from which it appears that a Committee, which included Professor Dewar, Dr. Bristowe, and Mr. Hawkesley, was appointed by the Town Council to consider the extensive prevalence of lead poisoning in Sheffield and the surrounding districts due to the drinking water, and that the remedy recommended by that Committee has been adopted by the Town Council. The results as regards the improvement of the water supply are stated to have been decidedly beneficial, and the Town Council hope that a complete remedy will be provided.

THE TOWER ARMOURY.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can explain why the armour in the Tower, which is at present crowded into so small a space as to interfere with its being seen, has not been moved into the two large halls which have been decorated and prepared to receive part of it for a very long time; and whether, if the delay is due to want of money, he will consider the advisability of employing the money paid by visitors in defraying the expense necessary to do justice to the collection?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): To carry out the improvement referred to would involve an expenditure of £1,000 at least; and the money has not hitherto been available. To divert to this purpose the fees paid by visitors, which are now taken in aid of the Vote, would merely have the effect of adding the amount to the Vote required. I shall be exceedingly glad when it is possible to carry out this national work, because I regard it personally as one of great interest and importance.

APPEALS FROM SCOTCH COURTS.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate by what authority, statutory or otherwise, the House of Lords, subsequent to the passing of "The Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876," changed their previous uniform practice of not allowing costs to appellants from the Scottish Courts?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I understand this question to be put to me as to a matter of fact regarding Scotch practice, and I answer it upon that footing. There is no statute upon the subject, the present practice, like the former, being, of course, referable to the inherent jurisdiction of the House. The modern practice is in accordance with that of all other Courts.

NEYLAND STATION, PEMBROKESHIRE.

MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardigan-shire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, on 12th April in this year, a telegraph boy named Mackan was knocked down and injured by an engine on the sidings near the fish stage on the premises of the Great Western Railway Company at their station at Neyland, Pembrokeshire; whether this accident happened at or near to the place at which, on 22nd April, 1887, a boy named Rees was run over by an engine and killed; whether his attention has been called to the Report of Colonel Rich (dated 22nd July, 1887), after an inquiry held by him on behalf of the Board of Trade into the circumstances which attended the death of Rees, in which he states that the railways and station yard of the Great Western Railway Company at Neyland were in a most dangerous state, and recommended, amongst other things, that the Company be urged to build a footbridge for the safety of their own servants and of the numerous labourers employed at the station, as well as of the public at large; whether there are now several hundreds of persons employed at the fish stage at Neyland; whether the Railway Company have neglected or refused to carry out Colonel Rich's recommendations; and whether the Board of Trade will take any steps for the protection of life and limb at this station, and in furtherance of the measures urged on the attention of the Company by Colonel Rich?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have received from the Company a statement signed by the boy MacKeen, from which it appears that he was not struck by the engine, but having crept under the ticket platform in taking a short cut across the Neyland Station Yard, he drew back suddenly on seeing the approaching engine and struck his forehead against the woodwork of the platform, slightly cutting his face. This occurred about 50 yards from the spot where the fatal accident happened in April, 1887. The Board of Trade have no power to compel the Company to erect a bridge; but negotiations with this object are being conducted, which I hope will end in the removal of the danger at present existing, and I understand that the Company are making considerable alterations in their Neyland Station, which will, I hope, when completed, go far to meet the other recommendations contained in Colonel Rich's Report.

SERGEANT MAJOR HOLMES.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, with regard to a reply given by the late Secretary of State for War to a question asked on 6th September, 1886, respecting the circumstances attending the death of Troop Sergeant Major Holmes, of the 7th Hussars, whether, when the charge of dishonesty was brought forward against the late Troop Sergeant Major Holmes, the books, which would have substantiated such charges were found to have been destroyed, and could not be produced to satisfy his widow and other relatives as to his indebtedness; why it is that, when the late Sergeant Major Holmes died with a clean defaulters' sheet, together with the highest testimonials as to efficiency, sobriety, and honesty from his Commanding Officers, and the War Office Authorities having officially stated that no debts could be proved against him, the charges of drunkenness, inefficiency, and dishonesty have not been publicly withdrawn; and whether, in consequence of the official letters which have since been written to Mrs. Holmes, which show that these charges have since been found to have been unjustly made, he is now prepared to publicly withdraw them, and to inquire into the conduct of those who are responsible for their having been made?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There is no knowledge in the War Office of any books having been destroyed; and having carefully considered all the evidence adduced in this painful case, I am bound to say that the answer given by my predecessor was correct; at the same time, I have no hesitation in saying that the irregularities in the conduct of the Sergeant Major—who undoubtedly did good and gallant service in Egypt—arose after, and were probably consequent on, a severe attack of sunstroke from which he suffered.

MR. M. CAMERON: Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to the fact that the jury in their verdict distinctly stated that death had been caused by the worry to which this unfortunate man had been subjected; and if he is further aware that all the commanding officers under whom he served bore testimony to his high character for honesty and sobriety?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: With regard to the last question, I believe that Sergeant Major Holmes had previously borne an excellent character.

MR. M. CAMERON: I beg to give notice that, in consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I will bring the subject before the House on the Estimates.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION TO CHINA.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): I had given notice of my intention to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that a Telegraphic Convention between the Chinese Government and certain British and Foreign Telegraph Companies has lately been signed, and whether the ratification by the British Government is sought by the interested parties; whether this Convention would fix the charge for telegraphic communications to China for a long period of years, so as to preclude competition with existing cables and land lines during that time; and whether Her Majesty's Government will lay the proposed Convention (terms of which are known in this country, but which have so far been kept secret) upon the Table of the House before its ratification? At the request of the right hon. Gentleman I beg to postpone the question until Monday.

SMUGGLING AT GIBRALTAR.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether there are any negotiations on foot between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Spain, with the object of putting a check to smuggling at Gibraltar by interfering with the freedom of trade?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): No further negotiations have taken place since I answered a question on this subject by the hon. Member two years ago. I may add that smuggling by land has diminished of late, owing to additional regulations which have been made.

VACCINATION OF PUPIL TEACHERS AT LEICESTER.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, whether he will re-consider the practical difficulty in which the School Board for Leicester is placed, by the impossibility of securing a sufficient number of candidates for the position of pupil teacher who can produce a certificate of vaccination; and whether the Department is compelled by law to make such a certificate a condition of its approval of candidates; if so, by what law; and, if not, whether he will consider the hardship inflicted thus on candidates over 14 years of age who are outside the scope of the Vaccination Laws?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am not aware that there is any difficulty in procuring a certificate of vaccination at Leicester, if the proper medical authority is applied to; and the hon. Member must see that it would be highly inexpedient for the Department to relax a rule of great importance to the health of the children in elementary schools, because of the unfortunate attitude towards compulsory vaccination taken up by the inhabitants of Leicester.

In reply to a further question by Mr. PICTON,

*SIR W. HART DYKE said: The Department is perfectly within its right in demanding a certificate. I cannot otherwise answer the question of the hon. Gentleman than by saying that if a candidate refuses to produce a certificate of vaccination he cannot be appointed.

*MR. PICTON: Is the Department compelled by law to demand a certificate? [Cries of "Order!"] I think I have a right to ask the question.

No reply was given.

REGIMENTAL CANTEENS.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War is it a fact that the canteens attached to regiments are open for the sale of malt liquors to the troops every day of the week from 12 a.m. till 9.30 p.m.; whether soldiers are permitted to treat civilians to drink at these canteens, and to buy drink for consumption without the precincts of the military barracks; and whether, having regard to the tendency of recent legislation to limit the hours during which the traffic in drink can be carried on, he will take any steps for placing some restrictions on the sale of drink within barracks to Her Majesty's troops?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Canteens are open for the sale of malt liquors to the troops every day of the week from 12 a.m. to 9.30 p.m. Civilians are not allowed in a canteen at hours prohibited by the Licensing Act in force at the place, and at other times only by permission of the commanding officer. They cannot themselves make purchases in a canteen; but a soldier is permitted to treat a civilian friend. The soldier may not buy drink at a canteen for consumption outside the barracks. I have already informed the House that I propose, on the Barracks Bill, to explain the measures we are adopting for the promotion of temperance in the Army.

BRITISH GUIANA.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is now in a position to inform the House if the Secretary of State has decided upon a scheme of Constitutional Reform for the colony of British Guiana; whether the old Dutch institution, in operation before the colony became British, of selection by means of a College of Keizers, consisting of seven life members, is to be abolished, and direct representation by ballot substituted; whether any extension of the franchise is to take place; whether he has decided as to the number of elective members to be appointed by the inhabitants of the colony; and whether he can give any further information with regard to the proposed scheme of reform?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government have decided upon some points in a scheme of reform of the Constitution of British Guiana; but other points are still under discussion with the Colonial Government, and the Secretary of State is not prepared to state the nature of the proposed reforms until the scheme is completely settled.

MALTESE MARRIAGES.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table of the House copies of the Despatch of Sir Lintorn Simmons to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, dated the 18th January, 1890, and of the two enclosures accompanying such Despatch, and of any other correspondence with the Vatican relating to the validity of the marriages of Her Majesty's subjects which have been, or may hereafter be, celebrated in Malta?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Papers will be laid relating to the Mission of Sir L. Simmons to the Vatican which will include the Despatch referred to and its enclosures.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the Despatch will be laid upon the Table?

BARON H. DE WORMS: As soon as possible.

LEEDS ASSIZES.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the late Civil Assizes at Leeds having ended on the 1st of April last another Civil Assize has been fixed at Leeds for the 10th of May; whether, during the last few years, three Civil Assizes have been held at Leeds during five months and none during the rest of the year; whether the Corporation of Leeds, the Leeds Chamber of Commerce, and the Leeds Law Society more than a year ago made representations to the Lord Chief Justice of England disapproving of the present arrangement of the Civil Assizes at Leeds; and whether complaints have reached him that the absence of a Judge from London at these Assizes seriously interferes with the trial of London actions?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The Civil Assizes have been held during the last few years during the Hilary, Easter, and Trinity sittings, and not during the Michaelmas sittings. I am not aware whether representations have been made disapproving of the present arrangements; but the power of alteration does not lie with the Lord Chief Justice. The absence of a Judge must always interfere with trials in London; but certainly less at this time than at any other. Under the present arrangements only four Judges are absent at this time of the year, instead of nine as heretofore. I am informed by the Lord Chancellor that he has the subject under consideration, and is at this very moment in communication with the Judges with the view of determining the most convenient time for holding the Civil Assizes at Leeds.

THE NEW CODE.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he will furnish the House estimates of (1) the number of day schools; (2) the number of children on the registers of such day schools as will be benefited by the adoption of the New Code and the New Code Bill now before the House; and what is the estimated total cost of the increased grants, in addition to the ordinary grants and in addition to any special Parliamentary grant made under Section 19 of the Act of 1876?

SIR W. HART DYKE: So far as can be estimated from the data at my disposal considerably more than half of the Departments of Schools for older scholars will be benefited pecuniarily by the New Code; but it will be my duty, in explaining that document and the Bill in connection with it, to give the House the fullest information in my power upon the points to which my right hon. Friend has referred.

DUTIES ON MARINE INSURANCE.

MR. MUNDELLA: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has received a Memorial from Marine Underwriters, praying for the abolition of the existing Stamp Duties upon Marine Insurance; and whether, having regard to the injury inflicted upon marine insurance business by the retention of the Stamp Duty, and to the fact that many insurances are effected with Foreign Companies on the Continent in consequence, he can see his way to place insurance of property at sea on the same footing as the insurance of the same property on land?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I have received such a Memorial. I do not deny that there is some force in the contention of the Memorialists; but looking to the many claims for remission of taxation with which I had to deal, I did not see my way to accede to the wish of the Underwriters.

LOCAL MARINE BOARD AT CARDIFF.

SIR EDWARD REED (Cardiff): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received from Cardiff the Resolution passed at a very large and influential meeting in that town in favour of the prompt establishment there of a Local Marine Board, to facilitate the enormously increased marine business of Cardiff and other ports in South Wales and Monmouthshire; and, if so, whether, in view of the urgent importance of the matter, he will be able to give it his prompt and favourable consideration?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir. I have received the Resolution referred to, and I am giving the matter my most earnest consideration.

THE PLATE DUTY.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the abolition of the Plate Duty will carry with it the abolition of the Plate Licence; and, if so, at what date will the licence cease?

*MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir; it is not intended that the abolition of the Plate Duty will carry with it the abolition of the Plate Licence.

THE NEW COINAGE.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the new coinage, if, in view of the maintenance of the Union, he will re-consider his intention of substituting for the arms of the three Kingdoms the St. George and the Dragon, which is an emblem of one Kingdom only?

*MR. GOSCHEN: No; I cannot undertake to abandon the St. George and the Dragon. It is sanctioned by tradition and recommended by the great beauty of the design.

Mr. Mundella

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to give notice that I will take the earliest opportunity of calling attention to this subject, and of moving that, in view of the separatist tendencies developed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it shall not be the practice to place upon coins of the United Kingdom an emblem which is only recognised in one part of it.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, before finally deciding upon the designs for the proposed new gold coinage, he will afford the Members of this House an opportunity of seeing them; and whether he has come to any decision as to withdrawing from circulation, either or both the four shilling and five shilling pieces?

*MR. GOSCHEN: As regards the second question, I have never thought of withdrawing the new five shilling piece. So far as I learn, it is growing in popularity. Fresh demands for considerable quantities have lately been made. As to the four shilling piece, it is premature to come to any decision. Time alone can show what is the real use of a coin. As to exhibiting the design for a new gold coin to Members of the House, there is something to be said for such a course, and something against it. There is sure to be no unanimous verdict in favour of any design. There are more differences of opinion in questions of art even than in questions of politics. I will consult my Colleagues on the point.

*MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): Is there any increase in the circulation of four shilling pieces?

*MR. GOSCHEN: No doubt the five shilling coin is more popular.

GRIEVANCES OF SEAMEN.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the following remarks made by Admiral H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh at the annual meeting of "Missions to Seamen" Society, held at the Mansion House on 28th April:—

"The Report also complains that in some ports abroad, and in Crown Colonies, especially Hong Kong and Singapore, the crews are compelled to do unnecessary work in transhipping cargoes on Sundays, which causes much discontent and discomfort to the men, and puts a stop to all religious observances. Whereas in the Australian and self-governing Colonies such unnecessary working of cargoes is rigidly forbidden.

"I understand that the Secretary of State for the Colonies has called the attention of some Colonial Governors to this grievance of seamen ;"

and whether the practice complained of has been prohibited, so that seamen may enjoy their Sunday rest in port in common with other of Her Majesty's subjects?

BARON H. DE WORMS : The Secretary of State has been in correspondence with the Governors of Hong Kong and the Straits Settlements on the subject of Sunday labour in the ports of Hong Kong and Singapore. They have represented that there would be difficulties in the way of legislation prohibiting Sunday labour in these harbours ; but the Local Chambers of Commerce have been approached by the Governors with a view to securing a reduction of all such avoidable labour by united voluntary action on the part of the merchant and shipping agents. I may add that the Secretary of State is about to consult on this question Sir Cecil Smith and Sir William des Vœux, who are now in England.

ADMIRAL FIELD : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the following remarks made by Admiral H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh at the Mansion House, 28th April, when presiding at the annual meeting of "Missions to Seamen" Society :—

"But this system of sending seamen direct to their homes, and the transmission of their wages after them, has not yet been extended to foreign shores ; British crews are dismissed from their ships on the coasts of France, Belgium, and Holland, &c., to await payment amongst people of a strange language, so that the Consul of Dunkirk reports as follows, with just indignation, 'of the sharks of all nations, who infest the large discharging ports between the Elbe and Brest, in order to live principally on the British seaman and his weaknesses ; and urges 'the introduction of the system for the transmission of wages, free of charge, at the chief discharging ports between the Elbe and Brest.' In Dunkirk last year 2,002 British seamen were discharged, receiving £34,565 in cash, and $658 in bills on the owners. Of this money, £16,056 was remitted by 911 money orders, leaving $19,187 for the crimps to operate upon in that one French Port ;"

and whether he will endeavour to meet the evil complained of, as recommended by the Consul of Dunkirk, by inserting a clause in the next Merchant Shipping Amendment Act?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH : The question of still further facilitating the transmission of seamen's wages to this country, and of sending to their homes seamen discharged at foreign ports, has not failed to receive attention. But it has not yet proved practicable to overcome all the difficulties which have been found to exist, arising in some measure through the difference in the laws and regulations in operation in foreign ports. Any scheme of the kind in foreign ports would probably have to extend to seamen whose homes are in the British possessions as well as to those who reside in the United Kingdom. The transmission scheme has been worked in this country by the staff which is also employed in the prevention of crimping and in the performance of other duties in connection with the Mercantile Marine. To provide the necessary assistance at foreign ports would involve a very considerable expenditure. In the year ended March, 1889, seamen discharged abroad took advantage of the Seamen's Foreign Money Order system to the extent of over 4,000 orders, representing more than £60,000.

THE SOUTH METROPOLITAN GAS COMPANY.

MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will move the Attorney General, under Section 45 of "The Metropolis Gas Act, 1860," to take action against the South Metropolitan Gas Company, as he has twice been requested to do by the London County Council, for their conduct in cutting off the supply of gas from the testing place in Hill Street, Peckham, whereby since September, 1889, it has been impossible to test the gas at this station except for two short periods?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH : In December last, the London County Council represented to the Board of Trade that the South Metropolitan Gas Company had cut off the supply of gas from the testing place in Hill Street, Peckham. The Board of Trade communicated with the Company, and, as the result, the gas was re-connected some six weeks ago. Under the circumstances, I do not propose to move the Attorney General to take action against the Company.

CENTRAL AFRICA—THE STANLEY EXPEDITION.

MR. ALFRED PEASE (York): I have given notice of my intention to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true that the survivors of the slaves with which the Stanley expedition was manned, and which were originally hired from Arab and other owners at Zanzibar, have been handed over to their original owners, and returned into slavery at Zanzibar; and whether it is a fact that the wages they earned on the Expedition have been appropriated by their owners; but at the request of the right hon. Gentleman I will postpone the question.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture who, under the Pleuro-pneumonia Bill, will be responsible for making and issuing regulations for the movement of cattle throughout the Kingdom; and whether the various Local Authorities will undertake this duty, as formerly, or whether the Board of Agriculture will issue and enforce General Rules to be applied to all parts of the country?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford: The ultimate responsibility for making and issuing regulations for the movement of cattle will rest with the Board of Agriculture, as it formerly did with the Privy Council before the Board was established. How that responsibility will be exercised in all cases it is at the present time impossible to say. It will depend to a great extent upon the prevalence of the disease in the different districts; but I may say that it will always be the object of the Board to act in harmony with, and with the co-operation of, the Local Authorities throughout Great Britain, who will, no doubt, usually carry out the regulations as heretofore.

THE FISHERIES DEPARTMENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what alterations have taken place in the Fisheries Department of the Board of Trade in consequence of the lamentable death of Mr. Gray and the promotion of

Mr. Swanston; whether it is true that Mr. Berrington will continue to hold the position of Chief Inspector as well as the office of Assistant Secretary of the Fisheries Department; what will be the future position of Mr. Malan at the Board of Trade; and who will in future conduct such local inquiries as may be necessary from time to time in the general interests of those engaged in the great sea fisheries industry of this country?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: In consequence of Mr. Swanston's appointment to the post formerly held by Mr. Gray, the appointment of Assistant Secretary for the Fisheries Department has been conferred on Mr. Berrington, who holds it concurrently with that of Chief Inspector of Fisheries. The status of Mr. Malan will not be altered by this arrangement. Local inquiries will in future be conducted as a rule by Mr. Malan and Mr. Fryer; but Mr. Berrington, in his capacity of Chief Inspector, will be able to inquire in any especially important case in which the Board desire so to employ him, when compatible with the conduct of his duties as Assistant Secretary.

THE INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY CONVENTION.

MR. MUNDELLA: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Report of the Industrial Property Convention, recently held at Madrid, will be in the hands of the Members; and whether, having regard to the desirability of its being considered by the Merchandise Marks Committee now sitting, he will facilitate its production as early as possible?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have had the Report and relative Papers sent to the printers, and will do all I can to facilitate their production as early as possible.

THE HUDDERSFIELD COUNTY BOARD.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is known to the Bench that the legal business of Mr. John Sykes, solicitor, the clerk to the Huddersfield County Board of Magistrates, is carried on under the name of John Sykes and Son; and whether it is a regular practice for the junior partner of the firm in question to appear before the Magistrates as an advocate?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have not yet received a reply from the Magistrates; but from the information which I have obtained I believe the answer to both paragraphs to be in the affirmative. The Clerk to the Justices informs me that his son was admitted a solicitor in 1872, on the express condition that the partnership was not to include anything in connection with the Magistrates' Clerk's Department of the Office, which has always been carried on separate and distinct from the General Solicitors' Business of the Office. I am assured that the son has in no way interfered with the business of the Magistrates Clerk's Department, and has received no portion of the salary appertaining thereto.

THE POST OFFICE.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if it is a standing rule in the Post Office, when a new Order is issued by the Postmaster General, to require all the officials to whom such Order applies to sign their adherence to the Order; if the Order relating to meetings of Post Office servants, issued a fortnight ago, applies to the whole of the Postal staff, and why the Telegraph clerks only were required to sign the Order; if he is aware that a number of the clerks signed the Order under protest; and if their action will render them liable to punishment, or place them at any disadvantage in the Postal Service?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): When a new Order is issued the heads of Departments are responsible that it is made known to their subordinates; and to this end they must take such steps as they consider necessary. The Order to which the hon. Member refers applies to the whole body of Post Office servants; but whether in one office they are called upon only to read the Order, and in another to sign it, is a matter for their own superior officer, and one in which I should not think of interfering. I am not aware whether any Post Office servants signed under protest or not. The protest, if protest was made, would not come under my official cognisance and would certainly entail no disadvantage to any officer who complies with the Order. I take this opportunity of stating that the Order in question as regards shorthand writers applies only to general meetings and not to committee meetings.

THE LICENSING QUESTION.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will consider the propriety of dividing the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill into two Bills, and of dealing with the Licensing Question in a separate measure?

*MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir; we cannot undertake to consider this recommendation. It strikes me it would be bad policy to do so.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if the Government intend by implication to reverse the recent decision of the English Courts in "Sharp v. Wakefield" that refusal to renew a licence was in the discretion of the magistrates; and, if not, why is it proposed to provide that the renewal of new licences granted after the passing of the Local Taxation Bill shall be "at the free and unqualified discretion of the Licensing Authority."

*MR. RITCHIE: We have no intention whatever, by implication or otherwise, to attempt to reverse the decision referred to. The words "at the free and unqualified discretion of the Licensing Authority" were inserted in the Bill not for the purpose of in any way expressing a judgment upon the question raised in the case cited or of asking the House to do so, but simply to make it clear that no rights whatever should attach in the case of new licences.

In reply to a further question by Mr. T. M. HEALY

*MR. RITCHIE said: I do not wish to discuss the exact bearing of the decision. All I can say is that Her Majesty's Government have no intention to put any words in the Bill which can in any way prejudice the question as to the right to the renewal of licences. The question will be raised when the House goes into Committee on the Bill, and if it can be shown that there is anything in the Bill implying more than I have stated we should have no objection to its being amended.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg also to ask the right hon. Gentleman on what basis the Probate Duty is assessed on public house licences?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The value of a licence is included in the value of the "goodwill" (on which Probate Duty is paid). The goodwill is generally included in the valuation of the lease, and the value of a licensed house is greater than that of another house of similar dimensions used for a trade where a licence is not required.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Is the duty levied on the property of the brewer-owner, or of the tenant occupier?

*MR. GOSCHEN: It is levied on the property of the man who dies. It is levied solely on such interest as the deceased possessed in the licence.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Will the right hon. Gentleman give information as to the terms on which the goodwill is valued?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will consult the Inland Revenue on the subject. I think that the House is entitled to full information on the point.

MR. ROWNTREE: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government will furnish the House with particulars of the amounts received by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in the last financial year in the various counties and boroughs in respect of on-licences in such counties and boroughs?

*MR. GOSCHEN: It would be impossible to furnish the information for which the hon. Member asks for some weeks.

SIR W. LAWSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman put off the Bill till the information is in possession of the House?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Certainly not, because that would be to run the risk of postponing the measure indefinitely. Of course, there is a considerable amount of general information at the disposal of hon. Members.

PIG IRON WARRANTS.

MR. AINSLIE (Lancashire, N. Lonsdale): I beg to ask the Attorney General if he can hold out any hope that, in view of the manifest disturbance of trade consequent upon irregular dealings in pig iron warrants, the Government will bring in a Bill to place all dealings in these Warrants under the same regulations as those which govern dealings in Stocks and shares?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I am aware that the speculative dealings have caused serious disturbance of the markets, but I am not acquainted with any regulations governing dealings in Stocks and shares which would prevent such speculations; but I may point out that the evil can be, to a great extent, prevented by purchasers insisting on the identification of the parcels purported to be sold.

THE MACCLESFIELD SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether Mr. P. J. Eaton, the actuary of the Macclesfield Savings Bank, is still on the Commission of the Peace for the borough of Macclesfield; and whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor has been called to the evidence given before the Commissioner at the inquiry into the affairs of the Macclesfield Savings Bank, and especially that portion of the evidence which relates to the actuary and the way in which the position of a Justice of the Peace was obtained, or sought to be obtained; and, if so, whether the Lord Chancellor has come to any decision in the matter?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I am informed that Mr. Eaton is still on the Commission of the Peace. The matter is still engaging the attention of the Lord Chancellor.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, considering the great desire expressed in Scotland for the passage of some measure dealing with Scotch Local Bill Legislation, he is able now to fix a day for the Second Reading Debate on the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I hope that the Second Reading of the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill will be taken before Whitsuntide.

PUBLIC HEALTH OF THE METROPOLIS.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Government intend to introduce the Bills dealing with consolidation and amendment of the laws with respect to public health in the Metropolis, and to the dwellings of the working classes?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government hope to be able to introduce the Bills dealing with the consolidation and amendment of the laws with respect to public health in the Metropolis and to the dwellings of the working classes shortly before Whitsuntide.

THE SALFORD FRAUDS.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the attention of the Government has been called to the Petitions of the Salford Corporation, and of the ratepayers of Salford, praying that a Commission should be appointed to inquire into the alleged fraudulent transactions in connection with the Corporation contracts; and whether it is the intention of the Government to accede to the prayer of the Petitioners?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not in the power of the Government to appoint a Commission with power to examine witnesses on oath. For the appointment of such a Commission legislation is necessary, and it is for hon. Members who are interested in the question, and who think this is the best way of proceeding to introduce the necessary Bill.

In reply to a further question from MR. SUMMERS,

*MR. W. H. SMITH said: It is not the duty of the Government to take the initiative in the matter.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT ON PERJURED EVIDENCE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is possible to give any compensation to the men Gleeson, Brady, Brooks, and Whaley, for false imprisonment?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave to this question of the hon. Member on the 21st of last month.

SILVER PLATE.

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how drawback can be obtained on silver plate sold and delivered between the present time and such time in June as the Revenue Office may pass them?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I intend to introduce a clause in Committee of the Budget and Inland Revenue Bill providing for interim sales of silver plate, which I understand the hon. Member wishes to facilitate. The clause shall be put upon the Paper immediately after the Second Reading in order to give publicity to the arrangements.

DOG MUZZLING AND RABIES.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the point of division of the two Counties of Bucks and Middlesex, as on the Uxbridge Road, the Dog Muzzling Order is enforced on one side of the road and not on the other, and why, if the Order is intended to stamp out hydrophobia, this and similar areas of muzzling are so peculiarly defined?

MR. CHAPLIN: All Orders apply to districts of Local Authorities. The boundaries of districts are not fixed by the Board. It occasionally happens that the boundary line runs down the centre of a road. The difficulty cannot be got rid of without having a special survey in order to define the district to which an Order should apply. I am unable to say in this particular instance whether the hon. Member is right, but probably he is. The case frequently occurs, and for this reason: that the areas are prescribed according to the jurisdiction of the Local Authorities who carry out the Order. I am quite aware of the anomaly, but it is an anomaly which cannot be avoided unless the Order was to be made universal throughout Great Britain.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he can now see his way to restrict the Dog Muzzling Order in the County of Kent to those parts of the county within the Metropolitan area?

MR. LEES (Oldham): I also beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is able to give the House any information as to the effect of the Muzzling Orders now in force; whether any appreciable diminution in the number of cases of rabies and hydrophobia has taken place in consequence of those Orders; and whether, in view of the great inconvenience which is caused by those Orders to owners of dogs throughout the country, he is able to hold out any prospect of their being shortly rescinded?

MR. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): I have further to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Executive Committee of the London County Council for the quarter ending March 31st last, which states that the number of rabid dogs for the quarter is seven as against two in the corresponding quarter of last year; whether the alleged general increase of rabies in scheduled districts has been accompanied by a corresponding increase in the cases of hydrophobia; in how many, if any, of the alleged outbreaks of rabies relied in by the Board of Agriculture, in justifying the Muzzling Order, was the alleged rabid dog under the observation of a veterinary surgeon of experience while still living; whether the remuneration of veterinary surgeons employed by the Board depends in any way upon the number of dogs declared rabid; and whether, owing to the increase of rabies in the scheduled districts, he can hold out any hopes of withdrawing the Muzzling Order?

*MR. AINSLIE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the fact that in Constantinople there are upwards of 30,000 dogs that are without owners or control; that they have all their young in the streets; and that no case of rabies has occurred among them; and whether these facts have been brought forward in the evidence before the Commission?

MR. CHAPLIN: In reply to the question which has been put to me last, I am not aware that the data referred to were placed before the Royal Commission or not, but I have referred to the evidence without finding them. Evidence of an opposite character was given before the Commission by Professor Horsley and Sir C. Warren, and the hon. Member will find that in Dr. Fleming's able book upon rabies and hydrophobia. The contention that hydrophobia does not exist in Turkey or Constantinople is disputed, and I think disposed of. In reply to my hon. Friends behind me, it will be convenient to answer both questions at once, and the answer is this: The Returns of deaths from hydrophobia since the Muzzling Order came into force are not at present in the hands of the Board of Agriculture. But I am glad to say, with regard to rabies, that in every county which has been placed under the regulations, and in the country as a whole, there has been a marked diminution in the number of outbreaks since the passing of the Order. For instance, in 1889, for the last two quarters of that year there were 133 cases in the third and 81 cases in the fourth quarter reported to the Board. For the first quarter of the present year they have been reduced to 39, and for the month of April there have only been seven cases throughout England, as compared with 11 for March, 14 for February, and 14 for January of the present year. In the Metropolis and the West Riding, although there has been a large diminution, cases are still of constant occurrence, and there have also been comparatively recent outbreaks in Hampshire and West Sussex, in which latter county a Muzzling Order has been imposed by the Local Authority. With regard to Lancashire and the home Counties of Essex, Hertfordshire, Surrey, and Kent, so far as they are not included in the Metropolitan district, no cases have been reported for a considerable period, and if the Reports continue to be as favourable in the case of the home counties as they have been of late I shall hope to be able to modify the Order, if it is not suspended, at no distant time. I may be allowed to add, as it will be of interest to the public, that, since the Order has been enforced, of the rabid dogs seized in public places nine were properly and securely muzzled, and were thus prevented from doing mischief.

THE INDORE STUDENTS' ASSOCIATION.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that Mr. Kenvey, Agent to the Governor General of India, at Indore, has recently issued a notice that—

"No Association should be organised within Residency limits without the Agent to the Governor General's permission and approval."

"The so-called Indore Students' Association is not recognised as a public Association so far as the Residency limits are concerned, though of course there is no objection to private persons meeting and debating as much as they please, provided they do not transgress the law;"

"No official, student, or school-boy connected with the Residency Establishment is permitted to join any Association within the Residency limits which has not been approved by the Agent to the Governor General. And no such official, student, or school-boy may, without special permission, attend the meeting or meetings of any unauthorised Association within Residency limits."

whether he can state under what authority such notice has been issued; whether there is any precedent for the issue of such a notice; whether the notice has been approved by the Government of India; and whether the Secretary of State will call for a Report on the circumstances leading to the issue of such notice?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has no official information on the subject. The notice appears to be within the ordinary authority of the Agent to the Governor General, and does not seem to the Secretary of State to call for special inquiry.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Has the Agent ordinary authority to interfere with a meeting of native Indians?

The question was not answered.

INDIAN FACTORY LAW.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether children are allowed to work in Indian cotton factories at seven years of age, and to be kept at work for nine hours per day, also whether it is the case that there are no restrictions whatever affecting the employment of young persons over 12 years of age or of women in regard to the number of hours during which they may work; and whether, in view of the fact that the Berlin Labour Conference recommended that children should not be admitted to work in any industry under 12 years of age, and then only for six hours per day till they were 14, that young persons from 14 to 16 years of age should not work more than 10 hours per day, and that women should in no case work more than 11 hours per day, Her Majesty's Government propose to take any steps to bring the Factory Law in India into conformity with the Berlin standard?

*SIR J. GORST: The existing Factory Law of India is correctly stated in the question. A Bill has been introduced which is not yet passed, raising the age at which children can be employed to 9, and restricting the hours of labour of women to 11. The Secretary of State will send the Resolutions of the Berlin Conference to the Government of India, and will commend them to the careful consideration of that Government, in connection with the proposed amendment of the Factory Law.

MR. MUNDELLA: Will any proposal by the Government of India for the amendment of the Factory Law come before this House before it is adopted by the Council of India?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; I do not suppose it will be brought before the House.

THE EX-SULTAN ABDULLAH OF PERAK.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the highly doubtful character of the evidence on the strength of which the ex-Sultan Abdullah of Perak was sentenced in 1876, and to the length to which his term of deportation to the Seychelles Islands has extended, the Colonial Office will consider the desirability of allowing him to return to the Malay Peninsula?

BARON H. DE WORMS: As I stated in answer to a similar question by the hon. Member last July, the Executive Council of the Straits Settlements were fully satisfied of the guilt of the ex-Sultan Abdullah of Perak in 1876, and nothing has since occurred to throw any doubt on the justice of the decision then taken that he should be removed to the Seychelles. Her Majesty's Government cannot sanction his return to the Malay Peninsula, and Abdullah declined an offer made last year that he should be allowed to reside in Sarawak, among people of his own race, language, and religion.

THE CRAWFORD CASE.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the grave statements in the Papers laid upon the Table as to the effect of the action of the Secretary of State with reference to the action of the Government against the Mamlatdars incriminated in the Crawford Case, he will afford facilities for the discussion of the Motion on the Paper in the event of its not being reached on Tuesday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are quite prepared to discuss the question which the hon. Member is desirous of raising; but it will be impossible for them to afford facilities.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that an officer of the Government has declared that he had difficulty in expressing his feelings in regard to the breach of faith which has been committed in becoming language; and whether that statement is not sufficiently grave to justify the question being raised here?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am aware that language of that character has been used by an officer who stands high in the service of the Government of India; but if the Government were, considering the limited time at their disposal, to grant time for the consideration of such questions, I am afraid it would necessitate our having two Houses of Commons.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I wish to give notice that, in consequence of the information I have received from Members on both sides of the House who desire to take part in the Debate upon this question, I shall not bring my Motion on to-morrow evening unless I can do so before 11 o'clock.

IRELAND—MR. H. STUBBS, J.P.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the fact that Mr. Henry Stubbs, J.P., who lives with his brother, Mr. Alfred Stubbs, solicitor, is accustomed to adjudicate in cases at Petty Sessions in Ballyshannon in which Mr. Alfred Stubbs is professionally employed; whether he is aware that this practice has created grave distrust in the administration of the law and the decisions of the Magisterial Bench, and has given occasion to repeated comments and protests in the public Press; whether he is aware that Mr. Alfred Stubbs, on the 10th April, appeared as solicitor in cases before a Magisterial Bench composed of three members, of whom one, Mr. Hamilton, is closely connected with Mr. Alfred Stubbs by marriage, and another is the said Mr. Henry Stubbs; and whether the Government will take any steps to prevent the repetition of such proceedings?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, University of Dublin): I am informed that no complaint has reached the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on the subject.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL SPEEDY.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been directed to the case of Lieutenant Colonel Speedy, who, having held the post of Adjutant of the Royal Hibernian Military School for a period of 26 years, during 12 of which years with the rank of Lieutenant Colonel in the Army, was called on to resign in October, 1880, on the ground of age; whether he is aware that Colonel Speedy's repeated applications, under the provisions of the Royal Warrant of 1878, Article 23, par. f., authorising his retirement for the rank of Colonel in the Army, and the pension attaching thereto, have been refused, on the ground that his post was not a military one within the meaning of the said Warrant; and whether, having regard to the fact that the view of the War Office Authorities on this question is opposed to the opinion of Lord Chief Baron Palles and the Charters of the Royal Hibernian Military School, which expressly define the military character of the post of Adjutants, and having regard also to the fact that Colonel Speedy had served in Her Majesty's Army for a period of 42 years, receiving promotion for gallantry on the field, and that the result of the refusal of his claim is his retirement as Major with £300 per annum pension instead of his retirement as Colonel with £420 per annum pension, he will permit the case of Colonel Speedy to be re-opened, and the opinion of the War Office to be submitted to the test of legal examination, as was done in the similar case of Colonel Addy?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: My attention, and that of several of my predecessors, has been repeatedly drawn to the case of Lieutenant Colonel Speedy. It has been uniformly held that the position of Adjutant to the Royal Hibernian Military School, for boys the sons of soldiers, could not be regarded as a military appointment qualifying for the rank of Colonel in the Army, and I am not prepared to question that decision. The hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that the case of Colonel Addy was submitted to legal investigation.

THE BALTIMORE FISHING INDUSTRY.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that owing to the transference of the Custom House from Skibbereen to Bantry very great inconvenience and injury are caused to the Baltimore Fishing Industry; whether, according to the existing Custom arrangements in Skibbereen, the Deputy Officer of Customs in that town is unable to give permission for the discharge of cargoes of ice absolutely essential for the preservation of the fish caught by the Baltimore fishermen, and also that it is impossible for him to obtain permission by telegraph from Bantry to do so, and whether, in consequence, steamers for conveying the fish have to wait at Baltimore the arrival from Bantry, 24 miles distant, of the Superintendent of Customs; and whether he will take steps to have abated the inconvenience complained of, by restoring the Custom House to the Skibbereen District?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think that the Treasury will reply to this question; but I do not see that my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury is present at this moment.

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): Perhaps the hon. Member will kindly postpone the question until Thursday,

CASE OF MR. DALY.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state on what date Mr. Daly and the other prisoners convicted of boycotting the Great Northern Railway at Carrickmacross were transferred from Derry to Belfast Gaol; and if he will explain why they were obliged to wear the prison uniform on their journey, and handcuffed when brought through the streets of Belfast?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not obtained the information that would enable me to answer the question, but I hope to have it by to-morrow.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE (IRELAND.)

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that the state of the Registry of Deeds Office (Ireland), owing to increased business and a diminished staff, is such as to cause serious inconvenience to the public, and if the annual official leave of absence has been in consequence curtailed and postponed; whether the Registrar's urgent requests for the necessary addition to the staff, in order to finish the Consolidated Indexes for public use, and work off arrears, have been refused; and whether he will now take steps either to adequately increase the staff, or to apply the seven hours' scheme of attendance?

SIR H. MAXWELL: There has been no increase in the business of the Department, and the staff is in excess of the proper number. It is not proposed, therefore, to sanction any addition to the staff. The question of applying the seven hours' scheme to the Office is under consideration.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will the hon. Gentleman lay on the Table a copy of the Report of the Registrar in which he states that an addition to the staff is necessary?

SIR H. MAXWELL: I will consider the matter.

THE TRIAL OF CAPTAIN RYE.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has been informed, in connection with the recent trial of Captain Rye, D.L., that Constable Noonan, of Castlemore Police Barrack, Crookstown, County Cork, employed a farmer named William M'Carthy, of Crookstown, on Sunday, 16th March, to send his car to convey Jeremiah Corcoran to Farrar Court, on the 18th March last, to enable him, being wounded and unable otherwise to travel, to give evidence in the case of the "Queen v. Rye"; whether the police were requested by one or several gentlemen of position not to press Corcoran to go and give evidence before the Court, the case having been settled, and whether Constable Noonan is correctly reported to have told the car-owner, on the 17th March, that the car would not be required to take Corcoran to Court; whether District Inspector St. George was informed by the men under his command that a settlement of the case had been concluded; and whether Mr. St. George first visited Captain Rye, accused of unlawfully and maliciously wounding his tenant Corcoran, prior to calling on the wounded man?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the constable engaged a car to convey the man to Petty Sessions. No such request as that alleged in the second paragraph was made to the police. The reason for countermanding the order for the car was that the man had subsequently caused the police to be informed that he was not in a condition to attend the Court, and forwarded a medical certificate to that effect. The reply to the inquiry in the third paragraph is in the negative; to that in the fourth paragraph in the affirmative.

CASE OF MR. J. SLATTERY, AND MR. T. BARRY.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it would be possible to provide Mr. John Slattery, T.C., and Mr. Tom Barry, P.L.G., both being bail prisoners in the County Cork Gaol, with rooms at their request, in accordance with the Prison Rules, the prison in question being one in the first Class; and if it is true that Mr. Slattery is obliged to see his wife in the visiting room known as the "cage?"

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the prisoners mentioned are already provided with the accommodation set apart for prisoners of their class. They receive their visitors in the usual visiting room, which is heated, lighted, and furnished.

Dr. Tanner

DR. TANNER: Did not the right hon. Gentleman say last year that all bail prisoners would be treated as first-class misdemeanants? Will he not, therefore, take steps to obtain for them such privileges as I enjoyed myself when a prisoner in Clonmel Gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give notice of the question.

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow Mr. John Slattery to receive his wife in the same way that I was allowed to receive mine?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: So far as my information goes I am not led to suppose that these prisoners are treated differently from other prisoners of the same class.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): What is called a separate apartment consists of a room divided by a grating.

DR. TANNER: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this matter on the first favourable opportunity.

MR. C. P. COOTE.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can explain the circumstances under which Mr. C. P. Coote, a paid official on the staff of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and a Director of the Great Southern and Western Railway of Ireland, was granted special leave of absence during the last Cork Assizes, to enable him to attend in Cork as a Grand Juror for the purpose of opposing the projected Cork and Wexford Railway Bill in favour of the Great Southern and Western Railway?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The gentleman mentioned, who is the owner of property in the County of Cork, received the usual notice to attend as a Grand Juror at the late Assizes. His doing so in no way conflicted with his official duties. I have no information as to the particular business which came before the Grand Jury.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the action of Mr. C. Purdon Coote, at the Board of Conservators of the Lismore District, in endeavouring to procure the removal of Captain J. W. Johnstone from his position of Inspector; whether any reasons have been assigned for this action of Mr. Coote; and whether any steps will be taken to see that full justice is done to Captain Johnstone in the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This is a matter which in no way comes under the cognisance of the Irish Government, and therefore I am unable to answer the question.

DR. TANNER: Did not Mr. Coote say that he was going against Captain Johnstone in order to deprive him of his position of Inspector in consequence of Captain Johnstone having summoned him and had him fined for illegal fishing?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received no information of that character.

LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the widespread interest attaching to the subject of licensing and the vital importance of the proposals for extinction and compensation in the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, and the fact that the actual terms of the proposals were only circulated on Friday, he will defer the Second Reading of the Bill until its actual effects have been more thoroughly appreciated, and hon. Members have had reasonable time to communicate with those whom they represent on the subject?

MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg also to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, in consideration of the great importance of the subject and the strong interest manifested throughout the country, he will postpone the Second Reading of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill till after the Whitsuntide Recess?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not able to accept the suggestions of hon. Members that the Second Reading should be postponed until after Whitsuntide. I shall ask the House to read the Bill a second time on Monday, but it is not intended to take the Committee stage until after Whitsuntide; and I apprehend that the opposition of hon. Members is directed against a clause rather than against the whole Bill, so that ample time will be afforded for the consideration of the provisions in question.

SIR W. LAWSON: It is the principle of the Bill that we oppose, and the principle can only be discussed on the Second Reading.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am aware that it is usual to discuss the principle of a Bill on the Second Reading; but there is more than one principle in this Bill, and I believe that some of the principles are accepted by both sides of the House. If the hon. Gentleman objects to any particular licensing provision of the Bill the best way to give effect to his objection will be to move the rejection of the clause in Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What course do the Government propose to take in regard to the extension of the Suspensory Clauses to Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There will be no inconvenience in hon. Members moving in Committee to extend the Suspensory Clauses of the Bill to Ireland so as to prevent the creation of new licences in that country.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That would deprive us of the opportunity of considering the proposal on the Second Reading stage of the Bill to which we are certainly entitled, because we may not be satisfied with the proposal of the Government. Was there not a distinct pledge by the Irish Office that Ireland should be included in the Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that any objection can be taken with regard to the proposal as it now stands.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I would suggest that the Bill should be committed pro forma in order to introduce Amendments. It would be unfair not to take a discussion so far as Ireland is affected.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will undertake that after the Bill has been read a second time the necessary steps shall be taken to introduce a clause into the Bill for extending the Suspensory Clauses to Ireland.

MR. CAINE: I beg to give notice that on Monday next, on the Second Reading of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, I will move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

SIR W. LAWSON: I beg to intimate that in the event of the Government persisting in the endeavour to force the Bill through this day week I will avail myself of every opportunity of preventing it coming on until the country has had time to consider it.

THE IMPORT OF SILVER PLATE.

In answer to Mr. KING (Hull, Central), who put a question of which he had given private notice,

*MR. GOSCHEN said: Directly the Board of Customs learnt, this morning, that certain foreign silver plate imported in baggage before the 30th of April had been considered by their officers to be still liable to duty they issued the following Order:—

"The Board authorise delivery of plate imported prior to the 1st inst. free of duty, provided it be constructively warehoused. Deposit in the baggage warehouse to be considered a constructive warehousing for this Order. The usual declaration is to be made if the plate is for private use; in that case the assay will not be required."

I may add that the Act requires that such plate should be deposited in a bonded warehouse; and the meaning of the Customs Order is that deposit in the baggage warehouse shall count as warehousing for the purposes of the Act.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES BILL.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I wish to point out that the Government have given no notice of any Amendment widening the scope of the Electoral Disabilities Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government propose to accept the Instruction of the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Whitmore) to remove the disabilities attaching to voters who have been absent from their qualifying premises under any contract of service, or in the execution of a public duty.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the Bill be taken to-morrow?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope it will be reached to-night, but I should not propose to take it after 11 o'clock. The business to-morrow will be the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill in Committee.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Will Order No. 9—Savings Banks Bill, Second Reading—be taken to-night?

*MR. GOSCHEN: No.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): What will be the business on Thursday and Friday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is difficult to say. We must wait until we have disposed of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill before it is possible to give a forecast of the progress of public business. We shall be prepared to deal with any of the Bills on the Paper if we can reach them.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): Will the Allotments Bill be taken to-night? I suppose there is no chance of our reaching it.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There has been a great deal of discussion on the Bill, and if it is reached I think it would be only reasonable to proceed with it.

MR. COBB: Up to what time will it be dealt with?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Up to 12 o'clock.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Will the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill be taken to-night?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If it is reached.

DR. TANNER: Will Supply be taken this week?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We shall certainly take it if we can.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

Copy ordered—

"Of Account of the Income and Expenditure of the British Museum (Special Trust Funds) for the year ending the 31st day of March 1890."

"And, Return of the number of Persons admitted to visit the Museum and the British Museum (Natural History) in each year from 1884 to 1889, both years inclusive, together with a Statement of the Progress made in the Arrangement and Description of the Collections, and an Account of Objects added to them, in the year 1889."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL

[LORDS.]—(No. 179.)

Bill reported from the Select Committee, with Special Report.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 110.]

Minutes of Proceedings to be printed. [No. 110.]

Bill, as amended, re-committed to a Committee of the whole House for Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 251.]

SWEATING SYSTEM.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to The Lords, to request that their Lordships will be pleased to communicate to this House, a Copy of the Fifth Report from the Select Committee appointed by their Lordships on the Sweating System, with the Proceedings of the Committee.—(Mr. R. Toth.)

NEW WRITS.

For County of Tipperary (Mid-Division),
v. Thomas Mayne, esquire, Manor of Northstead; County of Galway (Eastern Division), v. Mathew Harris, esquire, deceased.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to South Indian Railway Purchase Bill without Amendment.

KEW AND PETERSHAM VICARAGE
BILL.—(No. 229.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; Bill read the third time, and passed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE
BILL.—(No. 231.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

*(4.45.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON
(Tower Hamlets, Poplar): We on this side suffer under two disappointments in regard to the Budget Statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. One is that he has done nothing to carry out the pledge of the Government with regard to assisted education; and the other is that he has neglected to do anything to reform the Death Duties by equalising the burdens on personalty and realty. We are glad to believe, from what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has since said, that he is absolutely pledged to providing for free schools next Session; and it is probable, from the under estimate he has made of the revenue for the year and the way he has provided for certain items of expenditure which will not recur, that he will have a surplus which will enable him to carry out his pledge. The right hon. Gentleman is also understood to have practically pledged himself to turn his attention to the reform of the Death Duties, combined with a reform of the Income Tax. If he does this without fear and favour, as a strong Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to do, he will have warm supporters on the Opposition side of the House. I am by no means sure, however, that that proposal, combined, as we hope it will be combined, with assisted education, will endear itself to the hearts of country Gentlemen opposite, if they have to pay for the reform with an increased duty on realty. Then some of us—though we did not expect much—thought that the right hon. Gentleman would have done something in a small way in the form of restitution to the Sinking Fund, which he had so shamelessly plundered. The right hon.

Gentleman has boasted of the reductions of Debt he has made, but I should like to point out that the power to reduce the Debt has arisen to a very large extent from casual and unexpected surpluses and windfalls; and while paying off Debt the right hon. Gentleman has been borrowing money for coaling stations, for Imperial defence, for naval extension and other matters; and it really makes no practical difference whether the money is taken out of the balances or is raised by loan. The Budget has been praised as a great Budget, a popular Budget, and one that vies with the famous Budget of old. I admit that the Budget is intended to be a popular one, but I deny that it is a great Budget.
From a fiscal point of view it aims at too much, and it does not attempt to do anything thoroughly. It does not show any financial reform or fiscal improvements, such as has marked the Budgets to which it has been compared. It is not the kind of Budget the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian would have proposed if he had had the opportunity.
The Chancellor of the Exchequer, to my mind, has frittered away a great opportunity for the sake of a passing popularity.
He has attempted to do too many things, and the result is that he has done them all badly. By the surplus of Revenue over Expenditure and the imposition of taxation the right hon. Gentleman had a surplus of £4,750,000—a surplus which has been only twice approached and only once exceeded during the last 30 or 40 years. I do not object in principle to the increase in the Beer and Spirit Duties.
The Spirit Duty has not been raised for the past 30 years; and it is a financial axiom of this country that while as to harmless articles of general consumption

you ought to get as large a revenue as you can spread over the largest area of consumption, while as far as the Spirit Duties are concerned, the principle has always been acted on to get the largest Revenue you can from the smallest area of consumption; and that you are only to be stayed by the fear of causing a reduction in consumption, so as to prejudicially affect the Revenue, by a fear of causing smuggling or greatly encouraging adulteration. It is doubtful, however, whether it is wise in a year of peace and surplus to increase the taxes on beer and spirits; because those taxes and the Income Tax are the great sources from which we can obtain an increase of Revenue when war or other serious emergency arises. It is curious to note that the policy of the Government is the exact reverse of their attitude in 1885. They now propose to increase the Beer and Spirit Duties and to decrease the Tea Duty; but, in 1885, when the Liberal Government, under stress of war expenditure, proposed to increase the Beer and Spirit Duties, they opposed the scheme, and as a counter proposal suggested that the duty upon tea should be increased. Well, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a surplus of £4,750,000. I will not detain the House by discussing what I may call the minor proposals of the Budget as to barracks, volunteers, postage, and so on, which may practically reduce the surplus to a little over £4,000,000. I do not desire in my remarks to attempt an alternative Budget. But I think the money at his disposal might have been better dealt with fiscally if he had included a smaller number of articles and had given them thorough relief. Everyone in this House, I think, is in favour of a reduction of the duties on tea and on currants and of the House Duty; and we hail with satisfaction the further step the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken to introduce, in reference to the last duty, the principle of graduated taxation. But I think it would have been better to have entirely abolished the Currant Duty, so as to have saved the cost of collection and prevented the great disturbance to trade which is always involved in the collection of the Customs Duty, both of which will now be out of all proportion to the revenue received. It would have been better also to have reduced the Tea Duty by one-half instead of by the 2d. now proposed. It is a fiscal axiom that the larger the reduction the greater is the proportionate recovery of the revenue. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has adopted a half-hearted measure in regard to the Tea Duty, and it is to be feared that the reduction he has made will go, not to the consumer, but to the middleman. The right hon. Gentleman the other night congratulated himself on the fact that while he had too largely relieved direct taxation during his former term of office he had on this occasion purged his sin by giving a large relief to indirect taxation. But has he made the accounts at all equal? It is admitted that as regards the Income Tax and direct taxation generally there has been a reduction of some £3,000,000 on balance. The reduction made in indirect taxation this year, together with the former reduction of the Tobacco Duty, which he said would not affect the consumer, amounts to about £2,250,000.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I never said anything of the kind.

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The right hon. Gentleman in reducing the tax on tobacco said it was purely a fiscal measure and would not affect the price, but was merely a question of water.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The water affects the consumer as much as the price.

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: In his Supplementary Budget this year the right hon. Gentleman added £1,300,000 to indirect taxation; and thus we find that while he has reduced direct taxation by £3,000,000 a year, he has reduced indirect taxation by less than £1,000,000 a year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he was "talking shop" among his friends in the City the other day, intimated that there would be a further reduction of the Income Tax later on. I do, in advance, enter a protest against any further reduction of direct taxation unaccompanied by reductions in indirect taxation. One last point. I think the principle which has been adopted, and greatly extended this year, of allocating certain portions of certain Imperial taxes to local purposes is very objectionable, and I do not think the ratepayers are justified in calling on us to pay the very large sum which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to hand over to them. The deficiency still existing amounted practically to the Horse Duty which was proposed and abandoned. Why the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not proceed with his Horse Duty when he came a cropper over his Van and Wheel Tax I never could understand, because I do not think there was any objection to that tax such as was legitimately taken to the other. That tax was dropped, however, and £540,000 was needed to make up the deficiency. The Chancellor of the Exchequer now proposes to hand over to the Local Authorities not £540,000, but no less than £860,000, besides a further sum of £169,000 for compensation for the slaughter of animals suffering from pleuro-pneumonia. I object to this payment on the ground that until we have a thorough reform of our local and Imperial finances in respect of the incidence of taxation on realty and personalty, we ought not as taxpayers to be called on to vote larger sums for what is practically the relief of realty, which already, during the last two or three years has received enormous relief from its local burdens. I object also to this principle of mixing up Imperial and local finance by voting certain proportions of our Imperial taxes for local purposes. The object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1887-8-9 was entirely to cut adrift local from Imperial finances. And for that purpose he handed over nearly all the Licence Duties, he caused personalty to pay something to the local rate, by giving half the Probate Duty. Now, he is carrying this principle still further, and in an objectionable way, by allocating the 6d. Spirit Duty and the 3d. Beer Duty for a special local purpose; and the result will be that instead of the local revenues being fixed they will fluctuate, and it is probable also that instead of leading to thrift the proposal will lead to extravagance. As far as we are concerned as taxpayers, it will make it very difficult for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal with these Spirit Duties or with these Probate Duties with a free hand. If he reforms the Probate Duty, as we hope he will, it will probably be by combining the Legacy and Probate Duty in one; and under these circumstances the Local Authorities will probably obtain very much more than they are entitled to. If we are to carry on the system of giving further aids to local funds, I think, for Imperial purposes, it would be much better to hand over the whole proceeds of a particular tax instead of only a very small proportion of each. The House Tax might very well be handed over in lieu of these small proportions, and it would enable the Imperial and local accounts to be kept separately and simply. It seems to me that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has neglected a very great opportunity of carrying out real financial reforms, and that he has endeavoured to carry out a popular Budget instead of carrying out a great Budget. He looked to the elections, and not to fiscal and financial considerations.

(5.18.) Mr. H. S. KING (Hull, Central): Though no one has more admiration than myself for the Chancellor of the Exchequer's abilities, I must this night raise my voice in opposition to the chorus of praise with which this year's Budget has been received by hon. Members on this side of the House. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I do so with very great timidity; and before I decided to take this step the idea often occurred to me that it was my own intelligence that was in fault, and not the skill of the giant of finance, with whom I am audacious enough to cross swords on this occasion. Certainly, my first impression was one of admiration. I was carried away at the outset by the glamour, the ingenuity, and the mastery of detail shown in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, whose eloquence for the moment cast a spell over my intellectual faculties; but when I began to reflect quietly and dispassionately, it seemed to me that, after all, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has frittered away a magnificent surplus upon a number of small reforms from which no one can get any sensible relief. I have fought against the feeling as a warm supporter of the right hon. Gentleman and of the Government as long as I can, and it is only with the utmost reluctance that I venture at length to offer any criticism on the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Indeed, I would be heartily glad to be convinced that I am in error and in ignorance. My objections to the Budget fall under three heads. It aims at too much; it does too little, and it is grossly inconsiderate, if not unjust, to the claims of two important sections of the community—the payers of Income Tax and the licensed victuallers. The Budget is one of small things—of twopences and twopence half-pennies—and at the end of the year no one will be a bit the richer for it, while many people will be distinctly the poorer. What are its leading features? What first strikes the eye with regard to it? There are the revision of the Tea Duty, the imposition of a fresh duty on spirits in face of an enormous surplus, and a multitude of peddling tips to taxpayers. My right hon. Friend reminds me of a man who, having inherited a fair estate, wakes up some morning to find it gone, though he cannot lay his hand on any one great extravagance, all having disappeared in a multitude of petty excesses. At the outset I am met by this difficulty, that I must either suggest some alternative scheme, and thus run the risk of exposing myself to the cheap ridicule of posing as an embryo Chancellor of the Exchequer, or else I must offer such criticism as I have to make without indicating any course which might, with advantage, have been pursued. As the latter step would deprive my criticism of half its force I prefer to risk the cheap ridicule. In the first place, I will touch on that portion of the Budget scheme which deals with local finance and the imposition of 6d. per gallon on spirits. I will not, however, discuss the wisdom or policy of Imperial Grants in aid of local finance, since that is a large question on which financial experts hold varying opinions. Personally, I view those grants in aid, if not with actual hostility, at all events with jealous suspicion. My attitude, indeed, may be described as one of malevolent neutrality; but I would like to ask my right hon. Friend why, even supposing that a grant is desirable, so large a grant should be given, why it should come out of the pockets of one particular class—the publicans—and why it is desirable to raise at the present time the whole thorny licensing question? I think the right hon. Gentleman will find it difficult to justify the imposition of a new tax at the present time. He has the largest surplus any Chancellor of the Exchequer has had for many years, and he has consequently plenty of material for what he proposes to do without making another inroad upon the pocket of the already menaced and harassed publicans. I am well aware that many hon. Gentlemen opposite regard the word "publican" as synonymous with "sinner," and consider that his pocket is to be bled as much as possible; but the methods of Dr. Sangrado are no longer approved by the medical faculty, and I would rather have been a Jew in the days of King John than I would be a publican at the present time. The calculations as to the Budget surplus are largely based upon a belief in the continuance of the recent abnormal increase in drinking. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has better means than I can have of forming an opinion on that point; but I would suggest that even the Treasury officials are not always infallible. The tendency of Budgets in recent years has been to show that the revenue from drinking has been, if not waning, at least stationary. The population has grown, but the revenue from the Excise has not increased with it, and I would like to ask whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer is fully convinced that there is no risk of the country returning to its previous more sober habits? What will become of the right hon. Gentleman's surplus if the rush to the wine bottle and the spirit decanter and the beer barrel, of which he has spoken almost with triumph, should cease? All that, however, I only wish to sound as a note of warning; and I pass to the consideration of the uncalled-for tax of 6d. on spirits. The distillers and brewers can protect themselves, but the retail dealer has no protection. It is true that if unscrupulous he can water or deteriorate his spirits, but if he be honest the tax must come out of the publican's own pocket. I am told that there are 64 glasses in a gallon of spirits; and although I have no special knowledge on the subject, I would ask my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is equal to the financial feat of dividing 6d. by 64? Rum, which is the sheet anchor of the right hon. Gentleman's finance, is sold at most of the public houses at 2½d. a glass, and as in the case of other spirits I am informed that there are of these 64 glasses in a gallon, which would make the receipt of one gallon 13s. 4d., while the cost of the rum being 3s., and the duty 7s. 6d., the profit left on the serving of 64 customers is just 2s. 10d., from which small sum the right hon. Gentleman proposes to take 6d. I put it to my right hon. Friend, does he think that this is fair? I do not see any method in which the landlord can distribute the burden among his customers unless he resorts to the base and unscrupulous method of adulteration. I am told that the trade would greatly have preferred to have had even 2s. put on spirits to this arrangement.

*Mr. GOSCHEN: I will do that if they wish it.

Mr. KING: I cannot promise my right hon. Friend that they will petition in favour of that suggestion; but I have been told they would have preferred it. No doubt my right hon. Friend comforts himself by the thought that, after all, he is benefiting the trade, and that in him they are entertaining an angel unawares; but, on the other hand, that does not appear to me to be a reason why spirits should be made to compensate beer, for, whereas 95 per cent. of the public houses are owned by the brewers, and one-half of the goods sold is beer, the result will be that, under the right hon. Gentleman's proposal, three-fourths of the compensation will come out of spirits; so that the bulk of the compensation will go into the pockets of the rich brewers, and the poor dispossessed publican will go out of his holding without a shilling in his pocket, unless care be taken by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board that he shall receive some compensation for disturbance. On this subject I would refer my right hon. Friend to a vigorous article which appeared in the Economist of last Saturday. I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman will think I am very ungrateful, and that he bases his chief claim to our affectionate regard on the reduction he proposes in the Tea Duty. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that "Blessed is he that expects nothing." He has reduced the Tea Duty by 2d. per lb., but I am afraid that although the right hon. Gentleman expressed great concern for the poor consumer, and virtuously repudiated the middleman, the same original sin lurks in this proposal as in the case of the Spirit Duty. The purchaser of half or a quarter of a pound of tea may derive some good from the reduction; but it is a fleeting and microscopic reduction, inasmuch as the purchaser of a whole chest would only receive 3s. 4d., whereas those in whose interest the reduction is supposed to be made—the poorer classes—who buy their tea by the ounce or half ounce, cannot receive anything unless my right hon. Friend can show some way in which 2d. can be divided by 16. I must here say that I view the proposed remission of the Tea Duty with great concern, because, in the first place, I think that no Chancellor of the Exchequer will ever have the courage to re-impose that duty; and when revenue is sought for in vain from that source the Income Tax collector will once more be called in to make up the amount that may be needed. In the second place, I regard the remission with concern because of the effect it is likely to have on tea planting in India. On this subject I can speak with some knowledge, owing to my connection with that country, and I say that the remission will do no good to the tea planters of India, who are prosecuting an industry in which millions of British capital are invested. It will be no compensation to them if that industry is jeopardised to be told that India will profit by the removal of the duty on silver plate, which I admit is called for by public opinion in India; but I warn my right hon. Friend that it is more than probable that the remission of the Tea Duty will seriously cripple one of the greatest industries of India by enabling the cheap and worthless teas of China to compete with Indian tea in this market in a manner it has hitherto been unable to do. I now come to the proposed reduction of the Inhabited House Duty, of which I most heartily approve. It is said that my right hon. Friend has introduced the principle of graduated taxation, and, for my part, I am not in the least afraid of that principle. On the contrary, I should like to see it extended on behalf of the class who wear the "rusty black coat;" and that brings me to a suggestion which I make with great deference to the authority of my right hon. Friend. It is based on a regard for those whose interests he has specially at heart. I mean those earning incomes of from £150 to £400 a year. What, I ask, do they gain under the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Let us assume that a man with an income of £400 a year is a married man with a family, and consumes a chest of tea in the course of a year; that he also consumes  $1\frac{1}{2}$  cwts. of currants, which probably would be in excess of his requirements. Let us also assume that his rent is £50 a year, and that he takes one glass of whisky a night, with an extra allowance of 19 glasses for festive occasions. The result would be that he would find he had saved 13s. 4d. on his tea and 7s. 6d. on his currants, £1 0s. 10d. on his House Duty, making a total of £2 1s. 8d. If from that we deduct 3s. for the whisky he has consumed to the extent of six gallons his total gain would have been £1 18s. 8d. My right hon. Friend started with a surplus of £3,500,000. He has proposed to allocate £300,000 of this for barracks, £100,000 for the Volunteers, £210,000 on currants, £80,000 on postage, and £300,000 on the police, making together a total of £990,000, leaving him with a balance of £2,510,000. Even after the most careful consideration of the right hon. Gentleman's apologetic utterances at the Mansion House as indicative of an unquiet conscience which induced him to think that some relief should be given to the Income Tax payer, especially to the class whose incomes are between £150 and £400, it will be seen that people of that class pay something like £4,700,000 a year, or more than one-third of the whole £12,200,000. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] I am afraid I have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, and my argument is, therefore, somewhat thrown out. My proposal would be that he should reduce the tax on such incomes by 2d. or 3d., which would still have made possible the reduction on the Inhabited House Duty and left over the sum of £320,000 to be applied either in repealing the Plate Duty or in subsidising the County Councils. I have to apologise to the House for the length at which I have spoken; but I have felt so deeply the immense claims of the classes for whom I have pleaded for consideration, and against the injustice that is being done to one of them by my right hon. Friend's proposals, that I have ventured to trespass somewhat longer than I ought to have done on the indulgence of the House.

(5.28.) SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I think that the hon. Member has accurately described the Budget as one which aims at too much and does too little. The Chancellor of the Exchequer frequently took credit for the large sums which had been liquidated during his period; but, like one of the characters in Molière, the right hon. Gentleman paid off debt malgré lui. He has deliberately reduced the annual fund for the payment of debt by £3,000,000, and if there have been surpluses they are surpluses which he has not expected or provided for, but which have depended upon windfalls, upon the profits from silver, or the large increase in the consumption of rum and other intoxicants, and were no part of the provision for the payment of debt. But that is not all. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has left out of sight, and kept out of the sight of the country, the fact that he has been making debt at the same time. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has practically created a debt of £5,000,000, which remains to be liquidated in the future, and instead of having made immense reductions of the National Debt, the fact is that he has destroyed the permanence and regularity of the liquidation of the Debt—a very different state of things to that which he has presented before us. With reference to the relief of taxation, I protest against the notion of treating the increase of the Spirit Duty as anything else than Imperial taxation, for there never was a more audacious fallacy than to say that the tax upon spirits is a tax levied upon the publican, and is to be disposed of for the benefit of the publican. A more unfounded suggestion was never made. We might just as well say that the Tea Duty is a tax levied upon the grocer, and that the produce should be disposed of for the benefit of the grocer, and similarly with the Tobacco Duty and the tobaccoist. The suggestion is fundamentally false in finance. The duty upon spirits is a duty under which the publican has no more right to expect special advantage than under any other tax; it is absolutely indistinguishable from any other tax. In some form or other it will be ultimately paid by the consumer, and therefore it should be regarded, like any other tax, as a consumer's tax. If the tax is agreed to by this House it must be regarded like every other tax, as belonging to the general public; it must be devoted to the general convenience of the country, and not to any particular class of the community or of property. My hon. Friend behind me, speaking of the reduction of the Tea Duty, said this proposal of the Budget was a half-hearted measure. That, I think, was a rather too complimentary term to apply to it, for it is, in my opinion, a third-hearted measure, and a very inferior one at that. I confess that I am glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has dealt with the Tea Duty, but I wish the right hon. Gentleman had taken off half the duty instead of one-third. I refuse to distinguish between the Spirit Duty, which he has appropriated to local purposes, and duties which are levied for other purposes under this Bill. They are all Imperial Duties, and must be regarded as such. Therefore, I hold that the right hon. Gentleman had, in point of fact, a sum of £4,000,000 to deal with, and I say that he would have produced a much much more simple Budget, as well as one of sounder finance, and one giving much greater relief, if he had taken off half of the Tea Duty and the whole of the Inhabited House Duty. I know that these are not the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; he likes to keep the skeleton of a tax even when he is obliged to take the flesh off. I prefer the corpse of the tax, and to see it well buried, as we have buried many a tax in former days. In the time of Sir Robert Peel and of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian there have been taxes on hundreds of commodities taken off, and I confess that I prefer the financial doctrines and financial practice of Sir Robert Peel and of my right hon. Friend—those great masters of former Budgets—to the doctrines laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-day. I have a few figures which I should like to lay before the House dealing with the subject of the Inhabited House Duty. I quite approve of the proposal to deal with that duty; and I agree with the hon. Member who last spoke that it would have been better if a clean sweep had been made of it, because it falls unequally and with undue severity on the lower part of the scale, while its exemptions in favour of the higher classes are extremely unjust. The man who just comes within the ranks of those who wear black coats pays a much larger proportion than the more wealthy man, and the reason is this, that he pays a larger share of his annual income for rent. I am happy to think that in later times men have been more willing to do this for the benefit of their families than they were in former days. A man with an income of £600 a year will pay as much as £100 a year for his house. If you take a sixpence off his Income Tax you relieve him to the extent of six hundred pence; but if you altogether abolish the House Duty you relieve him of a charge of nine hundred pence: and he belongs to the class who most want relief. But take the case of a man with an income of £10,000 a year, or from £10,000 to £20,000. I venture to say that the houses occupied by such men are seldom assessed at more than £500 a year, and I know many men of great fortune whose houses are assessed at from £300 to £500, and who therefore contribute infinitely less to the Inhabited House Duty than they do to the Income Tax.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): But suppose such a man has two or three houses?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The gallant Admiral may have three; indeed, I do not know how many flags he flies. I am taking the case of men of more moderate means, of men who have only one house. The figures on this subject are interesting. The Inhabited House Duty yields £2,000,000, and of that sum £1,250,000 a year is paid by houses of £100 a year and under. Now, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done nothing else, he might have struck off that portion of the tax at least. When we get to higher rates the yield is much smaller. Houses and shops of £100 to £150 a year yield only £200,000; houses of £300 to £500 yield £95,000; those from £500 to £1,000 a year yield £58,000; and when we reach houses of £1,000 a year and upwards the duty yields only £60,000 a year. It is quite clear that this is a tax of which the whole weight falls practically upon men of moderate means, and by sweeping it away, therefore, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have removed a burden which it is plain does not press equally on rich and poor. I shall not oppose the Second Reading of this Bill; but I confess that these seem to me to be very fair criticisms of general principles. I do not complain of the right hon. Gentleman for having dealt with the Tea Duty and the Inhabited House Tax; on the contrary, I approve of his having done so; all I wish is that he had reduced the Tea Duty by one-half, and taken away the whole of the Inhabited House Duty, as he might have done with the funds at his disposal. An hon. Gentleman opposite has compared the publican to the Jew of the Middle Ages, and said that he was in a still worse position. I never heard, however, that the Government of King John introduced a Bill to give compensation to the Jew for the extraction of his teeth. Therefore, I think the hon. Gentleman was a little hasty in taking a view of the publican that used not to be taken of the Jew, and he is a little ungrateful to the Government for what they are doing. Now, Sir, I come to the question of the hypothecation of particular duties to local purposes. If you are going to carry out the principle of hypothecating the duties for local purposes it is obvious that you will place upon yourselves great restraint and difficulty with regard to the increase or the reduction of those duties. If the localities are entitled to a certain proportion of the duties they may say it will be very unfair to them if the duties are reduced. On the other hand, it may be extremely unfair to the State if a large portion of the taxes are carried off for local purposes. By their proposed appropriation of the Spirit Duties the Government are placing themselves in a position of want of freedom and of restraint in dealing with the great pillars of Imperial finance. I do consider that this is a most important principle, and one which we ought to consider most carefully before we allow ourselves to be committed to it. My hon. Friend remarked that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was frequently taking credit to himself for giving relief to indirect taxation as compared with his dealings with direct taxation. I am bound to say that when he went to the

City of London the right hon. Gentleman principally enlarged upon the remissions he had made in direct taxation, and gloried in what he had done for the Income Tax. To other audiences, however, the right hon. Gentleman played on the other string of his fiddle, and enlarged upon what he had done in the way of remissions of indirect taxation. For my own part, I do not object to the right hon. Gentleman's running the horse which he thinks is most likely to win. But the comparison made by my hon. Friend behind me is, in my opinion, a fair one; and, if so, it cannot be denied that even taking the Budget of this year, which is supposed to redress the balance, that balance stands in favour of the remission of direct taxation. At all events, the relief, taking all things into consideration, that the right hon. Gentleman has given to direct taxation is more than double the relief which has been given to indirect taxation. I confess that I am not myself a convert to the new doctrine of appropriating the taxes in respect of the people who pay them. I have said already that I do not regard the Spirit Duty as being the special property of the publicans; and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that because his increase of income is due to the greater consumption of spirits, therefore relief should be given to those who contribute to this source of income, I reply that that is a new financial doctrine, and one which may lead to great difficulties hereafter. My opinion is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should regard his surplus as an Imperial fund, and that he should distribute it for the benefit of the community to the best of his judgment. The new standard which he sets up is perfectly unsound. It is a novel doctrine of finance. I claim to be a Conservative on financial doctrines, and I say it is a new doctrine to deal with the origin of surpluses on speculations of this kind. I have ventured to make these remarks upon the general framework of the Budget. I am extremely glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has had so large a surplus, and that it has been mainly derived from the increased prosperity of the country; for, after all, although it comes directly from the increased consumption of intoxicating liquors, that increased consumption arises from in-increased wages, which, of course, results from increased employment. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not think I have behaved at all unfairly in the spirit in which I have addressed myself to the consideration of his Budget. There are some things in it which I should have desired to see otherwise, and in the disposal of this large surplus I wish the right hon. Gentleman had dealt with it upon one large topic, rather than upon several smaller heads. That is no reason, however, why we should oppose the Second Reading of the Bill, although some of the clauses will require careful consideration when we come to consider, in Committee, the duties upon particular articles.

*(5.55.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I take a view somewhat different from that adopted by my hon. Friend the Member for Central Hull. It seems to me that this Budget affords immense relief to the smaller paying part of the community, which I have always held pays too large a proportion of the Imperial taxation. I regard the Budget, therefore, as a step in the right direction. My hon. Friend has described it as a Budget of petty items. That may be quite true from the view of opulent Members opposite who have derived great fortunes from breweries, and to whom these reductions are unimportant; but to the great mass of the people the reductions are of the utmost importance, for they will greatly benefit the hard-working classes. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby spoke of a man with £500 or £600 a year as just coming within the ranks of those who wear a black coat. That shows that he knows very little of the habits of the less well-to-do classes of the community. Men who have £600 a year do not pay £100 a year as rent.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I was only arguing to show that a reduction of the Inhabited House Duty would give greater relief than a reduction of the Income tax.

*MR. BARTLEY: And my point is, that by reducing the Tea Duty, the Currant Duty, and the Inhabited House Duty, the less well-to-do classes are mostly benefited. No man can eat more than a certain number of currants, and it is the poor who will reap the advantage of the reduced duty on currants, which form an attractive article of food. The man with a small income spends a larger proportion of that income on currants than the man with a large income. Therefore, I say the Budget is a step in the direction of reducing the inequalities of the incidence of taxation. I do not agree with the right hon. Member when he said the reduction of the Tea Duty should have been 3d. instead of 2d., and for this reason, that 2d. is divisible by four, and we want to get the poorer classes to buy their tea by the quarter of a pound. They are not likely to buy it by the half pound, and 3d. is not divisible into four. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has shown his wisdom in this matter. It is true many of the poorer people buy tea in small quantities, but we want to induce them to buy it in larger quantities, in which case they will get much better tea. Reference has been made to the Income Tax. All of us would be glad to see the tax reduced, and I hope when the Chancellor of the Exchequer considers the matter, as he may do in another year, he will consider whether there should not be a different rate of Income Tax for accumulated savings as compared with the savings of the current labour of the day. Personally, I think the Budget will give general satisfaction to most of the poorer classes. It is said it is an electioneering Budget. I do not know whether it is or not, but I am sure of this, that if our Friends opposite were in office they would certainly introduce electioneering Budgets. I notice that hon. Members opposite always criticise what is done by their opponents, but when in office never take the steps they have advocated. This Budget tends to equalise taxation, and I hail it, therefore, with great satisfaction. I trust that another year the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to go further in this direction.

*(6.3.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Before dealing with the second part of the Bill, to which I wish particularly to address myself, I should like to refer to the surplus which the Chancellor of the Exchequer finds at his disposal. As I understand him, he attributes the great increase in the consumption of spirits to increased prosperity. As far as the consumption of rum is concerned, the information which reaches me is that the increased consumption is to be attributed chiefly if not entirely to the influenza epidemic. Of course the Chancellor of the Exchequer has better means than I have of knowing in what part of the year the chief rise was, but it is curious that while in 1848 duty was paid on 2,430,583 gallons of brandy, in 1849—the cholera year—duty was paid on 4,479,549 gallons of brandy. It may not be uninteresting to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider whether the recent influenza epidemic had any relation to his surplus. It is not, however, in the sense of criticism that I have risen. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. King) sneered somewhat at the remission of the Plate Duty, and at the reduction of the Tea Duty. I quite agree with the wish expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that the reduction of the Tea Duty had been larger, but I fail to comprehend the argument of the hon. Member for Hull, that the reduction of the Tea Duty can be a mischief to the Indian tea trade. I suppose there is some reason in his mind which he did not communicate to the House, but unless there is some reserve on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of which I am ignorant, I understand that the reduction affects equally the tea coming from India and the tea coming from China. I do not quite understand, therefore, how it can be to the injury of the tea merchants or tea cultivators and those they employ, that the duty should be reduced. It is, however, specially with regard to the remission of the Plate Duty, that I rise to say a word, and, apart from the communication made to me, it would have been impossible for me to remain silent when the hon. Member for Hull stated that the public opinion expressed in India for the remission of this Plate Duty had been chiefly bi-metallic opinion. I was present at one meeting, attended by delegates from all parts of India, which did not express the slightest opinion in favour of bi-metallism, which did not discuss it, which I don't think cared much about it, but which certainly made a very strong appeal to the English Government to remove the duty on silver plate, and I put a Motion upon the Paper not merely at the request of those very persons, but also on behalf of a large English Association which is in no sense whatever connected with bi-metallism, but which has for years been agitating for the repeal of the Silver Plate Duty. I do not know that I ought to say anything upon the subject of hall-marking. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will, I suppose, say that another Bill will be introduced to deal specially with the matter of hall-marking. Unless that is so, my thanks to him for repealing the Plate Duty will have to be expressed with some caution. The whole of the silver plate made in India is made of rupee silver, which is of a less standard than the ordinary English silver. I understand from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that that is a point he has considered, and that he intends to make a legislative proposition to the House enabling the Indian silver to be hall-marked with a standard of its own. If so, that standard would have to be the standard of rupee silver, less the necessary reduction in the standard which arises from reducing it in the working-up into the very fine native work which we too seldom see in England. I do not know whether I have any right to infuse my own feeling into the matter, brought home as it was when the Chancellor of the Exchequer laid violent hands on some silver with which I had been temporarily entrusted. There is another point in connection with the hall-marking, which, unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer considers, he will not earn the gratitude of the Indian native population to the extent he otherwise might. The Indian silver work is very fine work, and very easily damaged unless the hall-marking is very carefully applied. I am sure the trade represented by the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Mr. Howard Vincent) will not do anything to injure their Indian competitors. Still, I should like it to be impossible that anything of the kind can happen. Considering the very great and influential pressure which has been put on the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I wonder the right hon. Gentleman really did repeal the duty. His action only shows that some of the old views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer still exist in his mind and make him do justice in a matter of this kind. The Budget has been attacked as a twopenny halfpenny Budget. I do not know whether that is a proper conclusion, but I am bound to say that a few twopenny halfpennies are sometimes of serious importance to those who get the benefit of remissions. The remission of the Plate Duty, even if it be a twopenny halfpenny duty, the hon. Member for Hull urges, is a remission which enables a possible development of an artisan trade which is not practised in this country, and which is of such a character that it cannot in any way compete with the trade of this country. While one is not astonished to hear from those Benches some of the old Protectionist doctrines occasionally trotted out, as they are likely to be presently by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Sheffield, I avow I was rather shocked to hear the hon. Member for Hull urge that injury will be done to the Indian tea trade by the reduction of the Tea Duty by 2d.

*(6.12.) SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): While expressing general approval of the Budget, I must express some surprise at the treatment both the barley growers and the brewers have received at the hands of my right hon. Friend. He did them justice at first, by withdrawing the extra 3d. a barrel, which, last year, he placed on beer, but 20 minutes afterwards he re-imposed it. Last year I placed on the Paper an Amendment to the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, limiting the duty to one year, and I only withdrew it on the understanding that my right hon. Friend would take the 3d. a barrel off this year if there was a surplus and if there was a general remission of taxation. Last year the right hon. Gentleman said the duty was to make up a deficiency of £300,000, and this year he asks for £386,000. To my mind the effect of this increased Beer Duty will certainly be in the direction of brewers watering their beer, less barley being used. What the tenant farmers, certainly in the corn growing counties, wished for originally was a total repeal of the malt tax. They never bargained for, and never asked for, a transfer of the tax from malt to beer. The repeal of the Malt Tax was considered a very important question in the prosperous days of agriculture, but surely it is still more important in these days of agricultural depression. In 1880, when the question of an increased Beer Tax was brought forward by the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, the present President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach), in speaking from the opposite Bench, said—

“In my opinion the price of barley will continue to fall and this will be the last nail in the coffin of the representatives of the most depressed industry in the country, namely, the corn growing industry.”

And on that occasion no less than 25 Members of the present Government voted against the proposal. I must confess I am astonished that the present Government should not have thought of the barley growers in this matter, and have relieved them of this tax. I renew my protest, and express the hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will consider this matter whenever he has another surplus.

*(6.15.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I rise to protest against the Bill on a question of principle. Whether I should move the rejection of the Bill is a matter which has somewhat puzzled me. I had thought of moving—

“That this House regards as unjust a proposal to impose fresh unequal taxation on alcohol in the form in which it is chiefly consumed in England, Ireland, and Scotland respectively, with the object of raising a fund to be equally divided amongst the three kingdoms.”

That embodies my objection to the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has refused to give us any information as to the taxation which is at present levied per gallon of proof spirit of alcohol in the form of beer and in the form of spirits. In Scotland the duty on alcohol is levied at the rate of 10s. per gallon proof spirit, while in England the duty on the proof spirit in beer only amounts to 1s. 6d. or 1s. 8d. per gallon. I do not ask the right hon. Gentleman to remedy what has passed, but here the Chancellor of the Exchequer is taking an entirely new departure on very questionable lines when he gives aids to Local Taxation, not directly from the Exchequer, but in the form of a share in a general tax. Last year the right hon. Gentleman told us that he was obliged to divide the Probate Duty to suit the exigencies of the case. I do not approve of any system which involves unfairness, but having started the system with regard to the Probate Duty

he now proposes to amend it in regard to this duty on alcohol. As a matter of fact, there is a larger annual consumption of alcohol in England per head of the population than in Scotland or Ireland. In England the annual consumption per head of the population is  $6\frac{3}{4}$  gallons of proof spirit; in Scotland it is  $4\frac{1}{2}$ , and in Ireland only 3, and yet in England the amount of duty paid per head on this alcohol is 11s. 8d., in Ireland 13s. 10d., and in Scotland 18s. 10d. The right hon. Gentleman now proposes to increase the duty on whisky by 6d. per gallon of proof spirit, and on beer by 3d. per barrel of 36 gallons. There cannot be less on an average in beer than 10 per cent. of proof spirit, and that will give you 1d. per gallon of proof spirit on the beer as against the 6d. on the whisky. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to bring the proceeds altogether and divide the aggregate equally amongst the three countries. Was there ever a more monstrous suggestion? I have no sympathy with the publican, and do not mind how much you increase the duty as long as you do not produce smuggling, but I say this is a grossly unfair proposal, and if I do not divide against it, it is only because it is mixed up with other proposals. I think that, under the circumstances, perhaps, the best course to pursue would be to single out this tax and to move an instruction on going into Committee stating that the new duty on alcoholic drink should be equalised on per gallon of proof spirit, whether the proof spirit be in the shape of spirits or beer. I hope hon. Gentlemen who take an interest in the question will come down to the House early to-morrow so as to make as good a fight on the subject as it is in our power to make.

(6.25.) MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): I do not think there is much in the chief objection to the Budget. That objection is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has tried to remove too many grievances and to conciliate too many interests. It is much better sometimes for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to do a little for a great many interests than to use his surplus in relieving one particular interest. This discussion has wandered over a very wide range of subjects. I should like to say a word about the removal of the duty on silver plate, referred to by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh). I am entirely in sympathy with the hon. Member in his remarks on the desirability of doing away with that duty. No doubt the imposition of the duty was looked upon in India as a real grievance. I am somewhat sceptical myself as to the results that will follow its repeal. The principal silver manufactures of India are very delicate works of art, and not useful objects likely to meet any large or general consumption. The great proportion of them are caskets for enclosing addresses for presentation to hon. Members who go out there to court the favour of the natives, and then there are card cases and so forth. It is extremely improbable that work of this kind will ever be largely consumed in this country, so that I do not think the clients of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Howard Vincent) need be much alarmed about the repeal of the duty. Something was said about the reduction of the Tea Duty being likely to prejudice Indian planters, and to benefit rather the tea of China. It must be obvious to the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), who said he could not understand the complaint, that the reduction of the duty will be much larger proportionately on the coarser teas of China than on the finer teas of India. On the other hand, of course, the cheaper teas are still placed at a disadvantage by a duty which is not levied ad valorem, but is a fixed sum for each pound of whatever quality, so that this argument cuts both ways. I wish to take an objection to the way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has dealt with the surplus he has obtained from the beer and spirit drinkers in this country. The principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman was that those who produced the surplus were entitled to the remission of taxation.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am afraid I must have used some incautious words. I said it should not be given back to them, but that alcohol should pay for tea. I did not intend to lay down a principle.

*MR. J. M. MACLEAN: I think I am correct in saying that the right hon. Gentleman said that what had been given to him by indirect taxation should go to the relief of indirect taxation. Well, I object to a particular application of this doctrine. He owes a great deal of his surplus to the increased consumption of alcoholic liquors, and he says he will make the tippler pay for the tea-drinker. I look on that as a very immoral doctrine for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to use in effecting a transfer of taxation. What right has the right hon. Gentleman, in his position as Chancellor of the Exchequer, to brand a large body of his fellow countrymen as tipplers? He had previously told us that all classes of society had consumed large quantities of strong drink, and so he had a surplus to offer us. But, why then did he go on to outrage the sensibilities of these consumers by denouncing them as tipplers? I know he may be said to have used the phrase humourously, and that he did not mean seriously to denounce everybody who takes a glass of beer or wine as a "tippler," but is there not at the same time some practical unfairness, some injury to these men, that you take their money and use it for the benefit of the tea drinkers? What satisfaction has the right hon. Gentleman obtained by this? The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) is not pleased. The hon. Member has one ruling idea of his Parliamentary life, and that is to compel other people to pay his taxes for him. He is not satisfied at all with the concession of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He never will be satisfied until the whole of the Tea Duty is abolished. Now, speaking seriously, I think it is a matter for the House to consider whether it is a just doctrine that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should annually raise money whenever he needs it by increasing the duty on beer and spirits. It seems to me that beer is quite as wholesome an article for anybody to drink as tea, and no doubt it always will be drunk. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer poses, as Chancellors of the Exchequer are apt to pose, as the champion of morality, while all the time they are jingling the money of the publican in their pocket. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks that a heavy tax ought to be imposed on beer and spirits to check alcoholic consumption, then he is bound to show that the increased consumption during the last year has had a distinctly demoralising effect. Is he able to do that? Can he show us there has been any increase in pauperism or in crime commensurate with the great increase in the consumption of alcoholic liquors during the last 12 months? If he cannot do this then what moral ground is there for the doctrine he adopts, and the distinction he makes between beer drinkers and tea drinkers? I certainly agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) that the hon. Member for Hull made a mistake in speaking against this new duty on beer and spirits as an impost upon publicans. No doubt, ultimately, the money will be paid by the consumer in one form or other—either he will have to pay a higher price or he will get an inferior article. It is a change which affects not the publican class alone—it affects the great body of the people of England, and the working classes particularly. We have seen the result of an increased duty on one class of alcoholic liquor imposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Everybody knows that since the new duty was put upon champagne we have had to pay a price much higher than the proportionate increase in the duty, and this is the inevitable tendency of taxation of this kind. Therefore, we ought to remember, when we think how cheap and easy a thing it is to increase the duty on beer and spirits, that we are actually levying a considerable tax in the country. I have heard it said that this is an electioneering Budget. Well, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer framed it with that intention, I think he has made a great mistake. A Budget of this kind will not increase the number of friends of the Conservative Government in the country, and I am strongly convinced myself that the line the right hon. Gentleman has taken of levying increased duty on beer and spirits will alienate a great many of the best friends of the Government. It certainly will not propitiate our fanatical friends opposite, who are invariably Radicals first and teetotallers afterwards.

*(6.35.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I do not propose to enter into the general question, but I desire to say a few words upon a point with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer dealt in one of the most eloquent passages in his Budget speech. I mean the growing expenditure of the Army and Navy. The right hon. Gentleman said that no apology was needed for this expenditure, considering the purposes to which it was applied, and most hon. Members, from this passage in the speech, would have thought that the right hon. Gentleman was intending to meet this expenditure by taxation within the year. But I will show that a very great proportion of the extra expenditure on these Services is paid out of borrowed money. Roughly speaking, it may be said that during the last three years the Chancellor of the Exchequer has increased the Army and Navy expenditure by the sum of £2,000,000 a year; and further, during the same period he has entered into obligations for extraordinary expenditure to the amount of £18,000,000, the whole of which will be raised by borrowing or by postponing payment to future years. I have found it extremely difficult to ascertain exactly the amount of the expenditure upon the Army and Navy which is to be met within the current year. There are no means of obtaining this information from the accounts put before the House, without an immense amount of trouble, and I very much doubt if the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or the Secretary to the Treasury, could say exactly the amount to be expended in the current year on the two Services. But by dint of questions to the heads of the two Departments, upon different items, and at different times, I am in a position now to say what the expenditure in the present financial year will be, and I think the House will be surprised to hear the total to be expended on these two Services. The amount is £38,163,000, or £7,000,000 more than was ever spent before in any year in time of peace. Of this amount, £31,497,000 appear on the Estimates, and may be called the ordinary or normal expenditure on the Services, and the remainder is for the following purposes:—£5,236,000 for new ships and their armaments, under the Naval Defence Act of last year; £180,000 is devoted to the building of ships for the Australian Squadron; £400,000 for fortifications under the Imperial Defence Act; £450,000 for the armament of these fortifications; £300,000 for new barracks, out of the

Budget and surplus; and £100,000 for the equipment of Volunteers from the same source. Thus we have £6,666,000 for extraordinary expenditure upon the two Services, and the House will be surprised to hear the various shifts and devices by which this money is provided. £1,400,000 falls upon the Consolidated Fund for the year, under the Naval Defence Act of last year; then there is an item of £128,000, which, under a new and dangerous process, is paid out of unexpended balances of last year on Army account; then comes £64,000 under the Imperial Defence Act, charged by way of annuities in the Estimates in regard to the Australian Squadron; then £400,000 is provided out of the surplus, and deducting these amounts from the £5,666,000 there remains a sum of £4,774,000 unprovided for in the Budget of the year, and which is borrowed or the payment of which is postponed over future years. The payment of £3,800,000 is spread over seven years, the payment not beginning until 1892, £116,000 is spread over 12 years, and £712,000 will be paid out of the dividends from the Suez Canal shares after 1894. These are the various operations, methods, shifts, and devices by which provision for expenditure within the year is avoided. Roughly speaking, it may be said that of the extraordinary expenditure upon the Services of, say, £6,500,000, we pay £2,000,000 within the current year, and spread £4,700,000 over future years. I need hardly remind the House that, under the Sinking Fund established by the late Lord Idlesleigh and my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh, the amount which ought to be paid for repayment of debt within the year would be £5,000,000, and I presume we shall repay debt by that amount; but then, on the other hand, we borrow to the extent of £4,674,000, so that practically the operation of what the Chancellor of the Exchequer is doing this year in respect to extra expenditure is really to suspend the Sinking Fund for the year for the amount which ought to go in reduction of debt, and which I suppose will, in a certain sense, be paid, will, on the other hand, be withdrawn by borrowing or suspending payment. That does not seem to me to be wise finance, and seems to me to present a dangerous precedent for the future. I need hardly point out that the only real check within the Government itself is the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Treasury. The two great spending Departments are always desirous of increasing expenditure, and this tendency is kept in check by the wish of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to avoid increase of taxation, and to obtain credit for the reduction of taxation, but if it is laid down as a precedent for the future that by spreading payments of money expended over future years the Chancellor of the Exchequer can obtain credit for his finance, while still borrowing or incurring debt, then it seems to me a dangerous liberty is given to Admiralty and War Office Expenditure. For this I must hold the present Chancellor of the Exchequer largely responsible. It was my fortune to serve under the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he was at the Admiralty in the years 1871-73, and I should like to call attention to a comparison between the expenditure of the two great spending Departments, the Admiralty and War Office, then, and the expenditure of the present year. In 1871 the Army and Navy expenditure was £22,735,000, of which the Navy absorbed £9,770,000. For the present year the normal expenditure is £31,500,000, and, including extraordinary expenditure, £38,360,000, so that the increase in normal expenditure has been 44 per cent. in the interval, or, including the extraordinary expenditure, the increase has been 70 per cent. Looking back at the year I have mentioned, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, then First Lord of the Admiralty, was controlled by two great economists at the Treasury, Mr. Lowe, the present Lord Sherbrooke, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian. But for that control, I have no doubt, those responsible for the Navy, as well as those responsible for the Army, would have launched out into all kinds of expenditure, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was then quite ready to be responsible for the Naval Service and the security of the country at an extremely modest expenditure as compared with the present. For my part, I see no justification for this enormous increase of naval and military expenditure. I believe it is not required, and that if the Treasury had kept a firm hand of recent years over these Departments the expenditure would not have been found necessary. But if the Chancellor of the Exchequer joins the ranks of the professional alarmists, and if, at the same time, he can claim credit for reducing taxation by postponing payment, all checks will be got rid of, and there will be no limit to the demands that may be made in the future. For one part of the Budget I have nothing but praise; I refer to the reduction on Indian and Colonial postage. The high rate of postage has been in the past a perfect scandal, and it was quite time a portion of the surplus should be devoted to its reduction. I must congratulate the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker Heaton) on the success of his efforts in this direction, and I must say I was somewhat surprised at the tone of the Postmaster General's remarks at Bradford in reference to the hon. Member in which he spoke of the hon. Member as the "fly on the wheel," whose buzzing had become offensive. I should hardly have expected such language towards a supporter of the Government, and I think the right hon. Gentleman would have been wiser to have acknowledged the assistance of the hon. Member for Canterbury in his efforts to induce the Treasury to give way on this point. Many other Post Office reforms are urgently needed. For my part, I think that for the past four or five years the present Treasury has starved the post Office, and many important reforms have been postponed in order that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might realise the surplus Post Office Revenue. The Secretary to the Treasury seems to dissent to that, but he will not deny that there has been a growing surplus derived from this source in the past three years.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Gross Revenue.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: In the net surplus in the last three years. Within four years it has increased £760,000, or at the rate of £190,000 a year. In 1860, after deducting the cost of the Packet Service, there was a surplus Revenue of £440,000; in 1870 of £1,173,000; in 1880 of £2,225,000; in 1890 of £3,500,000. Of course there have been some ups and downs in the intervals, but, looking broadly over the period, that is the rate of progress, and at the present time there is a larger surplus than before. On the Post Office Vote I shall attempt to show the effect of the Treasury screw on necessary and urgent Post Office reforms, but I should hardly be justified in doing that now. For the moment I congratulate the Government on giving up £80,000 for Indian and Colonial postage, and I think they might well have devoted more of their surplus to Post Office reforms. I hope the hon. Member for Canterbury will not be discouraged by the somewhat contemptuous terms in which he was referred to by the Postmaster General from urging still further those reforms in the Post Office which are urgently required. There is no Department of the Public Service where expenditure is more valuable than in the Post Office; it gives immediate facilities to the public, and in the long run is almost certain to result in an increased revenue. All the money expended in this direction yields a good return, and the Post Office stands in quite a different category to all other Services. In reference to the Indian and Colonial postage, I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any information to give us as to the disposition of the Indian and Colonial Governments—are they prepared to assist in the new arrangements; will they contribute towards bringing the reduction into effect very shortly?

(6.55.) SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I will not follow the right hon. Gentleman into his calculations and details; but I may say I cannot attach any material importance to the charges he makes against the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because we all know that the expenditure upon our defensive forces was, after full discussion, adopted by this House and universally approved by the country, which was not content to go on in an unhappy state of unpreparedness, subject to constant panics and fits of hurried expenditure, but has approved the policy that is placing our Army and Navy on a footing the magnitude of our interests requires. Passing from this, I wish to express my gratitude to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the fulfilment of his promise in a certain direction I desire to indicate. I am one of those who considered that there was still an account remaining unsettled between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Local Authorities when the Horse and Wheel Tax was withdrawn; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by his proposals in regard to the surtax on spirits and the Beer Duty, has, in a bold and novel manner, largely reinforced the local finance and done what he could to make up for the deficiency caused by the abandonment of the Van and Wheel Tax. There is one other point to which I wish to draw attention. For the first time in the history of finance a contribution in aid of local finance has been raised from indirect taxation. Hitherto all the sums that have been devoted to the purpose of aiding the burdens of the local taxpayers have been by way of subvention or contribution arising out of direct taxation. Now, for the first time, indirect taxation is applied to the purpose. That is a new departure, which gives us hope that further aid will be granted from Imperial sources to local rates. Exception has been taken to the allocation of the Beer Duty to local purposes. Now, there is no class which received more benefit from local taxation, while paying small contributions, than brewers. The abolition of the turnpikes was a great gain to the brewers, who, while the turnpikes existed, paid their fair share to the maintenance of the roads. With the disappearance of turnpikes their contributions ceased. Taking the Budget as a whole, it appears to me to deserve to be popular in the country. Taking it as a whole, it is a Budget that gives relief to those classes who are most entitled to ask it. I believe that the reduction of the House Duty will be widely appreciated, and that the more the provisions of the Budget generally are studied the more they will be approved by the country. I therefore give it my most hearty support.

*(7.5.) MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I rise to enter my protest against the unfair way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has levied further duties on wine, beer, and spirits. Spirits already pay six times the duty on beer, reckoned by alcoholic strength, and spirits pay half as much again as wine, reckoned in the same way. No doubt, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will reply that the duty is levied on the various articles in a different way, and that in the case of beer it is levied not on alcoholic strength, but on specific gravity; but my contention is that there ought to be a uniform way of levying the duty on intoxicants, so that there may be a fair incidence of duty on the drink consumed in different parts of the country. Taking it per head of the population of England, Scotland, and Ireland, the duties on intoxicants are now paid by the peoples of the three countries in almost the following proportions per head:—England, 12s.; Ireland, 14s.; and Scotland, 19s. This is in consequence of the want of uniformity in the mode of assessing the duty on alcoholic drink. But the unfairness of the incidence of the duties is no greater than the unfairness with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends to allocate these duties for local purposes. He told us in his Budget speech that he intended to give them to the three countries in the same proportion as the Probate Duties are now given, which is 80 per cent. to England, 11 per cent. to Scotland, and 9 per cent. to Ireland. As the new duties are something like £700,000, this division will tax Ireland and Scotland for the benefit of England. The precise figures it is not easy to ascertain at present; but it is clear that Scotland and Ireland will not have returned to them for local purposes so much as they will be called upon to pay, by a sum exceeding £10,000 per annum, and such a state of things will be condemned generally by hon. Members from both of those countries. With respect to the duties on dried fruits, I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have swept away the whole of them. As it is, he only proposes to deal with currants. From the duties still to be imposed he will only receive £300,000 or £400,000, and, therefore, I think he might have abolished the lot. I hold it is self-evident that no Minister in these days would ever venture, no matter what the necessity might be to put a tax on food, and a sufficient portion of the magnificent surplus might have been applied, with benefit to the poorer classes of this country, in the complete abolition of the Dried Fruit Duties.

*(7.12.) MR. JACKSON: Perhaps I may be allowed to endeavour to answer some of the questions which have been raised in this discussion. I think that, so far as the criticism of the Budget has gone, we have no reason to complain of any of the speeches made. There seems to have been a general expression of opinion that, upon the whole, it is a satisfactory Budget, especially so far as the constituencies are concerned. The hon. Member for the Poplar Division, however, thought that my right hon. Friend has rather missed a great opportunity, and that he would have done better to make some great alteration than various small remissions. Yet, in the course of his speech, the hon. Member avowed himself in favour of those remissions which my right hon. Friend has made. Taking the general feeling of the House with regard to the four or five small remissions, it seems to be that they are wise in themselves and beneficial to the country. A complaint has been made that since my right hon. Friend has been at the Treasury he has given greater relief to direct than to indirect taxation. That is not so. When my right hon. Friend remitted 2d. from the Income Tax it was because he felt it his duty to take it off. It was put on for a special purpose, and that purpose having been served he felt himself bound to take it off. Excluding that 2d., in regard to which I maintain my right hon. Friend had no discretion, I submit that he has granted more relief to indirect than to direct taxation. The hon. Member for the Poplar Division appears to think that the amount of money being handed over to the Local Authorities is too large. There are probably not very many Members who will agree with him in that view. The hon. Member must himself recollect the Resolutions which in the past were carried against the Government, compelling them to give additional financial relief to the Local Authorities.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The Local Authorities are being given more than was promised them in 1888.

*MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member says it is more than was promised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1888; but that is because, upon the basis then laid down, the sums turned out to be larger than had been estimated. The hon. Member has also alleged that this provision is in relief of realty. But does the hon. Member consider that all the local rates are paid by realty? If so, realty must contribute £20,000,000 a year in the form of local rates, and the reduction by £1,000,000 would not be much relief viewed from that standpoint. The hon. Member for Hull and the hon. Member for Oldham both referred to the Tea Duties, the former expressing a doubt as to whether the pocket of the consumer would be in the least benefited, and the latter doubting whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer would get many thanks for what he has done. As a matter of fact, however, I can assure the hon. Member for Oldham that evidence is accumulating every day at the Treasury that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has secured a great deal of thanks for what he has done in this direction. With regard to the point of the hon. Member for Hull as to the effect on China tea, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there is no reason to doubt that Indian teas will be able to hold their own, notwithstanding this reduction of duty. As to the Beer Tax it has been asserted that both the public and the farmers will suffer—the former because brewers will water their beer, and the farmers because they will get less for their barley. These arguments, however, were urged last year, when the tax was originally imposed, and experience has not shown that it has led to any depreciation in the quality of the beer or to any fall in the price of barley. I am not sure that the Central Chamber of Agriculture, of which my hon. Friend is a member, has not refused to consider this question, or to endorse the opinion that the interests of barley growers will be seriously interfered with. Two hon. Gentlemen who represent different divisions of Glasgow have referred to a question of great importance, namely, as to the proportions in which these sums have been allocated to the Local Authorities of the three Kingdoms. I think I shall be able to show that this apportionment has been based on fair and just principles, and in accordance with the sources from which the total Revenue is raised, and that this apportionment is in fact slightly against England, and slightly in favour of Ireland and Scotland. Taking the Tax Revenue at £75,764,000, it is found by means of the most accurate calculation it is possible to make that £61,224,802 is paid by England, or 80·8 per cent.; £8,027,158, or 10·6 per cent., by Scotland; and £6,512,040, or 8·6 per cent., by Ireland.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Will the hon. Gentleman state on what authority he gives these figures? I am not aware that they are to be found in any public document.

*MR. JACKSON: The figures have been obtained by the Department, and I believe that they are as accurate as it is possible for figures to be made.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Will the hon. Gentleman state the proportion which the taxation bears to the production of Excisable articles, such as spirits?

*MR. JACKSON: Yes, presently. I may repeat that the figures have been made up with the greatest care. They may be accepted as being as accurate as it is possible for such figures to be made. In these figures the Post Office revenue is not included. Taking the surplus from the Post Office at £3,500,000, and distributing it between the three countries in the proportion of the number of letters calculated to be delivered in each country, the percentages will be found to be slightly different, namely, 81 per cent. contributed by England, 10·5 per cent. by Scotland, and 8·5 per cent. by Ireland.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): Has the hon. Gentleman made allowance for articles cleared in England but consumed in Ireland?

*MR. JACKSON: Yes; there has been some allowance made. It is quite true that there are cross items between the two countries, and also between England and Scotland. It is true, for instance, that beer comes from Ireland to England, and also from England to Ireland, and that tobacco is sent from Ireland to England, and I am not aware of tobacco being sent from England to Ireland. Allowance is made for these facts, and the figures work out as I have said, 81 per cent. for England, 10·5 per cent. for Scotland, and 8·5 per cent. for Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in making the apportionment of the Probate Duty allocated 80 per cent. to England, 11 per cent. to Scotland, and 9 per cent. to Ireland, so that England receives 1 per cent. less than its due, and Scotland and Ireland a half per cent. more than their due.

*MR. PROVAND: May I ask if allowance is made for Income Tax collected in London, but in respect of Scotch and Irish incomes, from sources such as shares in public companies?

*MR. JACKSON: I have already said that we have made all the allowances which we consider ought to be made in arriving at these figures, and upon being checked they will be found to be accurate. I will state to the House a few figures which will show the House how the taxation is apportioned and how it is allocated among the three Kingdoms. Out of a total of £3,704,000, £3,059,218 is paid by England, £388,594 by Scotland, and £256,188 by Ireland. The percentage of contributions, therefore, are 82·6 per cent. paid by England, 10·5 paid by Scotland, and 6·9 paid by Ireland. The distribution gives to England £2,963,200, to Scotland £407,440, and to Ireland £330,000. Therefore England receives £96,018 less than she pays, Scotland receives £18,846 more than she pays, and Ireland receives £57,000 more than she pays. I think that it will be seen that my right hon. Friend has given a distinct advantage to Scotland and Ireland as compared with England. The comparative figures showing the proportion of the Probate Duty paid by each country are these—England, 88 per cent., Scotland, 8 per cent., and Ireland 4 per cent. But according to the more recent figures there would come to hand for the last nine months an actual contribution of 90 per cent. from England, 6·5 from Scotland, and 3·5 from Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman, I believe, intends when he has got the figures into something like shape to lay them before the House in a clear form, in the event of hon. Members deeming them to be of sufficient interest for that course to be adopted. I think, therefore, that I have shown that the charge of unfairness which has been made with reference to the allocation of this local taxation is without foundation. The only injustice that has been done in the matter is that too much has been taken from England and too little returned to her.

*DR. CAMERON: I do not allege unfairness as regards Scotland in the distribution of the Probate Duty, but in the distribution of the new Spirit and Beer Duty.

*MR. JACKSON: It would not be fair to single out the Spirit Duty without taking into consideration the whole case, which shows that Scotland and Ireland have been unduly favoured at the expense of England. The right hon. Member for Bradford has made some rather good-natured remarks with regard to the action of the Treasury in dealing with the Post Office; but I can say most conscientiously that since I have been at the Treasury not only have the Post Office and other Departments not been stinted in any justifiable expenditure, but every application for extension of buildings and acquisition of sites has been met by the Treasury in a most reasonable spirit. I do not mean to say that they have yielded to every application, because I am sure that the Treasury have made the Post Office and every other Department show that the money they asked for was really needed in justice to the Service. The hon. Member for Northampton has rather warned my right hon. Friend that he had almost come to the conclusion that the surplus of last year was due to the epidemic of influenza; but I am glad to be able to inform the hon. Member that although the influenza has left us the buoyancy of the revenue continues. I hope that hon. Members will now allow the Bill to be read a second time.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The hon. Member has declared that the Budget is a most popular one in the country. I ask what country he refers to? That is certainly not the case as regards Ireland, because it throws a most unfair burden upon an article of large consumption in that country. I object to the hon. Member laying mere results of calculations before the House instead of the figures upon which those calculations were based. Three years ago Mr. Giffen showed that Ireland contributes more than double what she ought to do to the Imperial Revenue. We are kept in the dark; we have no materials to go upon. A bland Minister rises at the Table whenever a financial debate occurs, and gives us some meagre fare in the shape of what he calls the results of calculations. I say with regard to the estimates of the relative proportions paid by the three countries, we have every reason to doubt them. In our view the proportion paid by Ireland is nearly double what it ought to be. The hon. Gentleman has said that this new Spirit Tax will be in proportion to the yield from it, as in the case of the Probate Duty. What has the Probate Duty to do with it?

MR. JACKSON: You have got your share of it.

MR. SEXTON: The basis of the relative contribution from the three countries is no argument for the distribution of what is derived from the tax on alcohol. There is no possible relation between the two subjects.

MR. JACKSON: I think the hon. Member perhaps misunderstood what I said. I did not say that the allocation is made on the proportions of Probate Duty contributed. If the distribution were on the basis of the Probate Duty contributed, Ireland would get one-half what she is to get.

MR. SEXTON: Why did the hon. Gentleman refer to the contribution of Probate Duty at all?

MR. JACKSON: I only mentioned it to show that at the time the Probate Duty was allocated, my right hon. Friend fixed the proportions which local taxation should receive in the three countries.

MR. SEXTON: The only meaning of the reference to the Probate Duty was that the proportions correspond to the taxes received in the three countries. I say Ireland is at present unfairly taxed. It is very difficult to arrive at a conclusion so long as the Government act upon the policy of refusing us the materials on which they arrive at their own conclusions. May I remind the Government what happened five years ago when a similar attempt was made by a Liberal Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had no surplus, but a deficiency to make good? His position, remember, was a much more justifiable one than that of the present Chancellor in imposing new taxation, because he had to meet a deficiency. He made a proposal of the very kind which we are now protesting against. He proposed an increased duty on alcohol, and he was met with this Resolution—

“That increased tax on beer and spirits was inequitable in the absence of corresponding addition to the duties on wine”

Mr. Sexton

The Party opposite—whose chief object appears to be to show in 1890 how far they are willing to proceed in the adoption of more than one article of the financial policy which they denounced in 1885—with the help of the Irish Members defeated the Liberal Government on that very point, and drove them out of Office. If it was inequitable then, it is inequitable now. The duty on wine has not been materially altered. The duty on beer has been altered by  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. or 1d. per gallon, which is about the increase made by the extra duty of 3d. per barrel. You propose to put 6d. a gallon on spirits—a proportion which you described as inequitable in 1885, when a Liberal Chancellor of the Exchequer was struggling with a deficiency, but which you now adopt with a surplus of £3,500,000. Therefore, in regard to justification of the tax, you are in a worse position than was the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1885. With his £3,500,000 surplus, the Chancellor of the Exchequer deals with it to the extent of £500,000 of expenditure and £3,000,000 in remissions. In the expenditure Ireland has no substantial interest; and in the remissions, she will only benefit to a small extent for the remissions on tea and currants, altogether, perhaps, to the amount of £150,000 or £200,000, a proportion very much less than her fair share in the way of remission. In the Memorial of the Irish distillers to the Chancellor of the Exchequer there are three statements. The first is as to the inequitable dealing between the three countries with regard to the tax on alcohol, and also as between the classes. The present tax on foreign wines is 3s. 10d. per gallon; on beer, 1s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; on alcohol, 10s. per gallon. The tax on alcohol is six times as heavy as that on beer, and three times that on wine. Alcohol is the drink of the people; wine the drink of the wealthier classes. That is unjust as between the classes. It is also unjust as between the countries. Beer is the national beverage of England; whisky, for climatic reasons, is the national beverage of Scotland and Ireland. The tax on alcohol in Ireland is three times as great as it is in England. That fact cannot be disposed of by general arguments as to the proportions for the three countries to the whole Imperial Revenue. What is the relative consumption in the three countries? Taking the consumption of alcohol in all its forms, the consumption in England over the year is  $6\frac{1}{2}$  gallons per head, in Scotland  $4\frac{1}{2}$  gallons, and in Ireland 3 gallons. That is to say, that England consumes one and a half times as much as Scotland, and twice as much as Ireland per head. What is the taxation per head? In England it is 11s. 8d.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman give me his authority? I make it 14s. 1d.

MR. SEXTON: It is the Memorial addressed to the right hon. Gentleman by the Distillery Trade and Wholesale Spirit Merchants of Ireland. In Ireland the taxation per head is 13s. 10d.; and in Scotland 18s. 10d. From the figures I have given, the just standard of taxation in England ought to be 31s. per head, in Ireland about 7s., and in Scotland only about half what it at present pays. Taking these three elements of calculation together it does appear that you have managed to make the taxes in Ireland about three times what they ought to be, and in Scotland about double. There is one point on which I wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question. In what proportion is this £1,300,000 to be raised to be contributed by England, Ireland, and Scotland? He was unable to give us a reply. But surely hon. Gentlemen must see that the reply to that is only relevant to the present Debate. We have the fact before us that alcohol in Ireland is taxed six times as much as it is in England. Yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to add 6d. a gallon to the article manufactured and consumed in Ireland, and to raise the duty per head in the country by about 2s. How does he propose to raise the money? He proposes to raise one-third of the amount on the English beverages and two-thirds upon the Irish and Scottish drink. And how is the money to be applied? I say that if you are raising a new tax of this kind for local purposes, so much of the tax as Ireland contributes ought to go back to the local uses of Ireland, and so much as Scotland contributes ought to go back to the local uses of Scotland. You only raise £386,000 on the English beverage, and you propose that England shall get £1,000,000 of the whole sum; and though you raise £700,000 on the Scotch and Irish beverage, you propose that Scotland and Ireland shall only have £250,000. I venture to lay down the principle that the fresh taxation from England, Ireland, and Scotland in this case ought to be proportionate to the amount to be given to each of the three countries for their local uses, and I fail to discover what right you have to levy two-thirds of your £1,000,000 on Irish and Scotch manufactures, in order that you shall pay the money over for the purpose of super-annuating English policemen, for extinguishing English licences, and for the general purposes of the English County Councils. Of the infinitesimal proportion of the whole million—only £100,000!—that you give to Ireland, you propose to lock up £40,000 for the purposes of of your precious Land Purchase Bill, and the remainder is to be distributed by a Department over which the Irish people have not the least control. So far from this being a defensible charge, it is a most audacious proposal. Having proposed to make more oppressive the inequality in the incidence of taxation, and having proposed to tax still further an article of Irish manufacture and consumption, you propose to spend the bulk of the special levy on the local uses of England. For my part, I shall ask my Party to divide against the Second Reading of the Bill because I regard this proposal as extremely oppressive to our country, and I shall feel it my duty to oppose the measure in its further stages. The Irish people were told at the time of the Union—it was one of the main arguments of Mr. Pitt in advancing the project of the Union—that Ireland would benefit by the connection with England, that the wealth of the richer country would fructify to the benefit of the poorer. Well, we have had 90 years' experience since the date of the Union to the present day. We have never benefited by the wealth of England, but the effect of the Union has been to cast on us an unfair share of the burden of the Imperial Service, and an unfair contribution to the Imperial Revenue. I rather think that the idea of Dr. Johnson was accurate, when he said, with regard to the Union with Scotland, that you would have robbed the Scotch if they had had anything of which you could have robbed them. If he had lived in our day he would have said, "You have found an opportunity of robbing the Scotch." As to Ireland, the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is of a most oppressive character, as it taxes the last industry that is left to us. That industry being already oppressively taxed, the right hon. Gentleman proposes to add to that taxation for a purpose I declare to be indefensible. He is subsidising local purposes of England at the expense of the Imperial Revenue drawn from Scotland and Ireland.

(8.35.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

* (8.37.) COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I am anxious to take the opportunity of saying a few words upon the Bill not so much in criticism of the general principles of the Budget, but on one or two subjects in which I feel particular interest. In passing, I need not say I have any sympathy with the hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Buxton), who began the Debate in which my hon. Friend the Member for Central Hull (Mr. King) spoke in a sense opposed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I hope the Secretary to the Treasury, who at present represents the Chancellor of the Exchequer, will not think me ungracious or ungrateful, if, while I thank the Treasury for the considerable assistance they have given to local rates, I say I feel a very strong objection to what is really only another form of subvention towards the existence of local finance. I do not want to argue the matter upon the grounds of orthodox economy, but the point that has forced itself upon my mind is that so long as assistance to the rates is given, substantially by way of subvention, we cannot expect to get quite the same interest taken in the proceedings of the County Councils by the gentlemen who form those important bodies that we should if they were responsible for raising the money. This will become more evident to the Secretary to the Treasury if he remembers that the subventions that are given to the County Councils are, in most cases—in one or two cases I know they are—very much larger than the rates the counties themselves have to levy.

Mr. Sexton

While a sum of money so large is in the hands of the County Councils, and the Councils have no direct responsibility in the raising of it, it can hardly be expected the Members will take the same interest in its ultimate allocation as they would if the money was the result of a tax more or less elastic in its character, and which they could levy. Local finance will never be upon a really satisfactory and sound basis until some equitable tax is found for what I call subventions. The present system of rating is so obviously unjust that people are naturally ready to cry out for assistance towards the rates. I am not now speaking of the taxing of realty and personalty, but the taxing as between land and other real property. What is wanted is some tax by which all the people in the country can be, more or less, taxed in the same degree for the object in which they are all interested. Of course, it is clear to the Secretary to the Treasury, as well as to the hon. Member for Essex, that whether men are farmers or landlords in the matter of rating they are subjected to the grossest inequality. It is that gross inequality which makes the County Council so anxious to have some means of increasing their resources without committing a great injustice upon a considerable portion of the community which they represent. I repeat that while I gladly acknowledge the assistance the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given to local rates, I think local finance cannot be placed on a sound basis until the County Council themselves have some tax made over to them in lieu of these subventions, the incidence of which tax will bear equally on all who live in the country—a tax which may be raised or lowered without considerable injustice being done. There is one other matter to which I desire to direct attention. It seems to me the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) did not quite catch the explanation of the Secretary to the Treasury as to the allocation of the Revenue from spirits. It may not be fair to make Ireland and Scotland contribute through the Revenue to the local resources of England, but the hon. Gentleman appears to have overlooked the fact that England contributes to the local resources of Ireland and Scotland by handing over to those countries a greater share of the Probate Duty than they have a right to receive. But it is one thing to say that the hon. Gentleman declines to recognise that view of the question, and another thing to say that one agrees altogether with the particular principle that the Treasury have adopted in the allocation of these grants. It is very difficult to say that we ought to take money from one country and hand it over to another for local purposes. At any rate there is something very unsatisfactory about it. I believe it is true that the incidence of the new taxation on spirits will be much greater in the case of Ireland and Scotland than in the case of England. Whether it may be, in the abstract, just or not it does not seem satisfactory to use money raised in Ireland or Scotland for local purposes in England. [Home Rule Cheers.] Yes; but on the other hand, it is no less satisfactory that English resources in the shape of Probate Duty should be used for local purposes in Ireland and Scotland. Another point to which I wish to draw attention is that which the hon. Member for Poplar and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby seemed anxious to fix upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the idea that there should be a system of graduated taxation. It is one thing to have graduated taxation for the purpose of taxing wealth as such, and a totally different thing to relieve the pressure of taxation by means of a graduated system upon individuals whose incomes are of a somewhat restricted character; and persons with limited incomes have had the pressure of taxation removed from them. Then it seems to me that my hon. Friends the Members for Central Hull and Poplar were not quite just to the Chancellor of the Exchequer when they said that the effect of the small diminution in the Tea Duty will not be felt by the classes whom it is supposed most to benefit. If the diminution of the tax is small, and if its effect may not be felt immediately, I imagine that in the long run the remission will make a considerable difference to the people. As small increases in the duty on articles of consumption are felt by the consumers, so in the converse way small decreases of duty must be felt by the consumers. I feel that our taxation should rest upon a broader and less contracted basis than that on which it at present rests, but, subject to my views about the disposition of the money which is to be applied to local purposes, and to which I may possibly endeavour to give effect in Committee, I shall certainly support the Budget proposals as embodied in the Bill.

(8.54.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): It seems to me that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should either have abolished the whole of the Tea Duty or let it entirely alone, for no possible advantage will accrue to the masses from the nibbling policy he has pursued. I rose mainly, however, for the purpose of correcting a statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer respecting the profits of the tea dealers in the East End of London, and on which he founded an argument. On Friday last the right hon. Gentleman amended that statement, but not sufficiently. The blunder in calculation made by the right hon. Gentleman was an extraordinary one, and it was the more inexcusable because, contrary to the usual practice, he made his statement first and sought for evidence to justify it afterwards. The mistake he fell into was only the natural consequence of his course of action.

*MR. GOSCHEN: What action?

MR. PICKERSGILL: The day after the right hon. Gentleman made his statement, on April 21, he sent a Custom House officer to the East End of London post haste to purchase some packets of tea, and the inquiries were conducted with such haste that halfpenny packets of tea were mistaken for penny packets.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I never sent anybody.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Then I and other Members and a large number of people in the country have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman's statement. I understood the facts to be that after the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his statement on April 21, a Custom House officer was sent to the East End to obtain 24 halfpenny packets of tea, and we were told that in this part of London shopkeepers were selling tea at the rate of 5s. per pound. The right hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity of further correcting his statement, which he now seems anxious to disavow. The statement, however, showed a complete failure to appreciate the conditions of retail trade, if not a strong animus against the small traders themselves. I am very sorry that the poor of the East End are obliged to buy their tea in halfpenny packets, but this is inevitable as long as the large part of the population remains on the verge of starvation, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer will try to so improve their condition that they will be no longer compelled to make such small purchases, his efforts will be welcomed. In the meantime, I protest against the unfounded and cowardly attacks that are being made upon a body of citizens who, though poor, are as respectable as the right hon. Gentleman himself, and are not only useful but, I believe, necessary members of society. Is it reasonable to expect that a trader who sells his goods in almost infinitesimal parcels should get only the same price as the trader who sells in large quantities? The right hon. Gentleman has ignored the radical distinction between the two classes of trade, and equally has he ignored the conditions under which the trader at the East End of London carries on his business—the grinding rent and the intolerable burden of rates, which in the East End is double that imposed on those in the West End, in such districts as St. George's, Hanover Square, which the right hon. Gentleman represents. The right hon. Gentleman produced an impression that the small traders in the East End of London are making enormous profits, but I, speaking with knowledge on the subject, can say that this class have the greatest difficulty in keeping their heads above water, and few sections of the community are more entitled to public sympathy. In a sense, no doubt, these traders are middle-men, but I do not know that it lies in the mouth of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to level taunts against middle-men. The middle-man who deals in tea is at least as respectable a man as the middle-man who deals in money, and it is hardly fair that men who acquire colossal fortunes by means of one class of operations should be ready to fling stones at those who scrape together a humble livelihood by another class of middle-man operations. The right hon. Gentleman may say he knew nothing of the conditions of the trade; then he had been more prudent had he said nothing about it. Now, I propose to correct the right hon. Gentleman's corrected statement about the profits on the retail sale of tea. In this box I have 24 halfpenny packets of tea, which are open to the inspection of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen. These packets were bought over the counter in the ordinary way of trade in Bethnal Green and the neighbourhood, and I may say they were bought soon after the right hon. Gentleman's original statement, to which I was prepared to offer a contradiction long before he made his correction on Friday. I did not buy these parcels myself, or suggest their purchase. I have a constituent practically interested in the subject, who some years ago was a general trader in the East of London, and his esprit de corps seems to have been wounded by the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he, therefore, procured from 24 shops a sample of tea for a halfpenny, sending his little son, 10 years of age, into shops after nine at night, while he, his father, remained outside, so that it is a perfectly bona fide transaction, and I can vouch for the integrity of my correspondent. I have had each of these parcels weighed by a practical man, a counterman accustomed to the use of scales, under my immediate supervision, and of these 24 packets 11 weighed, at least,  $\frac{1}{2}$  oz. each without the paper; that is, the tea was sold at 1s. 4d. per lb.; 11 other parcels weighed 6 drachms each net, and the price, therefore, was 1s. 10d. per lb.; one weighed a little over 5 drachms, equal to 2s. 2d. per lb.; and one weighed  $\frac{1}{4}$  oz., being at the rate of 2s. 8d. per lb. Finally, I had the packets weighed together, and the net weight of the tea was 10 $\frac{1}{2}$  oz., so that this is the quantity of tea that is sold in the East End of London in small parcels. In other words, the average price in halfpenny packets is 1s. 6d. per lb. This, I think, contrasts very favourably with the second statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As regards the quality of the tea, I have taken the opinion of an expert, and while, in two or three cases, it is true the parcels contained merely tea dust, and was very bad, in the majority of cases the tea was full leafed and of fair average quality. Now I have discharged the duty I took upon myself. I have no doubt there are general dealers at the East of London who get exorbitant profits out of the poor, and sell adulterated goods, and I should be glad to join with the right hon. Gentleman, or anyone else, in exposing and, if possible, punishing these exceptionally dishonest traders, but, as regards the general body of small traders, I come to the conclusion, after careful observation and inquiry, that there is little reason for complaint. I hope these remarks which I have ventured to make in the House to-night, may be the means of removing, at all events to some extent, the cloud of suspicion and distrust raised around these humble traders by the unfounded—and I am afraid I must say cowardly—attack upon them by a Minister of the Crown.

* (9.10.) BARON DIMSDALE (Herts., Hitchin): In a few words, I wish to treat the Budget from an agricultural point of view. There are points in which justice has been done to agricultural interests, but others where much is left to be desired. In the first place, as one who joined last year in the protest against the unfair way in which local finance was treated, I have to express my thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for what he has done this year in this regard by the allocation of £393,000 to the reinforcement of local revenue. But the point upon which I would dwell for a few moments is the injury that is inflicted upon barley growers and beer drinkers, an injury which falls specially on the agricultural interest. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in introducing the Budget, explained that he should be unable to reduce the Income Tax because he owed something to the classes who had procured for him a large amount of the surplus. I thought there was some force in that argument, but then, as the right hon. Gentleman proceeded, he arrived at what, I think, is a very illogical conclusion. No less than £1,800,000 of the surplus is the result of the increased consumption of alcoholic drinks, and yet the right hon. Gentleman places extra taxation on the barley-growing and beer industry of the country, while he gives relief by a reduction of the duty on tea, upon the consumption of which article there was a considerable reduction in 1889. That seems to me to be a most illogical proceeding, after expressing the intention to give relief to those who provided the surplus. He offers them no relief, but burdens them with increased taxation, and reserves his special favours to the tea drinkers, who are entitled to no relief on the principle he has himself laid down. I do not complain of the Tea Duty, though I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has pursued but a half-hearted policy in the right direction. He should have made the reduction more considerable, if at all, to have made it a real benefit. I would not have the Tea Duty abolished altogether; that would be a mistake. Cutting off from time to time indirect taxation means an extra penny added to the Income Tax. If the right hon. Gentleman had not reduced the Tea Duty at all I should not have grieved very much. Now, last year we had considerable discussion upon the Beer Tax, and a strong feeling was evinced against the tax, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not give way on the question, and many of us withdrew the opposition we entertained when the right hon. gentleman was careful to point out that in putting this extra tax upon beer he did not intend it to be a lasting tax, and he intimated that it would be taken off when the Revenue should be in a satisfactory state. The Chancellor of the Exchequer intimated that it was only imposed to meet the increased war expenditure. Well, the Revenue is in a satisfactory state this year. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, acting as the representative of the Aberdeen Government for the Brewing and Barley Growing Interest, during the Crimean War, put an extra tax of 10 per cent. upon malt, but he said it would be taken off again because it was imposed for a temporary purpose. Lord Palmerston, who succeeded Lord Aberdeen, when the temporary purpose was served, took off the tax, for he always kept his word. But now we are placed in a worse position than before, because if it continued to be an Imperial tax, we should have a considerable party opposed to its continuance, but now that it is given over to the County Council the practical effect of that ingenious operation is to separate the interests of the owners and the occupiers of the land. Another peculiarity of this arrangement is the ear-marking of this Beer Duty to be applied to the special purpose of compensation for the closing of public houses, and in this, I think, a want of confidence is exhibited towards County Councils in supposing that they would not carry out the principle of compensation unless a particular tax was ear-marked for the purpose. This, too, is at variance with the declaration made by the Prime Minister in 1885, just before the General Election, when he said, in giving the control of public houses to Local Representative Bodies there would be ample guarantee that too many houses would not be unnecessarily or recklessly closed, because the funds under local control. But now you are withholding that control, and the money is to be devoted to a special purpose. The tax, having been imposed for a temporary purpose, ought to pass away when that purpose is served. And now a word as to the tax on beer and spirits. The fact is it was upon this question that the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was turned out of office in 1885, and I think we owe some explanation to those who united with us then in turning out the Government of that day, when we are now pursuing the same policy then pursued by our opponents. Depend upon it it is a great mistake to act upon one set of principles in office and another in opposition. I can entirely acquit the Chancellor of the Exchequer of any share in that, for I believe he supported the Budget of 1885 by his independent vote and speech, and now introduces to the Parliament of 1890 proposals based upon the same lines, and the same principles as were embodied in the condemned Liberal Budget of 1885.

(9.22.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I desire, in a few words, to call attention to that branch of the subject which deals with the allocation of funds derived from Imperial sources to Scotland and Ireland. The Secretary to the Treasury very rightly said the subject is of very considerable importance. It is of considerable and growing importance on political grounds, to which I will not now allude, and because of the line the

Baron Dimsdale

Chancellor of the Exchequer has adopted in dealing with the transfer of Imperial funds for local purposes. The Secretary to the Treasury, during his speech, was asked several questions as to the foundation upon which he based the figures he gave us, and I think Scotch and Irish Members were justified in their interpolations, and we have reason for making a searching inquiry. The subject has, from time to time, been before the consideration of Parliament during the past five or six years, and various opinions have been given by financial authorities, but we are still in a state of considerable ignorance as to the exact state of the contributions from Scotland and Ireland and the Imperial Exchequer, and what the proper proportion should be of the sums which are to be allotted to purely Scottish and Irish purposes. In 1883 this subject was raised in the House by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway and the late Member for the Partick Division, and a Return was furnished in 1884. I have not had the time, nor do I possess the knowledge, to make a comparison of the figures in this Return with those given by the Secretary to the Treasury, but on the face of them there appears to be discrepancy. I observe that the Return has an addendum to the effect that the Treasury are not responsible for the accuracy of the Return, and I think we are justified if we evince a considerable amount of—I will not say mistrust—but of curiosity, and a desire for information as to the basis of these figures given by the Secretary to the Treasury. There are three methods by which it has been proposed to help local taxation out of Imperial Funds. There is the method of absolutely assigning over to the Local Authorities a tax which they collect and spend. There is the old system, in operation two years ago, of grants in aid given in proportion to the sums spent on the particular object by the Local Authorities. Lastly, there is the method proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1888, and which has been in operation from that time until now—that of assigning these sums from the Probate Duty to Local Authorities. These are to be given to the Scotch and Irish authorities in proportion to the general contributions of Scotland and Ireland to the Imperial Exchequer. The Secretary to the Treasury has given figures to the House to-night with the object of showing that the principle of distribution stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1888 is a fair one to Scotland and Ireland, and the proportion which the right hon. Gentleman then laid down as a guide was that Scotland should get 11 per cent., Ireland 9 per cent., and England 80 per cent. The hon. Gentleman then went on to describe the proportion in which the grants are to be allocated, and, commenting on the sums already given to Local Authorities out of the Imperial Funds since 1888, stated that they consisted of two large sums, the grant from the Probate Duty and this proposed grant from the increased Spirit Duty. He showed us what the proportion would be from the Probate Duty, but he was not able to show what the precise allocation would be from the increased Spirit Duty alone. I do not think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will deny that the contributions from Scotland and Ireland will be considerably in excess of what they will obtain in the shape of grants from the Imperial Exchequer. It is not fair to retort that those two countries have received more than their share out of the Probate Duty; the fact remains they will get considerably less than their share from the Spirit Duty. I submit to the Chancellor of the Exchequer this consideration, that, undoubtedly, the smaller and poorer nationalities of Scotland and Ireland expect to be treated with some consideration in regard to this question. They have reason to complain of the unfairness of the proposals made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I should like to have from the right hon. Gentleman some further information as to the basis on which the figures quoted by the Secretary to the Treasury are calculated, in order that the House may be able, before the Committee stage, to form a definite judgment on the equity of the proposals as they affect Scotland and Ireland. As the matter at present stands I think the impression conveyed is that the method by which the Chancellor of the Exchequer endeavours to aid local expenditure will, in the long run, press most heavily on the smaller nationalities.

tion has been drawn by several of my constituents. In Clause 3 of Section 1 I find a proposal to abolish the duty on currants from the first day of this month, and I am informed by my constituents that, as a matter of fact, the trade in currants is done chiefly in August and September. It would, therefore, be of great convenience to that special trade if the reduction of the duty were postponed till some date in the autumn. I cannot help congratulating the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the fact that while removing the duty on currants he has been able to obtain some equivalent from Greece. I think it is satisfactory that our exports have been encouraged by the removal of these duties, and I hope that this principle, which has now been established, will be acted upon more frequently in the future, and that we take care to receive some equivalent advantage in our turn when we take duties off commodities imported from other countries. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer was wise in taking the duty off silver plate, because these goods come mainly from India, where they are manufactured in large quantities. The duties charged on the importation of our chief manufacturing commodities into India is, comparatively speaking, a light one, and I think, therefore, we owe some return to India for the policy the Government there have pursued. The remission of this duty will not only be a gain to India, but it will encourage the industry of the manufacture of silver goods generally, and probably be the means of making the relationship between the value of gold and silver less marked than at the present time.

9.38. MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I propose to confine my remarks to the second portion of the Bill. I think we have some cause for satisfaction with regard to the abolition of the Gold and Silver Plate Duties in knowing that at last the fatal step has been taken. For a large number of years the trade has been interfered with during the month or two preceding the Annual Budget Statement, because those employed in the industry have not known what course the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take. This state of uncertainty has now been put an end to by the action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has been subjected to a good deal of pressure from those connected with the trade, a great many of whom are in favour of the retention of the duty. The right hon. Gentleman has allowed a drawback with regard to silver plate, but he has refused it in regard to gold plate, and from my experience of the trade I can tell him that a large number of small manufacturers and small shopkeepers have been very hard hit by the sudden action which he has taken. The effect of the abolition of the Gold Plate Duty is especially marked in the case of wedding rings, and I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman whether he cannot re-consider his decision and allow a drawback in the case of wedding rings. From the estimates which have been made I believe it would only cost him some £5,000, and while that is an infinitesimal sum to him, it represents a very large sum to the dozen or so of manufacturers doing business mainly in London and Birmingham, upon whom the loss will fall. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether something cannot be done for the wedding ring makers, if for no other class of persons employed in the gold plate trade.

*(9.45.) MR. AINSLIE (Lancashire, N., Lonsdale): As one of those who took action in the matter, I should like to say how grateful I am to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for having listened to the representations made to him on behalf of the lodging-house keepers, who will experience some relief under the provisions of the Bill. Several of the speakers to-night have made reference to the abolition of the duty on silver plate. I may remark, with reference to that, that instances may arise in which hall-marking is not altogether an advantage. I desire to see some relief given in the direction of the import of silver articles from India. I am one of the few Members of the House who really represent India, as I was born there, and I think I can speak on behalf of that country quite as much as some Members can speak on behalf of their particular constituencies. I have but one other point to refer to. I am somewhat disappointed that the Income Tax has not been reduced, because it seems to me that a reduction of that tax is to the benefit of the working classes. Many men, whether rightly or wrongly, live up to their incomes, and immediately the Income Tax rises they meet it by reducing their staff of domestic servants, while, when it falls, the staff is increased. I do hope, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will take the next opportunity of reducing the tax, and thus find employment for some of the many idle hands throughout the country.

(9.47.) MR. DILLON: When I read the Budget speech I felt great disappointment at the treatment to which Ireland was proposed to be subjected. I recollect that only about two years ago, in the course of a Debate which took place in this House, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to some observations from myself, assured me that he felt there was a great deal of force in the complaints which were made by Irish Members of the unjust incidence of taxation on the Irish people, and he added—I suppose by way of comforting Irish Members after the rejection of the Home Rule Bill—that it would undoubtedly be the duty of Finance Ministers in the future to give the most serious attention to the facts placed before them with regard to the financial relations between Great Britain and Ireland. What has been the history of this matter of the unequal incidence of taxation as between Great Britain and Ireland? It has been a very simple one—that all the remissions of taxation which have been the boast of successive Chancellors of the Exchequer for the past 50 years have been of such a character as to bring more relief to Great Britain than to Ireland. We have heard in the course of this Debate of the hundreds of taxes that have been swept away during the last half century; but all these taxes so remitted were of such a character that the relief was more felt in England than in Ireland. On the other hand, the taxes which have been increased during these years, almost without exception, have weighed more heavily upon the Irish people. When I come to examine the incidence of taxation as between the two countries what do I find—that especially on tobacco and whisky have the taxes been increased, and the Finance Ministers of this country have by that means been enabled to compel the poorer population in Ireland to pay at least two or three times their just share of the contribution to the Imperial Exchequer. The people of Ireland, I may say, since the time of the Union, have been engaged in making unavailing complaints against the gross injustice. So long ago as 1864 a Committee of the House sat and reported very fully on the subject, and from that Report a good deal of useful information can be obtained. The question was again discussed in the House in 1886, when Mr. Giffen, who is allowed to be the greatest authority on statistics in the country, turned his attention to the financial relations between Great Britain and Ireland, and what was his verdict? It was that the people of Ireland are paying more than double their just proportion into the Imperial Exchequer. That undue and unfair proportion of taxation, which has been the one cause of the terrible poverty of the Irish people, has been brought about by the taxes on tobacco and whisky. It is not for me now to enter into the question as to whether or not the Irish people drink too much whisky, or ought to drink something else. I wish the Irish people would drink no whisky at all. But that is not the point. The question is, have the Government a right, because they think the Irish people consume one particular form of drink, to throw the burden of taxation on that article? If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had any intention of acting in the spirit of the declaration to which I have alluded, the last thing he would have thought of doing when he required additional money would have been to increase the very tax which has been the cause and the root of the injustice to which I have referred. The Chancellor of the Exchequer found that the Wheel and Van Tax was defeated—a tax which would have fallen with infinitely greater heaviness on the people of England than of Ireland—in fact, so far as my constituents are concerned I believe it would not touch them at all, for they generally remove their goods on donkey carts. He then had recourse, on the principle of least resistance, to the old and well worn resource of British financiers—namely, the article of Irish whisky. He accordingly proposes under this Bill to put an extra duty of 6d.

in the gallon upon an already over-taxed article; while with regard to the alcohol contained in beer he taxes it only in proportion of one-sixth, as compared with Irish whisky. In fact, he proposes to tax the people of Ireland six times as heavily on their national drink as he proposes to tax the people of England on theirs; whereas, even if he made the tax even in each case it would be still grossly unfair and unjust to Ireland. When the hon. Member for West Belfast put forward our objections against this scheme, how was he met? The Secretary to the Treasury stood up and referred him to the distribution of the Probate Duty. But that is not the question before the House—it is a question of an extra tax of 6d. on Irish whisky. When we come to inquire, as well as we can inquire, having regard to the very small amount of information at our disposal from the Government, into the distribution which is to be made of the taxes, we find that the grievance of which I complain is increased twenty-fold. I believe I am right in saying that England will get back four-fifths of the entire sum contributed, whereas in all probability she has not contributed more than half. [No, no!] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cry “no;” but if my calculation is not an accurate one why did not the Chancellor of the Exchequer tell us the true figures, and why has he refused to do so? I protest against any tax on Irish whisky or tobacco. By increasing the tax on those articles you are doing a grievous injustice to Ireland, and one which the Irish Members will insist on bringing forward in this House in season and out of season. Again, in the remissions which have been made the Irish people are unfairly treated. You say you are striving to maintain the Union. Is that the way to do it? I say that for no purpose have you a right, having regard to the financial arrangements of the two countries, to lay this extra tax upon those articles, and least of all have you a right to place a tax upon those articles and then distribute the proceeds in the way in which you propose to distribute them, a method of distribution which will not benefit the Irish people. In the matter of remissions, it is undoubtedly true that the Irish people are unfairly treated. What is the one chief remission you have made?

It is just the old, old story of Budgets in the past, remitting taxes to the sole relief of the people of Great Britain, and imposing taxes on Irish whisky or tobacco. I say you have no right to impose this tax and then to distribute the proceeds of that tax in the unfair way you do. The object of this tax is to buy out and extinguish licences in England. The House has not yet consented at all to that principle of buying out licences. I think it monstrous and outrageous to levy a tax on an Irish article of consumption to carry out an object which this House has not sanctioned at all. I protest against this doctrine. We know perfectly well that 6d. a gallon on whisky will come largely out of the pockets of the poor in Ireland. Is that the message of statesmanship to Ireland? Have the poor peasantry of Ireland to pay compensation to the publicans in England? The business of the publican in England may be a very bad thing, but you find plenty of men to take it up. It is nothing short of an outrage to drag out of the pockets of the poor peasantry of Ireland the funds by which these English publicans are to be compensated, if the proposal is ever to pass. Then a large part of it is to be used for the superannuation of the English police. Can anything be more outrageous or unjust than to take the money of the people of Ireland for that purpose? Surely the people of England ought to provide for their own police. The Secretary to the Treasury has refused to give us the only information we asked for, and which the Government ought undoubtedly to have had in their hands when they proposed this to the House. I hold in my hand a Return which was made in 1883, when the present Chairman of Committees was Secretary to the Treasury, on this very subject. He puts the amount of revenue collected in Ireland at £8,194,978. But we are informed by the present Secretary to the Treasury that Ireland only contributes a little over £6,000,000.

MR. JACKSON: The figures which I gave are as far as can be ascertained the amount paid by the consumers.

MR. DILLON: I know that; but in a note to this Return it states that owing to the way the accounts are kept it is impossible to get an accurate Return of what Ireland contributes. All we know is that over £8,000,000 is collected in Ireland for the Revenue. I am not prepared to say that it does not fall below that amount, but Mr. Robert Giffen and other high authorities have placed the contribution of Ireland at a very much higher figure than that given by the Secretary to the Treasury. But the Secretary to the Treasury adopts a practice which is inadmissible in debate; he produces a set of results supplied to him by various officers, and which we have no means of checking. Nobody in the House has greater respect than I have for the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury; we on these Benches all recognise his kindness and courtesy; but the inconvenience of a method of statement of that kind is obvious. But I put against the authority of the Secretary to the Treasury the authority of Mr. Robert Giffen, and from these contradictory authorities emerges the fact that nobody knows what Ireland contributes to the Imperial Revenue; and you have no right to found any arguments on any statements of this kind. It is absolutely essential, for the guidance and information of this House, that you should be in a position to lay on the Table a Return showing and proving how much Ireland contributes to the Imperial Revenues of this country. I contend that it is outrageous to levy this extra tax upon Ireland, and to proceed to distribute it, leaving Irish Members and Ireland absolutely in the dark as to the contribution of Ireland to the Imperial Revenues. The Secretary to the Treasury went on to say that Ireland in reality only contributed 4 per cent. to the Probate Duty. That may or may not be the case, but it strikes me that it is most extraordinary that when this subject is broached from one side everything diminishes and dwindles away, and when it is approached from another side. [Dr. TANNER: It is like agrarian crime.] Yes; my hon. Friend reminds me, it is like agrarian crime, which, when a Coercion Bill is wanted, swells up like a balloon; and when it is desired to show the salutary effect of coercion, the country is then a perfect model of peace and order. The Secretary to the Treasury says Ireland contributes only 4 per cent. to the Probate Duty; but I find that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, when arguing against us in the debate of 1886 on this very question of the relative contributions of the three countries, undertook to show that Ireland was only contributing a just proportion. He took the Returns of property on which Probate and Legacy Duties were paid for three years, and he brought out this result—that property in England was 13 times the value of the property of Ireland. According to the Secretary to the Treasury it is as one to 25. So, when we make out that we are paying much more than our proportion, we find the Legacy Duty and Probate is as one to 13; but when we try to get back our money from England the Legacy and Probate Duty dwindles away to one to 25. Before you move a single inch in this matter of the distribution of grants for local purposes between Great Britain and Ireland, you are bound to give us a fair, full, proper, and conclusive Return of the relative contributions of the three countries to the gross Revenue of the United Kingdom, so that we may be able to know how much the 6d. a gallon on spirits will bring from each country. How unreasonable the position of the Government is. We all know how much a 1d. Income Tax brings in. I contend that it is outrageous to proceed to levy this tax for local purposes without ascertaining the details of the tax. If the tax be passed, as I hope it will not, it will constitute another Irish grievance. [Laughter.] Certainly. I do not quarrel with this Session of Parliament, because it seems to me that the Ministers are devoted to the well-known manufacture of Irish grievances. They say—"They are our chief stock-in-trade, and we are doing a flourishing business in them." We have no objection to the manufacture from one point of view. That tax is expected to bring in £1,250,000.

*MR. GOSCHEN: No; the amount is £700,000.

MR. DILLON: Then, I have made a mistake in my figures, but, at any rate, you are to get back £118,000 as Ireland's share of this tax, and I say that, in addition to the grievances attaching to the way the tax has to be raised, you are proposing an unjust distribution of the money, which materially increases our grievance. First of all £40,000 of Ireland's share is to be tied up from use until a Local Government Board is constituted in Ireland, and the whole of the £118,000 is to be used without our consent as a guarantee of the Government for the Land Purchase Bill, so that we absolutely get nothing at all. The £40,000 is to be tied up until the proposed Local Government Board is constituted and has power to deal with licences, but when will that be? We have no knowledge as to when we shall get those Local Bodies, and the House ought to remember what our experience in regard to Local Bodies has hitherto been. We were told three years ago we were to have local government, but now we seem even further away from it than we were then, and, in point of fact, our prospect is something like that of a man who when climbing a mountain sees an eminence before him which he thinks is the top, but as soon as he has climbed it he finds that the real mountain top is almost as far away as ever. As it is, the money is to be tied up for an indefinite time, until the Government see fit to declare that Ireland is in a normal condition—a condition in which it never has been in the memory of man. During all this time we are to submit to this unjust tax. Is this fair and even treatment as compared with the case of the English and Scottish people, who get their shares at once. With regard to the £7,000 which is to be given ultimately towards primary education, that also is to be tied up as a contingent guarantee. We go upon the principle that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush, and therefore protest against being celled on to vote this tax while we have no security that we shall ever get half of the money, and therefore, Sir, I side with my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast in calling on our friends on these Benches to divide against this Bill, and to offer it at every stage all the opposition we can give. If you insist on imposing this extra tax of 6d. on Irish whisky, you may depend upon it you will not have heard the last of it when this Bill is carried. You will find that you have laid up a store of trouble that will manifest itself for years to come. Before sitting down I would appeal to our Scotch friends to aid us in resisting this Bill, because while it is one that will inflict cruel injustice to the people of Ireland, it will undoubtedly inflict injustice on the people of Scotland, less perhaps in the case of Scotland, because the Scottish people have deeper pockets, and a Scotchman would less feel a robbery of £1 than an Irishman would feel a robbery of half-a-crown. The tax is one which, if passed, will plunder both the Scotch and Irish people for the benefit of the English, and therefore it is an outrageous proposal which every Scotchman and Irishman is bound to repudiate.

*(10.25.) MR. GOSCHEN: I entirely admit that the strongest attacks which have been made upon the Budget have come from the Scotch and Irish Members, and it is to that part of the Opposition that it will be my duty mainly to confine the few remarks I have to make. Otherwise I am bound to say that it strikes me that to a great extent everybody who has taken part in this Debate has been answering everybody else. One hon. Member contended that the additional Spirit Duty would be paid by the publicans; another immediately replied it was absolutely certain that it would be paid by the consumer, while a third hon. Member was as certain that the real loss would fall, not upon the publican or the consumer, but upon the barley-grower. For my part, I am not prepared to decide between these great authorities as to who will ultimately have to bear the burden of the tax, but I am inclined to agree with the right hon. Member for Derby that ultimately this tax will be borne by the consumer. It is possible that for a certain time the publican may suffer, but I do not think for one moment that the barley-grower will be permanently affected by the tax. Then as regards the Tea Duty, some hon. Members say that the remission will only benefit the middlemen, but this suggestion was promptly replied to by other hon. Members, who said that the consumer will benefit, and as far as I can judge, it is certain that a large portion of the benefit consequent on the reduction of the Tea Duty will go to the consumer. Then as regards the assistance given to the County Councils, some hon. Members were of opinion that it was wrong for the Government to give any such assistance. On that point, however, I am bound to say that the requisitions made upon the Government to come to the assistance of the County Councils have proceeded as much from County Councils in which Liberal opinions prevail as from those in which Conservative opinions preponderate. The next general charge made against the Budget, and which found considerable favour against hon. Members opposite, and approval from some hon. Members who sit on the Ministerial Benches, is that the surplus has been frittered away. But I noticed that scarcely any single hon. Member has pointed out the direction in which I ought to have frittered. A certain number of duties have been inherited by me. There is the Volunteer Grant, for instance. Hon. Members opposite have so convinced themselves, since the present Government have been in power, that it is necessary to assist the Volunteers that they lent a hand with great readiness to hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side in defeating the Government on this question, and it certainly does not lie with those hon. Members to complain of these proposals with regard to the Volunteers after the vote of the House. Then I presume that that is a point upon which we have not frittered? Then I come to the £300,000 given towards the cost of barrack accommodation. Having an ample surplus, I thought it right and orthodox that we should pay that sum out of the Revenue for the year. I have noticed that hon. Members from Ireland, who are extremely and properly anxious with regard to barrack accommodation in that country, have treated that as one of the points in which Ireland has great interest. There, again, is an item with regard to which I do not think any reproach can fall upon me. I now come to another small item, namely, the colonial postage. There is only one Member of the House who has raised any objection on that; and there, again, is a matter on which I do not think any reproach can rest on me. [Interruption from the Irish Members.] I am referring to the propriety of having dealt with these particular points, and answering an objection which I think I am bound in courtesy to take notice of. In the smaller concessions I have made I have been doing that which I think the public and this House have demanded should be done. Now I come to the Silver Plate Duties. There has been not an absolutely unanimous, but a fairly unanimous feeling that remission was the proper course to take, and, again, the hon. Member acquits me of having frittered in this direction. Well, I am getting on. I say that as to the Silver Plate Duties I had very little choice in the matter.

Previous declarations on the part of other Chancellors of the Exchequer, and the recommendations of Select Committees and Commissions, imposed this upon me as a step which ought to be taken. I come to another comparatively small remission, with regard to which I have not heard a single word of remonstrance—the diminution of the Currant Duty. That, I think was absolutely justified, looking at the great service we have been able to render to Greece, and the compensation to our manufacturers we were able to secure from that country. While, in the abstract, hon. Members complain of small remissions, this is a small remission to which no exception has been taken. There remain only the Tea Duty and the House Duty as the two large concessions that have been made; and whatever magnificent notions hon. Members may have as to the preparation of Budgets, I think that a remission of £1,500,000 on one particular article is not a small remission. An hon. Member has said we had better have reduced the duty by one-half, as it would then have been easier to have abolished it altogether; but the Government are not prepared to pave the way for the abolition of the Tea Duty. There remained about £600,000, and I do not think any Member of the House has contended that that balance was not properly bestowed in relieving the house occupiers between £20 or £60.

MR. DILLON: We contended that the House Duty was not properly apportioned.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am glad, at any rate, to think that the Irish participate to the full in the reduction of the Tea Duty and the duty on currants; and it has been recognised that the classes occupying these houses are entitled to relief. Ireland has no share in the House Duty, and therefore in this respect the Irish are a happy community.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid.): It would not pay to collect the House Tax in Ireland.

\*MR. GOSCHEN: Houses above the value of £20 are free from the obligation of paying the duty which unfortunately has to be paid in England and Scotland. But, at the same time, I quite admit that Ireland would not gain by the abolition of the duty. But I must go on with my general argument, and I will approach the Irish and Scotch question by itself. I have endeavoured to prove that the remissions I have made have been remissions that were apart from the great controversy as to whether I ought to have taken a penny off the Income Tax, and that they have been such as have recommended themselves to public opinion, and I do not believe that any large portion of that remission will fail to reach the quarter which it is intended to benefit. The hon. Member for Finsbury spoke of the grievance under which wedding-ring manufacturers suffer through receiving no drawback. Well, it is impossible to reduce duties without involving hardship in some quarters. Those who have laid in a considerable stock of currants, for instance, will lose; also those who have laid in a large stock of tea. I have been asked not to allow the proposal with respect to currants to come into operation before the 1st of October; but the result of inquiries in both the wholesale and retail dried fruit trade has convinced me that more harm than good will come from the concession, and I cannot, therefore, agree to postponing the operation of the Bill until that date. In the same way as in the currant trade the manufacturers of wedding rings will have a certain loss. The case is certainly hard on them, because I understand their profits are extremely small, and the duty is heavy as compared with their profits; but without opening the whole question of drawback, we were unable to make the concession which the hon. Member demands. If such a concession were made to the manufacturers, it would immediately be claimed by the retailers, and I have had communications from pawnbrokers also on the subject. It is difficult to find out what is a new wedding ring. Old ones are burnished up, I understand, so as to appear new; and on looking at the matter broadly, though anxious to find some means of meeting the grievance complained of by the hon. Member, I have been unable to find such means. Then the hon. Member for Bethnal Green made what his constituents will characterise as a "savage attack on the Chancellor of the Exchequer" with regard to the unfortunate mistake as to the question of tea, for which I expressed my regret in the House. I think he exaggerated the matter extremely when he wished to represent me as anxious to make a cowardly attack on the grocers. Why such an attack should be "cowardly" I do not know, because they are an extremely formidable body for any single person to attack. I do not wish to bring forward any evidence to modify the statement of regret I then made, and I shall not attempt to deal with the views of the hon. Member. I can only say, as I am bound to say, that when I spoke of the prices paid for tea in many villages I spoke with actual knowledge, which has since been confirmed, and which hon. Members have told me is borne out by their own experience. But I wish hon. Members to dismiss from their minds any idea that I wanted to make an attack upon grocers, nor did I wish to attack any middlemen in particular. I was anxious that the 2d. should not be lost to the consumer, and I believe it is the case that he is already in many parts of the country deriving advantage from the reduction. More than that, I believe that in many cases what will happen has been to some extent already anticipated, namely, that the reduction in price has been greater than the reduction of duty. The trade, seeing that confidence has been restored, have found it is possible to make a larger reduction than 2d. in the pound. An hon. Friend of mine, who is not now in his place, spoke against the Bill from the point of view of the publicans, and said he hoped I should not be hard upon them in reply, as he thought I had been after he had reflected upon my Budget speech. I should not be surprised if, in the interval between its delivery and the formation of that opinion, he had had some communication from an Organisation representing the trade. As to the psychological effect of that upon his mind I will not too curiously inquire. I acknowledge the courteous tones in which the hon. Member for Derby has spoken, but do not accept the points he made. He added to the surplus the tax which is to be added to beer and spirits, bringing it up to £4,750,000, but the surplus is usually calculated before taxes are imposed or taken off. Following the lead of one of our friends, the hon. Member for Poplar laid down some of the first principles of finance without having studied the details on which they are founded; he added to my surplus the tax which is being imposed upon spirits and beer, and he treated my surplus as something like £4,750,000. I thought that, according to financial practice, a surplus was taken at the time when you have settled your expenditure for the year, and estimated your surplus for the year, and before you began to impose fresh taxes or to take any off. But to treat a surplus of which I had disposed by adding a tax which is to be put on for a particular period seemed to me to be an unusual method of argument. The hon. Member objected to the principle of assigning any of this Imperial Revenue to local purposes, and said, not without some force, that we might be hampered as regards Imperial finance if we deprived ourselves of freedom of action by giving Local Authorities a share of these taxes. I think this system is an improvement upon the old one of making subventions, which depended to a great extent upon the extravagance of the Local Authorities, for the more they spent the more they gained from the State. To that we have put an end, and now certain revenues are assigned to them if they act with prudence, moderation, and economy. If they squander them it will be their loss, but it will not be the loss of the State, as it used to be. It is said that we should find local revenues; but is it possible to find local revenues which would not cause the greatest sense of inequality? These local revenues would have to take the place of the amounts which used to be received by the Local Authorities. The result of any local levy would be that the poorest counties would come off very badly, and an intolerable sense of grievance would arise. In the Highlands of Scotland or the West of Ireland the amounts raised would not be at all proportionate to the amounts that had been contributed by the nation at large. The poorer counties would not be helped much by the Horse Tax or by the Van and Wheel Tax. That which is the dream of taxation reformers—a Local Income Tax—would be most detrimental to the poorer districts where the rich do not reside. With all the imperfections of the present system, I do not see that the mode of giving local assistance by hypothecating certain Imperial Revenues can be improved by any system of Local Taxation. If any one can discover an excellent Local Tax which will be equitable and acceptable he will render a service, but I have not heard of such a tax being suggested. There is really no difference between the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) and myself on the point of diminishing the number of sources of revenue. In the past there was reason to abolish an enormous number of small taxes; but we have arrived at a point where our taxation rests upon a few articles as I think it is right it should rest upon. I am not prepared to diminish the number of these articles any further, and for that reason, although I admit much is to be said in favour of the abolition of the House Tax, it is a tax which in emergency might be utilised, and which, I believe, we would be almost sorry to part with. Acting upon that principle, I am reluctant to give up any source of future taxation. It had passed through my mind whether the House Tax should be abolished; but I came to the conclusion that it would not be wise to part with it. If I had abolished it, I am certain it would be said that the benefit of the remission would go into the pockets of the landlords, as it has been argued erroneously that the contribution to the rates had benefited the landlords. It was said I had deprived the Sinking Fund of £3,000,000 that properly belonged to it; but that statement does scant justice to the policy I have pursued, for of the £3,000,000, £1,000,000 represents the reduction on the charge for the Debt through the operation of conversion. That was £1,000,000 which was never anticipated, and to say that I have robbed the Sinking Fund of it is to push rhetoric beyond its proper limits. Having been able to reduce the Debt by £23,000,000, that reduction saves a charge of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. upon that £23,000,000, by which we have saved a further sum of £500,000, which will be applied to the Sinking Fund instead of to the interest on the Debt. When the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) speaks of our joining the professional alarmists, and refers to the better finance which prevailed when I presided at the Admiralty in 1873, and had the advantage of his advice and assistance, I must remind him that great changes have occurred since then; that every gun costs infinitely more now than it did then; that every ship costs infinitely more on account of its machinery; that all the Powers have made further progress in their armaments; that torpedoes are more necessary and have developed enormously; and that everything costs, I will not say double, but much more than it did when we were at the Admiralty together. I think it is right that the country should know the circumstances when this comparison is drawn. I think I have now dealt with most of the topics which have been introduced, except the very important topic of the contributions of Scotland and Ireland, and the effect which this Bill will have upon Scotch and Irish finances. The hon. Member who spoke last discussed not only the finances of the Bill, not only the tax which has been imposed, but also the objects to which the new tax was to be devoted. In discussing the objects of the Bill, or rather the purposes to which the new tax should be devoted, the hon. Member (Mr. Dillon) was extremely indignant that, among other things, it should be devoted to the superannuation of the English police. But I think the hon. Member forgot that the whole superannuation of the Irish police is paid out of Imperial funds. It is not a question of contribution, or that Ireland should pay less, but that while some small contribution is made towards English and Scotch police the whole of the Irish superannuation is borne by the State.

MR. DILLON: You are welcome to take all that money.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think the hon. Member is mistaken, and that such an act would add another to the list of Irish grievances. Those Irish police are Irishmen, belonging to Irish families, coming from all parts of Ireland, and a breach of faith with regard to their superannuation would be considered an outrage in many parts of Ireland and in many circles in which hon. Members opposite themselves move. There are many charges which are brought against the English Government; but the charge of paying Irishmen too much, even when they do not belong to the Party of hon. Members opposite, is not often brought against the Imperial Government.

MR. DILLON: It is a charge which is constantly made in the case of Judges and of police.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; when they think of abolishing a Judgeship it is said the Judges are paid too much. If the

hon. Member speaks for the whole of his Party on some subjects, there are some on which I think he cannot speak with so much authority. Again, to my surprise, the hon. Member objected to the method in which we are dealing with the position of the National teachers in Ireland. I thought that if there was one object which commended itself to hon. Members opposite it would be that the position of the National teachers in Ireland should be improved. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), in fact, stated on one occasion that so long as we continued to govern Ireland we must improve the position of the National teachers. I thought that was a matter of very great importance, and I took special note of it at the time, as showing that there was not that indifference to English financial aid on the part of the hon. Member for Cork that there was to the general connection between the two countries. But be that as it may, we thought that if there was one manner in which all Ireland would like this money to be spent it would be in the direction of assisting the National teachers. When the hon. Member says that the money is not distributed through the proper authority, that is a matter of detail; but, in fact, it is distributed on principles very analogous to those on which it is distributed in Scotland. In Scotland it is distributed mainly under schemes proposed by the Secretary of State for Scotland. That, however, as I say, is comparatively a detail, and we shall be glad if by the operation of our Bill we should improve the position of the National teachers in Ireland. Now, I will deal as shortly as I can with the point raised by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) and the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and by some Scotch Members with regard to the injustice of putting this tax upon whisky. Let me point out that a writer in the Economist puts the case against us in this way, that England gets £125,000 too much, Scotland £77,000 too little, and Ireland £52,000 too little. That is the case which is put against us by a writer who is endeavouring to show that we are wrong in this matter, and I take this as showing what is considered to be the extreme limit of our wickedness in this matter.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): That was only the duty on home spirits.

Mr. Goschen

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; but if you take foreign spirits and beer you diminish the force of these figures. Foreign spirits are not consumed in the same proportion in Scotland and Ireland as they are in England. They are too patriotic to consume any large portion of foreign spirits, and they have too much good taste. I have examined into the matter, and while, no doubt, as regards British spirits, Ireland and Scotland consume much more than England, on the other hand England consumes more foreign spirits and more beer, and the consequence is that those figures are less favourable to Scotland and Ireland when balanced, as they ought to be, by the increased consumption of beer in England and the increased consumption of foreign spirits. You must take the whole sum together in its three component parts. England consumes more beer and foreign spirits; Ireland and Scotland consume more British spirits; and in this way these figures are modified. Many hon. Members argued as if the whole of the case depended only on British and home spirits, but the case is very much modified if you take them together. Now, I come to the point on which the hon. Member for East Mayo and other hon. Members have spoken, namely, the imposition of a tax according to pure alcohol. I do not think that is the correct way, nor has it been considered by previous Chancellors of the Exchequer or Governments that a tax should be levied on whisky, wine, and beer simply according to pure alcohol. I remind the House also that the tax on wine was increased by 10 per cent. two years ago. It is a heavier increase, looking at the total yield of that tax, than is imposed either on spirits or beer. Are we bound to accept the calculation that you should judge simply by pure alcohol? That has never been admitted as a proper test. Alcohol represents a simple intoxicant; whisky and brandy represent pure intoxicants. But in beer there is a nutritious substance. [An hon. MEMBER: "Oh, oh"! ] I think that if the hon. Member will apply the test he will find that he will get fat on beer. I believe that people have been sustained by beer, and that the beer of the working man is nutritious and strengthening. But, as regards whisky, I am bound to say that I have not heard the same attribute ascribed to it. Our friends from Scotland may have a different tale to tell. [Cries of "No, no!"] I am glad to hear they have not; but there is distinctly, joking apart, certainly more nutritious power in beer, and it is a different substance altogether from whisky, brandy, and gin. At all events, hon. Members even from Ireland will not think of asking us to re-cast the whole of our fiscal system because whisky is drunk so largely in Ireland. I will not enter into the comparison of the amount of liquor consumed in the three countries, nor on the other point that, supposing any country drinks harder than the others, we are therefore to refrain from placing a tax upon that article of consumption, though it may be consumed in very large quantities in the other parts of the United Kingdom. According to the doctrines laid down by hon. Members, the more the Scotch and the Irish drink whisky the more we ought to go on reducing the duty on whisky.

MR. DILLON: We want you to increase the duty on beer.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I see no flaw in my argument. What is laid down is this, that if you tax whisky you are taxing Ireland and Scotland too much. Suppose they drink more and the aggregate revenue from whisky becomes larger.

MR. SEXTON: In England the consumption of alcohol amounts to 6½ gallons per head; in Scotland, 4½ gallons; and in Ireland, 3 gallons.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I admit that in Scotland and Ireland the consumption of pure alcohol beats the English consumption hollow. [Mr. DILLON: We do not put water in it.] Supposing that we measure the contribution which Scotland and Ireland ought to pay to the Imperial Revenue by the amount of whisky which they consume? If we take their share towards the Imperial Revenue, and proceed on the assumption that they consume one-third more, Ireland will be shown to be contributing more to the Imperial Revenue; and then hon. Members will have an argument to this effect: "Now Ireland is contributing so much more to the Revenue, you ought to make Ireland a present in respect of that additional sum contributed to the Revenue." That is an argument to which I demur. I do not accept the principle of paying simply according to the intoxicant. In the next place, I do not accept the principle that because certain parts of the country take in an increasing measure to the consumption of any particular articles which is taxed, this state of things should be immediately remedied by some measure of taxation which will give relief to that particular country. I do not know in what confusion we should thus be landed. I now come to the proportion which hon. Members say will be paid by Scotland and Ireland as compared with England through the increase in the Spirit Duty. I thought that my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury had made our case clear. What hon. Members now wish to say is that this increase in the Spirit Duty should be distributed according to the country which yields it? [Hon. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] Yes; hon. Members accept that. Will they equally accept that the Probate Duty passed over to the Local Authorities should be distributed according to the country which yields it?

MR. DILLON: We do not accept it because Ireland is paying double her share of taxation.

*MR. GOSCHEN: That is a perfectly intelligible argument, and one which deserves respect. But this particular argument has been raised: that in the contributions made by the State to the Local Authorities Scotland and Ireland are damnified, because this Spirit Duty is not distributed according to the proportions in which the various parts of the Kingdom use it. If they wish the contributions, amounting to £3,700,000, which will be made in the present financial year to Scotland, England, and Ireland through half of the Probate Duty and the increased Spirit and Beer Duty, to be distributed according to the country which yields it, I will defer to their wishes and distribute the Probate Duty and the Spirit Duty accordingly. But I do not think they would like it, because they would lose more on the Probate Duty than they would gain on the consumption of home spirits. Is it not fair and just, apart from the question raised by the hon. Member for East Mayo as to whether the original contribution is right, that if we give contributions from the Imperial Exchequer to local taxation we ought either to accept one principle or the other—either accept the principle of general contribution calculated according to the amount given to the Revenue, or else calculated according as those special duties are yielded by the particular countries? I can only say the way I have selected of putting them all together and dividing them again is more fair than the other principle of giving the duties just as they are yielded. Hon. Members from Ireland will scarcely contend that we ought to treat the Spirit Duty in the way they desire, and at the same time hand over the Probate Duty as at present. I hope I have shown there is a principle in the course I have taken, though hon. Members may not agree with it. Of the whole contribution we have made from Imperial sources to local revenue, England has contributed in round figures 82·6 per cent., and receives back 80 per cent.; Scotland pays 10·5 per cent., and receives back 11 per cent.; and Ireland pays 6·9 per cent., and receives back 9 per cent. In the result these transfers to local taxation are therefore in themselves favourable to Scotland and Ireland. I think I ought to add that since the time when I made that proposal the Probate Duty has been creeping up, and therefore the alliance between the poorer and the richer countries is redounding to the advantage of the poorer countries in an increased proportion. I am sorry that hon. Members should think that I have purposely or negligently, and negligently would be almost as bad as purposely in a matter of this kind, done injustice to Ireland. It has been said that Ireland does not benefit by the reduction in the House Duty. No, but nothing was imposed on Ireland when the Estate Duty was imposed last year, because of that duty which yields £1,000,000, Ireland only pays 2 per cent. According to the contention of the hon. Member for East Mayo, Ireland and Scotland, as compared with England, pay very little of the Beer Duty. Again, when the Income Tax has been increased, England has been much harder hit than Scotland and Ireland. I can only say I have intended to be just in this matter. We may not have reached entire accuracy, but it is not the system of bookkeeping which raises any difficulty, it is rather that the statistical resources are not at hand to enable us to fix how much is credited to one country and the other. I have, however, ascertained that there is a considerable amount of beer exported from Ireland to England on which Ireland gets the benefit of the whole of the duty. I shall, if possible, lay further figures on the Table of the House, and show how we arrive at our results. If Ireland thinks she contributes more than her share, does not she receive more than her share back again? [Cries of "No!"] Take education. There the payments made by the Imperial Exchequer are, I believe, larger than her share. Take the contributions we are making to light railways in Ireland. [An hon. MEMBER: "We do not want them."] The cost of one light railway is more than the difference as regards Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Jobs given to your own friends.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am sorry my remarks have caused so controversial a tone to be taken—a tone I am quite prepared to adopt when it is necessary, but which I had hoped might have been excluded from the present discussion. I think that certainly in what we have done in the way of public works in Ireland we have not been chary of British money, and indeed hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway opposite have found fault with us for being too liberal. I hope that as we proceed we shall be able to satisfy the House generally that in what we have done we have been animated by every consideration of justice.

*[11.30.] MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I do not propose to intervene in the very thorny controversy upon the proportion of Imperial taxation paid by Scotland and Ireland as contrasted with England. I know it is a difficult question upon which high authorities entertain very different opinions; but I would point out to the Chancellor that in estimating the amount of Probate Duty paid in Ireland it is impossible to exclude the amount of the duty assessed on Irish property that is paid in England. A large proportion of the wealth of Ireland is brought to England; it is invested in England, and the Probate Duty, when the owners die, though levied in England, practically belongs to Ireland. Then in regard to the tax upon alcoholic liquor consumed in the three countries, it is rather hard to say to two of them that because they consume stronger liquor, as far as alcohol is concerned, they are to pay more than the country that consumes less alcohol, namely, the country that consumes most beer.

But the main point I wish to call attention to is the new tax. The whole Budget, so far as last year is concerned, and so far as the reduction of taxation is concerned, has been fully discussed to-night, and I will not go over the ground again; but I will say a word or two on the new tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer hardly seems to see the force of his own argument with reference to the proportion of taxation to the three countries by whom it is paid. This is a new tax altogether; it is a tax expressly levied for local purposes. The Chancellor of the Exchequer does not admit it is an Imperial tax at all; he says it is to be for local purposes; and if it is to be levied for local purposes, surely it is not an unjust demand that Scotland and Ireland shall have what they contribute to local taxation returned in the shape of relief to local taxation. We cannot admit the opinion of a Liberal nobleman, however distinguished, who happens to be Chairman of a County Council and who has expressed an opinion that County Councils have not had a sufficient subsidy to influence our opinion in this matter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told us he had handed over £2,750,000 of Imperial taxation to Local Authorities, and he also told us that an increase in the Probate Duties had already wiped out any possible deficit that might have arisen in consequence of the withdrawal of the Wheel and Van Tax. That he did not proceed with the Horse Tax is a question between himself and the Local Authorities; but he told the Local Authorities at the time, through their supporters in this House, that the controversy with regard to aid to local taxation was closed and that he had done his utmost, but he is now going to impose new taxes producing £1,250,000 in order to grant a subvention to local purposes. The subvention has all the vices and none of the virtues of the old principle; it mixes up Imperial and local taxation, fetters the action of Parliament with respect to the Revenue—and it confines unnecessarily local action in more than one direction. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to interfere with Local Authorities in reference to the superannuation of the police. A great many boroughs and counties have established for years a perfectly solvent Police Superannuation Fund. Such is the case with the county in which I live and the borough I represent. The attention of the right hon. Gentleman was directed to this on the Budget night, and he replied that these counties and boroughs would not be placed at a disadvantage. But there is not a word of this in the Bill.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Wait and see the Local Taxation Bill.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: From the principle of distribution adopted before I know that the boroughs will be placed at a disadvantage, and a great part of the fund levied in large towns will be handed over to the Exchequer of the counties. If you want to create a Police Superannuation Fund why not proceed to do it as other Governments have tried to do it? We have tried to do it, and you have tried it. We brought in a Bill, and the House did not reject it; but owing to the Parliamentary obstruction which prevailed in the years 1880 and 1885 we were prevented from carrying the Bill through, and the House never gave a positive decision. Let such a proposal stand or fall upon its merits. True, superannuation ought to be deferred pay, and we make provision for a deduction of 2½ per cent. from the pay. Why step in with a subsidy? But not only does the right hon. Gentleman interfere with the police; there is also the great question into which I will not enter now, though the Government will hear much of it within the next few weeks—the expenditure of the tax for compensation to licence holders. This is the real crux of the position—the centre of the new tax. Then we have a very small sum left for general county purposes. The time now is not favourable to going into details; but this I will say, that I shall join with many hon. Members in offering the strongest opposition to this proposal whenever we can contest it in Bills for Imperial or local purposes. And now a word or two on the position of the National Debt. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has had a little duel across the Table with my right hon. Friend in reference to the amount he has applied to the reduction of the Debt, and I am not going to discuss the point whether the right hon. Gentleman has or has not accomplished a very great reduction of Debt during his term of office. I think he has paid off a very large amount of National Debt, and I think we are indebted very much to the automatic principle of reduction introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers). But I would point out, notwithstanding what has been said on this point, how little we are really doing towards the payment of the Debt. I will trouble the House with a few figures on this matter, and will take periods of 10 years in Her Majesty's reign which will cover 50 years. In 1839 the annual expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund on account of interest and Sinking Fund was £29,300,000. In 1849 it was £28,700,000; in 1859, £28,500,000; in 1869, £26,500,000; in 1879, £27,400,000; and in 1889, the wealthiest of all those years, £25,800,000. We were therefore paying £3,500,000 less than we paid 50 years ago. Consider also the fact that when Sir Robert Peel imposed a penny on the Income Tax it yielded £800,000, and now it produces £2,000,000. Considering these figures, we have no right to congratulate ourselves in the matter of the National Debt. We are now in a time of prosperity and peace, but I am sorry to say we are indulging in extravagant expenditure on the Naval and Military Services. I will not argue the point, but I think the House and the country should bear these figures in mind. If the House is satisfied that we can safely, with regard to future contingencies, depart from the policy of reducing the Debt, the Government may be right, only let it be understood that it is a reversal of the policy upheld by some of our greatest financiers, a policy rigidly adhered to during a long succession of years. I am not satisfied with the Budget so far as the expenditure is concerned, but I should be out of order in discussing the expenditure in Committee of Ways and Means. I regret that the House devotes such a large portion of its time in considering what taxes should be added or remitted. If the House would bring its unprofessional view to bear on our enormous annual expenditure, I think we might solve a great many problems that perplex us now with much greater facility. The amount of our Naval and Military Expenditure for the coming year will be £33,250,000, exclusive of the £20,000,000 paid in respect of India. That is a larger sum than any other country devoted to Military and Naval purposes. If the House would forego Party strife upon minor matters and spend the time that would be saved in examining into the National Expenditure we should, I feel confident, find means of reducing it. Without including the cost of wars, it will be found that in the last 10 years the expenditure on the Military and Naval Services has increased by £8,000,000. Conservative and Liberal Governments share the blame for this. It is not a necessary expenditure, and I believe the time is coming—and I hope soon—when the country will insist on a very large reduction.

(11.45.) Mr. T. M. HEALY: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has thrown out a challenge, but will he be good enough to remember that we have been denied every species of intelligence in the shape of Returns upon which we might inform our minds, and that, since the famous Budget of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1852, you have increased taxation in Ireland by £250,000,000, or more than victorious Germany wrung from France in her time of misery and despair? Your Union Treaty with us in regard to taxation has been broken, as all your Treaties with Ireland have been, and out of the juggle of figures we cannot make this clear. I do not pretend to be competent to discuss a great financial subject, but I ask the right hon. Gentleman to explain why he made choice of the Probate Duty for division? Why did he not divide the Spirit Duty? Let the Chancellor of the Exchequer agree to the appointment of a Select Committee, so that we may ascertain what is the incidence of taxation in Ireland at the present moment, what the Irish pay exactly, and what they receive in return, and what was the original bargain made with Ireland at the time of the Union. The right hon. Gentleman must have been bankrupt in argument when he treated us to the suggestion that there is something nutritious in beer as a ground for robbing Ireland. He first suggested that the Irishman was a more drunken animal than the Englishman. ["No, no!"] He did not say so, he had not the courage, but he hinted that those "sections of the country where people drink hardest should not therefore be more lightly taxed," but the contrary is the case, because the Englishman drinks twice as much alcohol as the Irishman, the latter drinking three gallons, and the former six and three-quarters. The reason given by the right hon. Gentleman for not taxing beer as heavily as whisky is that beer is more nutritious. Would the right hon. Gentleman reduce the duty on whisky if the consumers should be willing to mix with it a little of Liebig's extract? I have no doubt that thus I could produce a fattening compound. It is a fallacy to say that beer is any good to anybody. You tell us that beer fattens, so does whisky if you take too much of it; it arrests certain functions of the body, and sets up fat. But why in the world, because it fattens, should the Englishman have the advantage? I think I am not far wrong when I say this is a bankrupt argument. I prophecy that one result of putting the increased duty on whisky will be that the distillers will put out newer whisky, which will stand more water than old spirit. Therefore, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will introduce into his Bill the principle that whisky should lie in bond for at least 12 months. You need not poison us as well as over-tax us. This principle was contended for year after year from these Benches, by Mr. W. H. O'Sullivan, now gone, poor fellow, as someone said, to the "spirits in bond." Year after year he tried to induce successive Chancellors of the Exchequer to accept his "Spirits in Bond" Bill. The right hon. Gentleman takes credit to himself for the assistance proposed to National Teachers, but we object that it is handed over to the Irish Secretary and, indirectly, will reach the Irish landlords. I think we have cause to complain of our treatment in being left out of the advantage derived from the remission of House Duty, and as to the Tea Duty I am strongly inclined to agree with the pithy note of the right hon. Gentleman's anonymous correspondent. If there had been a graduated tax imposed there would have been some justice, but the tea at 3d. pays the same rate as the rich man's tea at 3s. I do not wish to say more now, except that it is a remarkable thing that the entire Tory Party, which turned out their opponents on the Whisky Tax in 1885, should now be proposing to raise the tax. It is one among the string of broken pledges. They opposed the buying out of the landlords, and they now propose a plan for the purpose. They promised us Local Government, but now we are not to have the local power to suspend licences because there is no machinery for the purpose. I trust we shall have more time in Committee to consider the various points in which we are interested.

*(11.55.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I hope the hon. Gentleman will not persist in his Motion for the adjournment. The Government cannot possibly accede to it, and it was distinctly understood that the Debate should be concluded to-night.

(11.55.) MR. M. J. KENNY: When is it proposed to take the Committee stage?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: To-morrow.

MR. M. J. KENNY: But there will be no time to put down Amendments.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It was distinctly understood that should be the arrangement.

*(11.56.) MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): Before we go further, there are two questions I should like to put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. During his speech he quoted certain figures from the Economist, unfavourable to the Government. He said—

"A writer in the Economist puts the case against us in this way, that England gets £125,000 too much, Scotland £77,000 too little, and Ireland £52,000 too little."

Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that this calculation left out of view the amount paid in this country upon foreign spirits and beer. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can give us the figures which he said should modify this calculation. Further, I would refer to the question raised by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), the amount of the debt paid off, and the amount raised by loan in the year. My right hon. Friend said that practically the amount to be paid through the Sinking Fund was not much greater than the amount which would have to be borrowed under the Naval Defence and other Acts, about £5,000,000 on each side of the account. Will the right hon. Gentleman give us the exact figures in either case, and explain the net amount of debt which will actually be paid off in the current year?

*(12.0.) MR. GOSCHEN: I doubt very much if the sum is as stated by the right hon. Gentleman. No one knows better than the right hon. Gentleman that these Estimates can never be made with any degree of certainty. I hope presently to be able to pay off more debt. I have not with me the percentages which the right hon. Gentleman suggests, but I hope to-morrow to be able to get the correct figures.

(12.3.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I wish to draw attention to one point, and that is the proposed increase in the tax on anæsthetics. If the right hon. Gentleman is satisfied that these anæsthetics are used for the benefit of suffering fellow creatures, I am sure he will be one of the first to try and assist by every means in his power to alleviate suffering. Well, if he will only look into this matter he will find that he is imposing an additional tax on chloroform and ether, which are so largely used to prevent persons from suffering pain when undergoing operations. I hope, therefore, that in the interests of suffering humanity, he will give his attention to this question, and exclude those articles from the additional taxation.

(12.5.) MR. P. M'DONALD: The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that hon. Gentlemen near me would have an opportunity of replying, and several of my hon. Friends, relying on that promise, declined to speak. I hope the First Lord of the Treasury will give us the opportunity which the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised, seeing that so much interest is felt on this question in Ireland.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to remind hon. Gentlemen that on the clauses of the Bill there will be abundant opportunity for discussion, and I must, therefore, resist the appeal.

MR. M. J. KENNY rose to address the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member has spoken.

MR. M. J. KENNY: I only asked a question.

*MR. SPEAKER called on Mr. FLYNN.

MR. M. J. KENNY: I wish to speak to a point of Order.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

(12.9.) MR. FLYNN: I desire to add my appeal to that of my Colleagues who have spoken, that the Irish Members should be given an opportunity for discussing this important matter. We have been in attendance all the evening, and I am sure it was impossible in the short time at our disposal to compress all that ought to have been advanced in support of our objection. I hope the leader of the House will accede to our very reasonable request.

(12.10.) MR. P. M'DONALD: I beg to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that I have moved the adjournment of the Debate.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. P. M'DONALD: With all due respect to you, Sir, I did move the adjournment.

*MR. SPEAKER: That Question has not yet been put.

*(12.12.) MR. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Bill read a second time.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I beg to move that the Bill be committed this day at 2 o'clock.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will to-morrow resolve itself into the said Committee."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

(12.40.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle): I protest against the Motion, and I deny that any engagement has been made that the Committee stage should be taken this day. The First Lord of the Treasury said that if the Debate on the Second Reading came to an end this evening he hoped to take the Committee on Tuesday. It is true that it has come to a conclusion, but it has come to a conclusion under circumstances altogether unprecedented. It is not right that the financial arrangements of the country for a year should be terminated against the wishes of a large number of Gentlemen in the House after one evening's Debate.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer made a speech, of the length of which I must not at all be understood as complaining, but he did not conclude until 25 minutes to 12 o'clock. His speech raised many questions on which hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway and from Scotland desired to speak. I must be allowed to remind the House further that there is a rule that money Debates may be taken after 12 o'clock; yet, at a few minutes after 12 o'clock the discussion by the application of the Closure is made to come to an end. Under the circumstances I must emphatically protest against the Committee stage being taken to-morrow.

*(12.43.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon Gentleman has spoken warmly, though he is usually exceedingly courteous in the representations he makes to the House. I wish to remind the House of the circumstances under which we are acting. When I was asked last week what course the Government would take, I distinctly stated that the Budget Bill would be taken de die in diem, and no objection was made. I was asked again the same evening when the Committee would be taken, and I replied on Tuesday if the Debate ceased. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer waited until the hon. Member for East Mayo and the hon. Member for Belfast had spoken, and then rose, at a quarter past ten o'clock, to answer the various objections made in the course of the Debate. The Secretary to the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer having spoken, it is only reasonable to assume that the Debate was virtually closed. When a Minister rises to reply to the speeches that have been made, a Debate is usually closed, and in this case it is not possible either for the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Secretary to the Treasury to speak again. In the course I have taken I am only acting in accordance with a distinct understanding, and I should be wanting in my duty to the House if I refrained from acting on the engagement of which I have given notice.

(12.45.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): Sir, I am bound to say I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle was right in the protest which he made. I confess I was amazed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose so early, a good many Members not having returned from dinner. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House leave the case in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On this side of the House it is expected from us that we should speak on behalf of the people we represent. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his reply certainly dealt with small points, but he did not give us any light or leading on the main points. The leader of the House can scarcely say that he is acting within the spirit of the undertaking that the Bill would be proceeded with de die in diem when he takes the first opportunity of stifling Debate. He could have afforded the melancholy satisfaction to those who wished to speak of doing so after 12 o'clock. At this moment the leader of the House will see that there is no opportunity of putting down Amendments, and we are really getting into such a slipshod way of doing business that I personally protest against such a proceeding by a Government which calls itself Constitutional and Conservative.

(12.47.) MR. T. M. HEALY: In this part of the House we are extremely indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle for vindicating such poor liberties as are allowed to remain to us. Supposing this had been a Liberal Budget for the taxation of ground rents, and the Debate had been closed on the first night, would the Tory Party consider themselves well treated? Here you are taxing the one commodity our country produces. [Laughter.] It does not seem to be entirely eschewed by Gentlemen who laugh. Only two Irish Members, being the Members for West Belfast and East Mayo, have spoken, and then the Closure is applied. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to complain of your ruling. The hon. Member for Tyrone only asked, "When will the Committee be taken?" and for that, Sir, you ruled he had spoken. No answer whatever was given by the Government to that question, and we on this side of the House, whether intentionally or not, were deceived by the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury when he said that hon. Members would have ample opportunity of discussing this matter to-morrow. I sat down before 12 o'clock, forgetting for the moment that it was a money Bill, and under the idea that the Government intended to proceed to-morrow. I am surprised at the silence of hon. Members for Ireland opposite. When this question was raised we know the influence which the issue of a circular by Dunville's, of Belfast, protesting against the imposition of a tax upon whisky, had upon their opinions. Why are they to be silent because a Tory Government makes this proposal? We have got no answer from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the reasonable proposal that we should have a Select Committee to inquire into questions of finance. There has been no attempt to answer our objections but by the Closure. The only argument of the right hon. Gentleman is that of the Closure, and it is a weapon which he wields more effectually than any other in his armament. He now asks that the Committee on this Bill shall be taken at 2 o'clock to-morrow. What opportunity will that give us of putting down Amendments as to important questions embodied in the Bill? I remember that the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) made on one occasion the remark that England never wiped the tears out of Ireland's eyes, but she made her pay for the pocket handkerchief. I think that on this occasion the statement of the hon. and gallant Gentleman has been most thoroughly borne out by the proposals before us, and we demand time for their discussion. We do not assent to the imposition of this Whisky Duty, not merely because it is placed on Irish whisky, but because you propose to make us pay 18s. for an article for which you only pay 11s. We are entitled to know from the Government whether they will assent to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the proportionate relations of these taxes as they affect the three kingdoms, and we will not assent to going on with the Bill until some such information is before us. On no previous occasion has a Debate on a Bill of this kind ever been closed at a quarter past 12. You who sit on the Ministerial side will find yourselves on these Benches before very long, and then you—that is those who are not left outside—may find occasion to regret the step you have taken.

(12.50.) MR. DILLON: I must confess to feeling the utmost astonishment at the manner in which this Debate has been brought to a close. I would remind the House that in 1885 a discussion arose upon a tax of a precisely similar character without any attempt being made to stop the opposition then offered. The result was that the attempt then made to impose that taxation was the cause of the overthrow of Her Majesty's Government. The First Lord of the Treasury, in defending his action in applying the Closure to-night, stated that the Secretary to the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had replied to all the objections made to the Budget proposals, but he did not refer to the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer deliberately abstained from answering the questions I put to him, and the main objections I offered to the Whisky Tax. I could not go into those objections without transgressing the Rules of Order, but they will be borne in mind by hon. Members who heard them. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer attempted to reply to some of the minor points then urged, but to the main objection I offered to the Whisky Tax he made no reply whatever. Are we to be told that because it suited the convenience of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to rise at half-past 10 to speak at great length the Irish Members are to have no opportunity of taking their legitimate share in the Debate? The fact is that the persons mainly aggrieved by those proposals are the Representatives of the Irish and Scotch people. The main criticisms of the Bill come from those Members, and I maintain that no fair opportunity has been given to support their objection. We contend that the Bill does a cruel injustice to our country, but as soon as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made his speech, the First Lord of the Treasury thinks it is time to close the Debate, and he therefore prevents our taking further part in it. It is unfair that the Members of the Government should select, as they always do, their own time to speak, and that private Members should have no chance. During the whole time the First Lord of the Treasury has been the leader of this House no case of improper Closure more extraordinary than the present has ever occurred, and I think the time will come when hon. Members opposite will regret the course they have taken. Under these circumstances I protest strongly against the Committee stage of this Bill being put down for to-day, and would advise my hon. Friend to divide against the proposal.

(12.53.) MR. M. J. KENNY: In consequence of the manner in which this Debate has been stopped, I beg to move to omit the word "Tuesday," and to insert the word "Thursday."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "this day, at Two of the clock," and insert the words "upon Thursday,"—(Mr. Matthew Kenny,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'this day, at Two of the clock,' stand part of the Question."

(12.54.) MR. SEXTON: In reference to the Motion of my hon. Friend, I would remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he practically admitted in the course of his speech that the Irish Members have grievous cause of complaint whether in regard to the method of imposing the tax or the mode of distributing it. He has admitted that he has not sufficient information to enable him to furnish the particulars for which we have asked as to the relative taxation of the three kingdoms. I now ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, under all the circumstances, the debate having, as the First Lord of the Treasury says, ceased through being brought to a violent end by superior force and the application of the Closure, he proposes to force us into Committee this day (Tuesday), or whether he will first bring down to the House and lay before us all the information for which we have asked? In that case we might proceed with the Bill at two o'clock; but if not, we shall not consent to proceed, and will do all we can to sustain the objection made with so much force and spirit by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley), namely, that the pressing forward of this measure, under such circumstances, will not tend to facilitate the progress of business in this House.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot undertake to supply all the details connected with the information asked for, but I will undertake to put before the House such information on the subject as we are able to furnish.

*(12.56.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I put it to Her Majesty's Government—Do they think they are saving time by attempting to force this Bill upon the House under these circumstances? I assure them there is a very strong feeling on this side of the House as to the unfair manner in which Her Majesty's Government have acted in closing, for the first time, a Debate on the financial measures of the year, and saying to the House that, notwithstanding its right to vote or criticise the taxation imposed on the country, this measure shall not be discussed. They do not seem to reflect that we on this side of the House shall not forget their action when the matter is again before us, nor do they seem to realise that, under the circumstances, there is little probability of their making that progress with the Bill in Committee that would otherwise be made if the arrangement had the general consent of the House. The right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House seems to think that when he has made a statement as to the decision arrived at by Her Majesty's Government with regard to any course they propose to take, that at once becomes an engagement or understanding on the part of the House. It is true that, in answer to the question put both by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and myself as to whether Her Majesty's Government proposed to proceed de die in diem not only with this Bill, but with their most contentious Bill for compensation to the publicans, the First Lord of the Treasury told us that that was his intention. But we by no means assented to that view, and the right hon. Member for Derby made a sotto voce remark across the Table indicating what was his view of the matter; therefore, I appeal to the leader of the House as to whether he would not be more likely to make progress with the Bill by giving us the opportunity of putting down Amendments for Thursday next. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has promised that he will give us such information as he can to-morrow, and that will enable Amendments to be put down before the Committee stage is taken.

* (12.58.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman demurs to the view I expressed as to the engagement come to regarding the business of the House. I can only state my view of what then happened, and as to what generally happens in these cases. The leader of the House is asked what course the Government propose to take on particular questions, and when that is stated it is the practice of the Opposition to object, if the proposed arrangement is unsatisfactory, but in this case no objection whatever was made to the course suggested. I think, therefore, I am entitled to say that the Opposition ought to be bound by what then took place. I may add, however, that I am not anxious unduly to force on this measure. My only desire is to facilitate the progress of public business, and if right hon. Gentlemen opposite and their friends will undertake that the Committee on this Bill shall be dealt with in a business-like spirit, and that we shall make reasonable progress with the measure on Thursday, I shall be disposed to take other business to-day in the hope that we may arrive at some satisfactory result regarding this Bill on Thursday next. If this offer be accepted, and hon. and right hon. Gentlemen will endeavour to make progress with the Bill, it will not be placed on the Paper for to-day.

(1.0.) MR. J. MORLEY: Of course we shall do what we always do—what is fair. But we can enter into no engagement. We all desire that this business shall be got through with as much dispatch as possible. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will tell us what business he will take to-day?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Allotments Bill and Contagious Diseases (Animals) (Pleuro-Pneumonia) Bill.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): The right hon. Gentleman says we are to carry on the Debate on the Budget in a business-like spirit. I accept his invitation. It will certainly be carried on in a business-like spirit by me, for so long as it contains the compensation clauses, I will oppose it at every stage to the best of my ability.

Question put, and negatived.

Words "upon Thursday," inserted.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House will, upon Thursday, resolve itself into the said Committee.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

(1.14.) Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

(1.14.) MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer endeavour to have prepared for us by Thursday the information he has promised as to the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill?

* (1.15.) MR. GOSCHEN: I will endeavour to obtain it. I will try to have copies in the Vote Office.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): What Bill will be taken first to-morrow?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The Allotments Bill.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 6th May, 1890.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

ST. GILES'-IN-THE-FIELDS BOARD OF WORKS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will explain the grounds on which the Local Government Board, on 27th February, 1890, sanctioned the increase of salary from £300 to £600 per annum to the Medical Officers of Health for the St. Giles'-in-the-Fields District?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Medical Officer of Health referred to, prior to his re-appointment, was not required to devote his whole time to his duties. This condition was imposed upon him when he was re-appointed, and it was in consideration of this that the Vestry assigned to him the higher salary. The matter appeared to have been fully considered by the Vestry on more than one occasion, and the Local Government Board did not think that the circumstances were such that they should withhold their assent to the proposal. At the suggestion of the Board, however, it was made a condition that the medical officer should agree that, in the event of his losing his office by reason of the appointment of a Medical Officer of Health for an extended area including the whole or part of the district assigned to him, he would make no claim to compensation for any loss of emoluments exceeding the salary of £300 per annum, which he had previously received.

THE INDIA COUNCIL BILL.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury state at what time the Second Reading of the India Council Bill be taken? Will it be taken before Whitsuntide?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): It is impossible for me to say at the present moment when the Bill will be taken. I will endeavour to give ample notice, and I may assure the hon. Member that, at all events, a few days' notice will be given.

CONSULAR COURT AT TAMATAVE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Secretary of State has received a Memorial from M. Auguste Desvaux, of the Mauritius, alleging arbitrary action by the Acting British Consul at Tamatave in prohibiting M. Desvaux from practising in the Local and Consular Court; and whether the Government will make any inquiry in the matter?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The matter is now in the hands of the Supreme Government of the Mauritius, over which Her Majesty's Government have no authority, and to the proceedings of which, even if they disapproved of them, they could not effectively object. The proper Court of Appeal from the Supreme Court of the Mauritius is the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The Acting Consul will be defended in the action brought by M. Desvaux by the Procureur General of the Mauritius.

LOCAL TAXATION, &c. BILL.

MR. CALEB WRIGHT (Lancashire, S.W., Leigh): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if, by virtue of the powers given to County Councils by Section 6 of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, in respect of premises ceasing to be used for the sale of intoxicating liquors, such Councils may make pecuniary compensation to all persons having such interest as is there indicated; and, if so, upon what principle or mode of calculation such compensation may be assessed and paid?

*MR. RITCHIE: The powers proposed to be given to County Councils in respect of the extinction of licences are purely voluntary. They are not bound to buy, nor those interested to sell. This being so, it did not seem to the Government to be necessary to lay down any principle or mode of calculation by which the extinction of the licence should be secured.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Are we to understand from the answer of the right hon. Gentleman that "purely voluntary" means that it is in the discretion of the County Council to give or not give in various cases of the same quality and degree?

*MR. RITCHIE: Unquestionably; it is entirely within their discretion. They will never spend a penny unless they like, and the mode in which they spend it is entirely within their own option.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): Is there to be any other means of dealing with the money except through the County Council?

*MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir; no other means.

LIQUOR LICENCES.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total amount received last year for licences for the sale of intoxicating liquor in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively; and whether he will grant a Return showing the amounts so received from each county and county borough?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I must ask the hon. Member to repeat the question on Thursday. It will not be possible to procure the information for some time.

MR. STOREY: Will the information be given before the House goes into Committee on the Licensing Bill? because it is upon this basis that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to allocate the money.

MR. GOSCHEN: I think the Government will be able, in the course of a few days, to give the information in regard to each county and county borough. I will see what can be done.

KING JA JA.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is a fact that King Ja Ja, of Opobo, is being removed, or about to be removed, from his place of captivity at St. Vincent; and, if so, whether it is proposed to re-instate him in his own country?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : It is not a fact. Her Majesty's Government, have no such intention at present.

THE MOSSFIELDS COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. PICKARD (York, W.R., Normanton) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a verbatim copy of the shorthand notes taken at the Mossfields Colliery Explosion Inquiry held before A. Flint, esquire, on 22nd February and following days, upon the bodies of 59 men and boys ; whether, notwithstanding the expressed opinion of Mr. Harold Thomas, barrister at law, as stated in his Report to the Home Office, he will order a prosecution of the late manager of the colliery, seeing that Section 21 was violated and General Rule 7 disregarded and censured by the coroner, and especially having regard to the great loss of life consequent upon such violation and disregard of the Mines Act of 1887 ; and whether, taking all interests into consideration, he will order a special inquiry into the cause, or causes, of this explosion, as provided in Section 45 of "The Mines Act, 1887 ?"

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam) : In view of the specially interesting nature of the questions raised in this case, the Secretary of State is willing to make an exception here, and to present to Parliament a print of the evidence taken at the inquest. The three months mentioned in Section 62 of the Coal Mines Act, 1887, having expired on January 16, no prosecution for offences against that Act can now be instituted. The Secretary of State has doubts whether any other criminal proceeding could be instituted with reasonable prospect of success ; but he will refer the evidence, when printed, to the Director of Public Prosecutions for his examination and Report whether any such proceedings should be taken. The Secretary of State is taking steps to carry out Mr. Thomas's recommendation as to the alteration of one of the Special Rules. He does not propose, having regard to the great care that was given to the inquiry before the coroner, to order a fresh inquiry under Section 45.

THE LLANERCH COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. PICKARD : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a verbatim Copy of the shorthand notes taken at the coroner's inquest on the 176 bodies killed by the explosion at the Llanerch Colliery, Monmouth, on 6th February, 1890 ; whether he will give instructions to prosecute the manager and firemen for having violated General Rules 4, 8, and 12 of "The Mines Act, 1887 ;" and whether, having regard to the safety and well-being of our miners generally, and the Llanerch miners in particular, he will institute a special inquiry into the cause or causes of the explosion at this colliery, as provided in Section 45 of "The Mines Act, 1887 ?"

MR. STUART WORTLEY : The Secretary of State is daily expecting the Report of the learned counsel who represented the Home Office at the inquest. Pending its receipt, he is not in a position to reply to the questions of the hon. Member.

EXPERIMENTS ON ANIMALS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Return of Experiments authorised upon animals in 1889 for the advancement of medical knowledge of the living body will be ready ?

MR. STUART WORTLEY : The Return was produced on Saturday last.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT ON PERJURED EVIDENCE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is possible to give any compensation to the men Gleeson, Brady, Brooks, and Whaley, for false imprisonment ?

MR. STUART WORTLEY : The Secretary of State has nothing to add to the answer which he gave to a similar question of the hon. Member on the 21st April last.

JESUIT COLLEGE AT VALENCIA.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has observed the statements in the Spanish newspapers that the Jesuit College in Barcelona is registered as belonging to British subjects, although there are neither English priests nor English collegians there, and that the same is the case with regard to the Jesuit College at Valencia; and that the British flag was raised over the latter college during the recent riots in that town; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into this matter, in regard to which very strong protests are being raised by the Spanish Press?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hoisting of the British flag over the Jesuits' College at Valencia has been reported to Her Majesty's Government by Her Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid, who states that the building appears to belong to a British subject. No representation on the subject has been made by the Spanish Government.

CENTRAL AFRICA—THE STANLEY EXPEDITION.

MR. ALFRED PEASE (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true that the survivors of the slaves with which the Stanley Expedition was manned, and which were originally hired from Arab and other owners at Zanzibar, have been handed over to their original owners, and returned into slavery at Zanzibar; and whether it is a fact that the wages they earned on the Expedition have been appropriated by their owners? I also wish to know whether the attention of the Government has been directed to certain telegrams that have appeared in the Times newspaper, from Zanzibar, more especially one dated 29th April, in the Times issue of 30th April, in which the following statement occurred:—

"A German steamer sailed to-day for the Congo with 400 mixed slaves and freemen, recruited here for the Congo Railway;"

whether Her Majesty's Government have any information, confirmatory or otherwise, with regard to the allegations that numbers of slaves are being shipped from time to time from Zanzibar to the Congo State, to supply labour for the construction of the Congo Railway; and whether he has any information to show that the export of slaves from Zanzibar, whether as slaves or under the colour of engagés has greatly stimulated the Slave Trade in the Lake districts?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have been informed by Her Majesty's Consul General in Zanzibar that the steamer in question sailed after an inquiry had been held on board by the German Authorities on the East Coast. It is understood that the Zanzibar Government is in communication with the Congo Government on the subject. No information has reached the Foreign Office to the effect stated in the last paragraph of the question. Her Majesty's Government are informed that the engagement of these persons is perfectly free on their part. It would be preferable from our point of view that they should take service with the East African Company at Mombasa, but they elect to go to the Congo, and it is possible that the liberality shown to the porters of the Emin Relief Expedition have influenced them in their choice.

MR. A. E. PEASE: Is it the fact that the slaves were returned to their masters at a date subsequent to the decree of November, which declared all slaves free, entering or returning into the territory of the Sultan?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood me. I did not say that the slaves were returned to their masters, but that they voluntarily went back. The Relief Committee had nothing to do with the matter at all. The men voluntarily engaged themselves, and when their service was ended they returned.

MR. A. E. PEASE: Will the right hon. Gentleman reply to the last part of the hon. Member's question, namely, whether the export of slaves from Zanzibar, whether as slaves or under the colour of engagés, has not greatly stimulated the Slave Trade in the Lake Districts?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have stated that no information of the kind has reached Her Majesty's Government.

COMPENSATION TO RETIRED OFFICERS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the United Service Gazette of Saturday, 26th April, stating that a certain Major General, compulsorily retired, had asked for, and been refused, the actuarial calculations upon which the rate of compensation was fixed; and, if so, why was it refused; and, if those calculations were correct, why was the data upon which the calculations were founded given in the case of a retired Colonel of Engineers, and refused to the other officers?

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Actuarial calculations as to the retired pay of officers are confidential documents for the assistance of the Secretary of State in fixing the amount to be awarded. I am not aware that the actuarial calculations have been given in any recent case.

Mr. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he will call the attention of the Director of Public Prosecutions to the facts and allegations connected with the Salford gas contracts, with a view to proceedings being taken against all persons who have not yet been brought to justice, with respect to whom prima facie evidence exists that they have been engaged in a conspiracy to defraud the ratepayers of Salford?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I have not sufficient information to enable me to reply to the question. If any statement is laid before me I will take care that it is submitted to the Public Prosecutor.

Mr. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consider the propriety of introducing a Salford Corporation (Commission) Bill, on the lines of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Commission) Bill, which was introduced into this House by the Home Secretary, the First Lord of the Treasury, and the Under Secretary for the Home Department, in the year 1888?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: I would remind the hon. Member that the Metropolitan Board of Works (Commission) Bill was only introduced after an Address to the Crown had been moved by the right hon. Lord the Member for Paddington, and after he had shown that there was no legal remedy open to those who felt themselves aggrieved. As regards Salford, the Government are not at all satisfied that the legal remedies have been exhausted. In the absence of proof to that effect, and in the absence of an Address to the Crown, the Government as yet see no reason why they should be expected to take the initiative.

LICENSED HOUSES.

Mr. STOREY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will prepare and present to the House a Return of the licensed houses (distinguishing full licences from licences for "beer on") in each licensing area in the country, and setting out the situation of each such House, the name of the owner, and the name of the ostensible licensee?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: The Return presented on the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington seems to me to answer every necessary purpose. The Return the hon. Member asks for would be exceedingly difficult to obtain; it would be most costly, and is not required for any necessary purpose.

Mr. STOREY: If the right hon. Gentleman will inquire I think he will find that every clerk to the Licensing Justices has at this moment a Return in his possession for the present year. I have seen a Return for one borough, and I could easily obtain similar Returns for other boroughs. I would, therefore, ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider the matter, and to request these gentlemen to forward copies of the Returns, as they contain information of extreme importance.

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: I will, of course, in answer to the request of the hon. Member, consider the matter; but I think he will see that a complete Return would be of a most voluminous character, seeing that some 110,000 persons or houses are licensed, and to give all the information asked for by the hon. Member would involve a considerable amount of labour and expense.

THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consent to postpone the Second Reading of the Local Taxation Bill until the County Councils have had ample time to express their opinion on those provisions of the measure which impose on them the obligation of negotiating for the purchase of licences?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Baronet has already announced his intention of doing his best to defeat the Local Taxation Bill, and the Government do not feel called on to help him in that object by postponing the Second Reading of the Bill.

IRELAND—THE SPECIAL COMMISSION —THE CONVICT M'CAFFREY.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on what date the prisoner M'Caffrey, who was removed to London to give evidence before the Special Commission, was brought back to Downpatrick Convict Prison; for what period he was detained in London; and whether he was called as a witness before the Commission; whether he has been kept in solitary confinement, or otherwise punished, and for what periods, since his return; and if he can state the reason for his punishment, and at whose instance he was brought to London?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The General Prisons Board report that the convict mentioned was removed to London, not to give evidence before the Special Commission, but as a witness in the case of "The Queen v. Molloy." In connection with that case he was in London for one period of 19 days ending March 20, 1889, and a second period of nine days. Since his return to Ireland a year ago he has been punished for various breaches of prison discipline and rule on five occasions. His attendance in London was at the instance of the solicitors for the prosecution.

MR. M'CARTAN: For what period was he punished?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Prisons Board have not sent me full particulars; but if the hon. Gentleman will put down a further question I shall be happy to obtain them.

IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland have, for the past four or five years, paid a grant to Townavanny National School, in County Fermanagh, the average attendance being under 20 pupils, the manager being the Rev. John Donaldson, Presbyterian minister, the teacher being also a Presbyterian, the pupils attending the school being all Episcopalian; whether he is also aware that the local Episcopalian minister, the Rev. D. E. Dickson, is manager of a vested National School at Rossharbour, with an Episcopalian teacher, and within about a mile distant from the residences of the pupils attending the Townavanny school; and whether the Regulations of the Treasury sanction the payment of a grant to this Presbyterian school, for the purpose of giving religious instruction to a small number of Episcopalian children, when they can, as in this case, obtain such instruction from a teacher of their own creed in the school about a mile from their homes, there being no Presbyterian children whatever in the locality of either school?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not received a detailed Report on the several points mentioned in the question; but the Commissioners of National Education inform me that it is the case that the first mentioned school receives a modified and reduced grant. The second mentioned school receives a full class grant, the attendance being sufficient. The Commissioners propose to inquire further into this matter.

THE CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that a number of important Judgments delivered in the High Court of Justice in Ireland, in cases under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, have been collected in a volume and published by the Queen's printers in Ireland; whether copies of this volume have been supplied to the Crown Solicitors, Sessional Crown Solicitors, and Resident Magistrates throughout the country; whether he can say at whose request this volume was published; and if copies will be supplied to Irish Members of Parliament or to Irish lawyers at a fair price?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): The volume referred to was printed by the direction of the Government for the information of Magistrates. It was also supplied to Crown and Sessional Crown Solicitors. It has been the constant practice of Government to have Reports of important cases printed by the Queen's printers for private use, and not for public sale; and there would be difficulty in departing from this course on the present occasion.

MR. HUGH GRAHAM, J.P.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the serious charges of intemperance which have been brought against Mr. Hugh Graham, Justice of the Peace, of Dromore, County Tyrone, have been before the Lord Chancellor for several months; whether the Lord Chancellor has yet given his decision, and what is the cause of so long a delay; and whether he is aware that the Magistrate whose conduct has been so gravely impugned still sits in the Dromore Petty Sessions Court?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland that he has suspended the gentleman mentioned from sitting on the Bench of Magistrates. The allegation in the last paragraph of the question does not appear to have been well founded.

LAND COMMISSION—ULSTER.

MR. MCARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state how many fair rent applications, served on the Land Commission in respect of holdings in Ulster, still remain undisposed of; and what number of legal Sub-Commissioners are now engaged in hearing cases in Ulster?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that 9,902 applications have been disposed of. The number of Sub-Commissioners now engaged is three, one of whom is partly engaged in the Province of Ulster, and the other two partly in Ulster and partly in another Province. I believe that the number of outstanding cases is being diminished.

THE TIPPERARY POLICE.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what are the instructions to the police in Tipperary regarding the watching and following of persons visiting that town; is he aware that on the 2nd instant when Mr. John Kelly, of Dublin, arrived at the Limerick Junction he was joined by a policeman, who walked by his side keeping step with him and accompanying him everywhere; and whether he will inquire into the practice of the police in this respect, and prevent any provocative conduct on their part towards people visiting the town of Tipperary?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The instructions to the police are to watch persons who may reasonably be suspected of indulging in illegal practices. I believe Mr. Kelly comes under that description, so that it is probable that he was followed by the police on his arrival at Limerick Junction.

IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Treasury has yet sanctioned the establishment of the proposed Fund for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the Irish National teachers; and, if not, will he say what has caused the delay?

*MR. GOSCHEN: We have taken much trouble in this matter, and have devoted a large amount of time to it. The delay has been due to what the Treasury consider inadequate provisions for the solvency of the Fund. Some of the rules proposed sinned in our opinion against sound actuarial principles, and seemed likely to involve trouble and disappointment in the future.

MICHAEL MORRISSEY.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that Michael Morrissey has now been more than six weeks in prison for having failed to remove certain buildings erected for the shelter of evicted tenants on the farm of Mrs. Kelly, of Clongorey, over which he had no control, he will consider the desirability of recommending his immediate release?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Morrissey is in prison for contempt of Court, and the Irish Executive have no power to deal with the case. It is open to the prisoner to obtain his immediate release by purging the contempt.

In reply to a further question by Mr. CAREW,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: As far as my memory enables me to say, this man's wife has been released on account of ill-health.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Have the Irish Executive no power to interfere?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I understand not. We have been clearly advised on that point, and I think I have already said so in answer to previous questions. I am told that the Irish Executive have no power whatever to interfere in a case of committal for contempt of Court.

BOYCOTTING—CASE OF MR. DALY

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state on what date Mr. Daly and the other prisoners convicted of boycotting the Great Northern Railway at Carrickmacross were transferred from Derry to Belfast gaol; and if he will explain why they were obliged to wear the prison uniform on their journey, and handcuffed when brought through the streets of Belfast?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the prisoners referred to were removed from Derry to Belfast Prison on 8th April. These prisoners elected to wear the prison dress while in prison, and were, as usual in such cases, transferred in that clothing. They were handcuffed in accordance with the practice which is adopted by the constabulary in the case of prisoners under their charge when passing through a thickly-populated town, when the escort happen to be also strangers to the town.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a man named Dunlop, who was lately convicted of forgery, and who was suspected of complicity with murder, was taken to prison in his own clothes, and was not handcuffed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not acquainted with the case; but, of course, the duty of the police would be regulated by the circumstances of the case.

UNITED STATES TARIFF BILL.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it is true that the new Tariff Bill submitted by the Committee of Ways and Means to the House of Representatives of the United States of America provides for the practical prohibition of importations of Sheffield cutlery and edge tools by an increase in the Import Duties of from 50 to 100 per cent.; and in the event of the adoption by a friendly Power, whose productions are admitted to a free market in the United Kingdom, of proposals so serious to British industry, if Her Majesty's Government will consider the desirability of extending the doctrine of commercial reciprocity adopted by this country in the case of Greece?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It appears to be intended in the Bill on the whole to increase these duties, though in some classes of edged tools a decrease seems to be intended. Her Majesty's Government are not in a position to judge what the amount or value will be, and the proposals are subject to alterations during the progress of the Bill. It would be impossible to object to such proposals, because they are founded upon a fiscal policy different to our own; and there is no opportunity of procuring reciprocal reductions unless we are imposing duties upon staple articles of production from the country in question, as was the case in regard to Greek currants.

THE ALLOTMENTS BILL.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I wish to put a question to the President of the Local Government Board in reference to the Allotments Bill. I had an Instruction down upon the Paper on Friday, which I was prevented from moving; but I wish to know if the right hon. Gentleman will introduce clauses for the purpose of cheapening the procedure under the Act in the direction of the Instruction I had intended to move, which Instruction was to the effect that in case of compulsory purchase now extra allowance should be made; and also clauses to provide that the Local Authorities shall have more freedom as to the extent of the land they may require for the purpose of allotments. Will the Government introduce clauses of that nature now, or will they re-commit the Bill at a later period, with the view of inserting clauses to cover those purposes?

*MR. RITCHIE: The very fact of the hon. Gentleman being in order in moving an Instruction to the Committee will show that, unless such an Instruction had been agreed to, neither the Government nor any individual Member could possibly introduce such clauses. Therefore, whatever may be the view of the Government they would be unable to take the course suggested by the hon. Member.

In reply to a further question by Mr. CHANNING,

*MR. RITCHIE said: The progress of measures now before the House is not so rapid as to afford the slightest chance of a Bill dealing with the questions raised by the hon. Member becoming law, or even to justify its introduction.

THE WHITSUNTIDE HOLIDAYS

Mr. HERBERT GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the statement which appears in the public Press to-day in regard to the Whitsuntide holidays is correct?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir; there is no foundation whatever for it.

LATE SITTINGS.

Mr. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question with reference to the late Sitting on Monday when the House did not rise till a quarter past 1 o'clock this morning. The Votes and Proceedings of Friday's Sitting set forth that "it being after 1 o'clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put." Last night, however, considerably after 1 o'clock, and after the Money Bill exempted from the operation of the Standing Order had been disposed of, the House proceeded to deal with between 60 and 70 Orders of the Day. It was a great inconvenience to hon. Members to be kept after 1 o'clock, while the Orders of the Day were being hurriedly gone through, in order to prevent possible mischief in consequence of some Bill being run through without the knowledge and concurrence of the House; and I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will propose such a verbal alteration in the Standing Order relating to theittings of the House as will prevent any business being taken after 1 o'clock, except such business as either by Standing Order or Resolution of the House can be taken after that hour?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is somewhat unusual to put a question relating to the Orders and Rules of the House without notice; but in reply to the question of the right hon. Gentleman I have to say that the course pursued at an early hour this morning was, in the first place, for the convenience of the House; and, in the second place, in accordance with the Standing Orders, which provide that after any business exempted from the operation of this Resolution (that is the 12 o'clock Rule) is disposed of, the remaining business of the Sitting shall be dealt with according to the provisions applicable to business taken after 12 o'clock; and it is within the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman that business taken after 12 o'clock at an ordinary Sitting is gone through for the convenience of the House, and Orders are postponed or, if no objection is made, they are taken, and when the Orders are gone through the adjournment is moved. That was the course pursued this morning, and I think it was one which was for the convenience of the House. I will, however, consider the question, and if there appears to be any general desire on the part of the House that a change should be made, I will see what course can be adopted.

Mr. H. H. FOWLER: I wish to explain that I thought the matter so important that I wished to call attention to it without loss of time, and had no opportunity of giving notice.

POST OFFICE AT BOOTLE.

COLONEL SANDYS: I had intended to ask the Postmaster General whether there would be any objection to grant a separate General Post Office, distinct from the Liverpool Post Office, to the Borough County of Bootle, in Lancashire, which has 54,000 inhabitants at the present time and is increasing; such change of postal arrangements being desired by many persons residing there ; but at the request of the right hon. Gentleman I beg to postpone the question until Thursday.

INLAND REVENUE REGULATION

BILL.—(No. 211.)

Bill reported from the Select Committee on Statute Law Revision Bill [Lords] with Minutes of Evidence.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 110.]

Bill re-committed to a Committee of the whole House for Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 255.]

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION

BILL.—(No. 112.)

Bill reported from the Select Committee, with Minutes of Evidence.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 160.]

Bill re-committed to a Committee of the whole House for Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 256.]

MOTION.

MINING ACCIDENTS (SCOTLAND) (NATIONAL INSURANCE) BILL.

(On Motion of Mr. Baird, Bill to provide for a system of National Insurance against accidents in mines in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Baird, Mr. Hozier, Mr. Hugh Elliot, and Mr. Vernon.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 257.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ALLOTMENTS ACT (1887) AMENDMENT

BILL.—(No. 147)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

* (3.0.) MR. OLDROYD (Dewsbury): I beg to move, in line 12, page 1, after "parish," to insert "not being within the limits of a borough as defined by 'The Municipal Corporation Act, 1882.'" I think the Amendment is one of considerable importance, its object being to restrict the operation of the Bill within a borough. Under the principal Act the

Sanitary Authority of any district, on the representation of six electors, are placed under an obligation to provide allotments, and under the measure now before the House, on the default of such Sanitary Authority, an appeal is conceded to the County Council of the county. It is against this broad and indiscriminate appeal that I take objection. I quite admit the view put before the House by the President of the Local Government Board on Friday, that this Bill does not open up the general question of allotments. It is merely an Amendment Act introduced with the intention of giving greater efficiency to the provisions of the original Bill ; and I submit that the Amendment which I am moving does not in any way frustrate the design of the Government to render the original Act more efficient. My object is not to exclude boroughs from the benefits of the principal Act, but simply to exclude them from what I conceive to be the disadvantage of the appeal instituted by the Bill. I will not deal with the question of the county boroughs. I have been given to understand that the Government are disposed to agree to another Amendment on the Paper excluding the county boroughs from the operation of the Bill. I propose, therefore, to confine my remarks to the Amendment, so far as it affects the non-county boroughs. I do not move it in any spirit of hostility to the Government, because I fail to see that there is any Party question involved in the matter, and I hope and expect to receive support from both sides of the House, and especially from those who are the friends of municipal government. I wish the Committee thoroughly to understand that I have no intention of excluding the boroughs from the benefit of the principal Act. I do not object to an appeal from the Sanitary Authority to the County Council elected on a proper basis, but I am opposed to an appeal from the Municipal Council to the County Council elected on identically the same franchise and with no higher sanction than the authority from which the appeal is made. I fail to see any reason whatever for the institution of an appeal of any sort from the decision of the Town Councils. They are an authority above suspicion, and if they prove recalcitrant and refuse to comply with the wishes of the people in regard to making provision for allotments, the remedy is a very simple one, and will be in operation on every 1st of November, when one-third of the Town Council has to submit itself for re-election. Therefore, a Court of Appeal is already established, namely, the electors themselves. If it is necessary to institute an appeal, I venture to think that it ought not to be to any authority more remote from the place concerned and the parties interested than the Town Council itself. No authority can be in more intimate touch with a place and with those concerned than the electors and the representatives of the ratepayers in the Town Council, and I think there could not be a better appeal than to the constituency itself, which has all the responsibility of the matter, knows its own mind, and is supposed to know its own business. There is no appeal from this House to the House of Lords or to the Crown; but the appeal is back again to the people, who are the source of the power and the authority of the House. I object to an appeal from an authority which has full cognisance of the affairs of the town, and maintain that in all cases it should be to the electors rather than from them. If a Court of Appeal is to be instituted, why should it be to the County Council, which has no higher sanction than the Town Council, and which must, from the very nature of the case, be less fitted for the consideration of the question of allotments than the Town Council can be? It is less in touch with the electors and must know less about the matter than those who live on the spot. It may be urged that the Town Council, according to the machinery of the Bill, will be represented in the County Council, which is to adjudicate in the matter. But the Town Council is only very fractionally represented. Take the case of the West Riding of Yorkshire. The County Council consists of 120 members; but by the machinery of this Bill the Committee will consist of not more than one-fourth, or 30 members, and the two solitary representatives of any particular borough will constitute a very fractional part of that Committee, and they may, individually, be directly opposed to the expressed will of the Town Council itself. Then, again, the representatives will be elected for county and not for local purposes. It may be urged that the County Council will not rush to a conclusion in these matters, but will institute an inquiry on the spot, and will be guided by the evidence brought before them. In reply to that, I say that the very necessity for inquiry is condemnatory of the principle laid down in the Bill. The Town Council would have no need for inquiry, because they would know all the concerns of the place and every interest that affected the ratepayers. Therefore, I submit that the arrangements and machinery of the Bill will lead to the all-important factor of local knowledge and local opinion being swamped by the opinion and views of those who are comparative strangers to the interests of the district concerned. I further maintain that if the opinion of the County Council is opposed to that of the borough it will, if put in force, engender a great deal of friction. The opinion of the County Council cannot be operative except in a case where it is opposed to that of the Town Council, and in the very nature of the case it would be a gratuitous affront to the Town Council and a reflection upon its judgment. What justification is there, I would ask, for making these offensive proposals? The Town Councils in the past have proved themselves equal to all the demands which have been made upon them, and their duties have been numerous and multifarious—some of them vastly more important than questions which are now sought to be taken out of their hands. Municipal Government is acknowledged on all sides to be the best form of Local Government, and it has proved itself effective both in small and large matters. I believe that the institution of an appeal from the Town Council to the County Council will establish a bad precedent and one that will be not only dangerous but insidious, leading to greater development on the same lines in the future. If we once acknowledge the right of the County Council to interfere in the local matters of a borough, it will end in the Town Council being completely overshadowed by the supposed greater importance of the County Council. What will the consequence be to the Town Council itself? It will be shorn of its powers and necessarily weakened. It will become a subsidiary body and be converted into a consultative Committee from whose judgment an appeal may be made to the better judgment of the County Council. That will be a heavy blow to the efficiency and independence of the Town Councils generally, and the result will necessarily be that the best men in the borough will refuse to serve on the Town Council, when they feel that all influence is withdrawn for them. I think that we cannot be too careful not to allow anything to pass this House in the shape of legislation which will tamper with our Municipal Government—an institution which has done more than anything else to train the people of this country in the art of self-government—an institution which has been encouraged and fostered by past legislation, and which has proved worthy of the confidence reposed in it. It will be a blow not only unseemly, but premature. It will constitute an appeal from an old authority which has been tried for many centuries to one which has not yet proved itself worthy of confidence, an authority yet untried and which has yet to win its spurs. Public opinion will effect every remedy that is necessary, because on the 1st of November in every year one-third of the Town Council must be re-elected. If the Town Councillors are opposed to public opinion, public opinion will know how to bring its influence to bear upon them. Then, again, the question of time may be urged in this case—that it may take a long time to bring round the Town Councils to a knowledge of their duties and a desire to perform them. The proposal, however, as it originally stood in the Bill, has been considerably altered by the President of the Local Government Board. Whereas time was to have been given, now, in the case of opposition by the Town Council, the affair is to be taken wholly out of their hands, and put into those of the County Authority. Therefore, as the Bill stands, it is even worse than it was when originally drafted. If an appeal from the Town Council is to be given to the County Council, we shall be adopting the principle of an untried authority, possessing a less intimate knowledge of the locality, usurping the power of the Local Authority, spending the money and pledging the credit of the authority which has been specially appointed to administer the local affairs of the district. That is both a dangerous and an un-Constitutional principle; and a proposal not only arbitrary, but one which casts doubt upon the wisdom and the sense of responsibility possessed by the Town Councils. Yet that is the view which the right hon. Gentleman has taken of the Town Councils, which he says have not in the past performed their duties satisfactorily.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have no desire to interrupt the hon. Member, but I did not make any statement of the kind.

*MR. OLDROYD: I am glad to find that I misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. RITCHIE: What took place was this: An hon. Gentleman on the opposite side urged that Boards of Guardians had not performed their sanitary duties in a satisfactory manner, and drew from that fact the conclusion that the Boards of Guardians ought not to be entrusted with the administration of this Act. In reply to that assertion, I said that no doubt there had been Boards of Guardians which had not administered satisfactorily the powers conferred upon them, and I added that there were also Municipal Authorities which had not performed their duties satisfactorily.

*MR. OLDROYD: That is exactly what I said.

*MR. RITCHIE: I was not referring to the administration of the Allotments Act at all, but to ordinary sanitary administration—water, drainage, and so on.

*MR. OLDROYD: I naturally thought that the application of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks were to the Bill before the House.

*MR. RITCHIE: That was not so.

*MR. OLDROYD: I do not propose to deal with the county boroughs in the matter. They are quite capable of taking care of themselves. There are 226 non-county boroughs, and I have addressed a communication to each one of them in regard to this Bill. I have received replies in 160 cases. In 124 of these, Town Clerks report that no application for allotments has been made under the original Act. But in 36 cases such application has been made. In 20 allotments have been provided, leaving only 16 to be accounted for. Of these 16, four have the matter at the present moment under consideration, and are awaiting further information on the subject. Of the remaining 12, Abingdon has not put the principal Act in force because there are plenty of allotments already available; Bewdley did not put it in force because land is already provided; in Buckingham the Town Council hesitate to take compulsory powers because voluntary measures have not yet been exhausted; in Jarrow the matter has been carefully considered, but it is found that land cannot be provided, except at too costly a rate; in Louth there have been a considerable number of applicants, but they refuse to give a market value for the allotments they desire to have; in Lyme Regis considerable difficulty has been found in securing land at a sufficiently low rent to make the Act workable; in Newbury the matter has been postponed; in Tenterden compulsory powers have not been exercised, and landowners have not yet offered their land; in Tunbridge Wells the Act would have been put in force, but it was found that the only land available is at too great a distance from the cottages occupied by the applicants; in Weymouth an advertisement was inserted in a local newspaper, resulting in 100 applications, but it was found that the applicants were not disposed to pay a price which would cover the cost of acquiring the land and administering the Act; at Wokingham the same remarks apply; and in the case of Workington the Act has not been put in force because the applicants were found not to be bona fide labourers, but a class for whom the Act was never intended. I maintain that these cases show that the principal Act has been put in force wherever it was possible, consistent with the interests of the locality, and that the Municipal Authorities have not shown any spirit of opposition to the working of the Act. I leave the case now in the hands of the Committee, and I hope that the President of the Local Government Board will see his way to leave the question an open one, so that Members may discuss it and vote upon it without feeling themselves trammelled by Party ties.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 2, page 1, line 12, after the word "parish," to insert the words "not being within the limits of a borough as defined by 'The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.'"—(Mr. Oldroyd.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(3.26.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): A similar Amendment stands on the Paper in my name, and I therefore beg to second the proposal of the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Oldroyd). In doing so I hope I may appeal to the President of the Local Government Board to have regard to the wishes of a very large portion of the House upon this subject. Almost without exception the feeling in the Municipalities is extremely strong and unanimous, and I believe that my right hon. Friend will both serve the State and the interests of his own Party if he will consent to recognise the prevalence of that feeling. I am quite sure that if we are compelled to divide upon the question there are many of us who will have regard to old municipal feelings—which are even older than Party feelings. As far as the county boroughs are concerned, the right hon. Gentleman has intimated to me that if the Bill is doubtful as to their inclusion in this clause a new section will be inserted to make it clear that there is no intention of establishing an appeal from the county boroughs to the County Councils. I hope that concession will not be limited to the county boroughs. I think there are the strongest reasons for extending it to the non-county boroughs. It is a distinct innovation to give an appeal from one representative body to another, especially when the latter is a collateral representative body. I do not hesitate to say that if the boroughs have to choose between an appeal to a Public Department and an appeal to a collateral tribunal of a similarly representative character to their own, they will choose the former. If I wanted to illustrate the strength and universality of the feeling in this matter I could not do better than refer to the right hon. Gentleman to his own Transfer of Powers Bill of last Session, which encountered so much opposition because it was based on similar lines to the present proposal. The clause would have a tendency to make an inroad on the sense of responsibility of Town

Councils. It must be remembered that the responsibility of these Councils has been exercised by them for a very long period—many of them have existed for centuries. The County Councils, much as we esteem them, are but the creations of yesterday, and have not that experience, that prestige, and that responsibility which attaches to the Town Councils. My second objection to the clause is that this is a distinctly local question, and that it is a matter to be dealt with in small areas and by communities themselves on the spot. What are the questions on which Local Bodies are called upon to act in this matter? The first is, whether there is a need of allotments; and the second is, can they be obtained on voluntary and reasonable terms? Surely these are essentially local questions. Who can know better than those who reside in the locality whether there is a need of allotments and how they can best be obtained? I hope our action on this point will not be misinterpreted. The more people we can associate with an interest in the land the better for those principles we support on this side of the House. It may be information to this House that the best illustration of the application of the allotments principle in this country is the case of the City of Nottingham. I know of no instance in which a progressive Municipality has done so much in various directions, and especially in the direction of providing allotments close to the doors of the people. I ask whether, if the wishes of the labourers are overlooked by their own representative body, it can be expected that they will appeal to a distant tribunal? If they do and are successful, there will be great friction; and whether they are successful or not there will be great feeling. I believe the feeling against this proposal is not confined merely to the boroughs. You will, I think, find it expressed even by those representatives who represent county constituencies. They feel that if the County Councils are to be called upon to interfere in a number of local matters, the chief reasons for their establishment will be jeopardised. I can quite understand that new bodies, which are themselves on their trial, which so far have succeeded admirably, and which have a great deal to do in the future, should say in this matter "Save us from our friends." I hope this demand will not be persisted in, and that the Government will see their way to assent to the Amendment.

*(342.) MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I hope the Committee will not be carried away by the two very able speeches which have just been delivered so as to overlook the very serious disadvantages this Amendment, if adopted, will produce all over the country. I think there is a general agreement that we should not spend much time in discussing the case of the county boroughs, because they have been already left outside the present county system, and it would be absurd to include them in it under this Bill. But with regard to the small boroughs the case is entirely different. There are at present over 200 of these boroughs which are fairly represented according to population in the County Councils. At least half of them have a population of less than 10,000, whilst 72 have a population of under 5,000, and 14 of under 2,000. The proposal is, therefore, to exclude from the operation of the Bill a large number of towns with extremely small populations, and which, by the deliberate judgment of the House two years ago, have been included in the county system for all purposes, whilst at the same time leaving within the operation of the measure a large number of towns of infinitely more importance in point of population. There are no less than 34 sanitary districts with a population of over 20,000, and these are not touched by the Amendment. I wish briefly to call attention to the extraordinary anomaly that will be produced in every county if the Amendment be carried. In Glamorgan, for instance, I find there are Local Government districts with populations of 33,000, 48,000, and 55,000 respectively. These would be included within the operation of the Bill. On the other hand, there are two boroughs with populations of less than 5,000, which, under the Amendment, would be excluded from its operation. Almost as great anomalies would be produced in every county in England and Wales. This Amendment, if carried, will be taken as a precedent in the future for excluding the non-county boroughs from almost every new proposal giving fresh powers to the County Councils. Everyone familiar with the working of the County Councils must admit that the concession made two years ago by the Government in excluding the large boroughs from the county system has been a very serious blow to the administration of county government, and has crippled it to a very considerable extent by taking out of counties like Lancashire a large number of their most important towns. I trust the Government are not prepared to carry that principle further. There is no danger of the boroughs being unfairly treated. We are always anxious to get as many representatives of the boroughs on the County Councils as possible, and under Clause 4 of this Bill the boroughs will always be very largely represented on the Allotments Committee of the Council. I beg to propose the Amendment of which I have given notice.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment,

To leave out the words "borough as defined by 'The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882,'" and insert the words "county borough as defined by 'The Local Government Act, 1888.'" —(Mr. Hobhouse.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): As a Member representing a county constituency in which there is one very small borough, I wish to support the original Amendment. If you exclude municipalities from this Bill, it seems to me you will carry out the principle that the people who live in the localities should be called upon to deal with matters which affect the localities. I know I am speaking the opinion of my constituents when I say they heartily support this proposition to exclude the municipalities for the operation of the clause.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): As a Representative of one of the boroughs which at present are included in this Bill, I wish most earnestly to press on the attention of the Government the extreme irritation that will be caused should the measure become law in its present form. The hon. Member for East Somerset (Mr. Hobhouse) has founded his argument mainly on the population of the different boroughs. It seems to me that, besides population, he ought also to look at the prestige of and the good work done in the past by Municipal Authorities. This is by no means a Party question. It seems to me to be as fully a Conservative as a Liberal policy to support institutions which have been in existence for a long time and have carried out the duties imposed upon them in an efficient and satisfactory manner.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): Hon. Members who oppose this clause argue as if it would interfere with the working of our Municipal Bodies. As I understand it, it goes no farther than to establish a Court of Appeal in case Local Authorities do not endeavour to carry out the Act. If the work of the County Councils is to be limited to the subjects which the hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. H. Gardner) seems to suggest, namely, only those matters which affect the whole county, I think the County Councils will have very little work to do. I quite concur in the suggestion that the self-contained municipalities should not be included in the clause. I would point out, however, that the proposition contained in the clause is an advance on real municipal life. The hon. Member for Islington (Sir A. Rollit) admitted that there must be a Court of Appeal even for Municipal Bodies on certain matters. The proposal now is that, instead of having that appeal to a Central Body, we should have it to a Local Body. That is decentralisation, and follows, as I contend, strictly municipal lines. If the Amendment be carried, the result will be that in large districts, with populations of 10,000, 15,000, or 20,000, the agricultural labourers will have a right of appeal if the authorities refuse to put the measure in operation, whilst in districts with populations of, perhaps, 3,000, 4,000, or 5,000, the labourers will be able to obtain no benefit whatever under the Bill if the Local Authorities refuse to Act. As to the opposition to the proposal to give this work to the County Councils, I would remind the House that we have been crying out continually, "What are we going to give the County Councils to do?" For my own part, I cannot fancy that the County Council would be the most effectual Court of Appeal in the small rural boroughs; but what I mainly look to is the supply of allotments to the agricultural labourers. If the Amendment be carried, and if all these small boroughs—many of them not larger than mere agricultural villages—are to choose whether or not they are to put the Act in force, the labourers who live in them and who, although a minority, are a large minority, will derive no benefit from this legislation. Therefore, while there is ample ground on municipal lines for excluding the larger boroughs which are self contained, and are properly represented in the Town Councils, there is every reason on the principles of municipal government why the small boroughs should have a right of appeal to the County Councils for the districts of which their localities form part, though an exceedingly small part as compared with the county areas themselves. Therefore, in the interests of the labourers who would have no benefit under the Act if the Government decline as they are doing to take action—because I know of several cases in which action has been indefinitely postponed—I say they might as well have no Allotments Act at all as be denied the right of appeal. Where the Act is carried out there is no hardship, because, if the Local Authorities carry out the Act, no appeal is necessary; but will anyone say that if they decline to put the Act in force these poor men should have no means of ensuring that it should be enforced?

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I would suggest that we are now discussing a larger question than would at first sight appear. Two hon. Members who have spoken in favour of this proposal from this side of the House have suggested a feature in the municipal government of the smaller towns which I think will surprise the residents in those places when they see the suggestion in print to-morrow morning. I understood one hon. Gentleman to say that in order to promote the harmonious municipal life of the counties, the municipal life of the towns should be merged and sunk in the counties. I ask, is that proposal one which at all follows the lines of municipal life as it now exists among us? It appears to me that the proposal is that in every Act of Parliament which confers a possible benefit on the residents in the towns there ought to be an appeal to the County Council; that in the case of Free Libraries where a Free Library is refused by the ratepayers there ought to be, according to the argument we have heard, an appeal to the County Council, and that the same principle should apply in the case of baths and wash-houses and other establishments of a like kind, which are not at present under the initiative of the Corporations. I trust the Committee will pause before sanctioning such a suggestion as this. To my mind, the reasonable view of this matter is that the provisions in relation to this subject, as they appear in this Bill, are simply attributable to a mistake in the drafting of the measure, and that it was certainly not intended by Her Majesty's Government that they should bear the construction put upon them; but this, I think, will be seen if hon. Members have regard to the discussions that have previously taken place on this matter. There has not been a single charge made against any Municipality in reference to this question, and I am glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board affirms this. Surely, then, we have a right to ask that some strong case should be made out for the new legislation now proposed. I claim that, in fairness to the boroughs we represent and to the Governing Bodies of the counties, this question ought to have been introduced in a very different manner, while in the discussion on the Second Reading of the Bill not a word was said regarding this proposal. Perhaps some of us are to blame for this, but it never entered my mind to suppose that the Bill intended to set up an appeal from the Corporations to the County Councils. I thought the Bill went completely in a contrary direction, and never supposed it contained provisions of this nature. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Wiltshire stated that the failure of the Allotments Act has been due to the want of a Court of Appeal from the Boards of Guardians, and the President of the Local Government Board said, in speaking on the Second Reading, that an appeal to the County Councils was justifiable only on the ground that that body was elected on a broad franchise, which the Sanitary Authority was not. Consequently, both the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member I have quoted grounded the whole of their case on the special circumstances of the difference between the franchise on which Boards of Guardians and County Councils were elected. Now, S'r, I would venture to ask, is it conceivable that a measure which is viewed with great apprehension on the part of the boroughs should work well? We are abolishing dual ownership in Ireland because of the friction it creates between landlord and tenant, and to propose a dual arrangement between the Borough Authorities and County Councils is to propose a scheme which I do not think would work, and which I cannot but regard as a most extraordinary one. I think that in every way this is a most undesirable proposition, and I trust that Her Majesty's Government do not intend seriously to press it upon us. No case whatever has, in my opinion, been made out for so great a change, and I trust the Committee will seriously pause before anything is done in the direction proposed.

*(4.14.) MR. WHARTON (Ripon): I think we are bound to recognise the non-Party tone of the hon. Member who has moved the Amendment, and I must say that, in my judgment, this is a non-Party question. All we are anxious to do is to advance a mode of acquiring allotments in a reasonable and proper way. It seems to me that, with regard to an appeal from the Municipal Borough Authorities, that is an entirely new question, and might well be deferred until the County Councils themselves have had the opportunity of discussing the view they may take of it. As far as I know, the question is one which has never yet been submitted to the County Councils for their opinion, and I should be only too glad if the question were deferred until that opinion can be taken. Another point on which I feel strongly is that the proposal is one which may possibly give rise to a considerable amount of friction. Though the County Council over which I preside consists of various component parts, it works in the most harmonious manner. Many of the Members come from the large boroughs, being Town Councillors. But I cannot help fearing that if this proposal were carried out, it would lead to friction, where harmony now prevails, and I respectfully urge the Government to pause before proceeding further. I believe the feeling of the municipal boroughs is unanimously against the proposed Court of Appeal; and I believe the Government would certainly not wish to disregard the opinion of the large municipal boroughs. In view of the friction that would be created, and in view of the fact that the matter has not been submitted to the County Councillors themselves, I would ask the Government to consider the representations that have been made.

*(4.16.) MR. RITCHIE: My hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding has had so much experience in connection with the administration of county affairs, and is one who always forms a judgment well deserving consideration on all matters on which he addresses the House, that I am sure his appeal must naturally have very great weight with the Government. Certainly it is the very last thing to be desired that any action of ours should create any friction between the members for the boroughs and the Representatives of the rural parts of the counties on the County Councils. So far as our information goes, we have every reason to believe that these two elements on the County Councils at present work harmoniously and agreeably; and certainly it would be a matter of great regret to us if we disturbed by our action that state of things. The Government are entirely at one with hon. Members in their appreciation of the manner in which Municipal Corporations have fulfilled their duties, and I think the fact that the Government took the pattern of the Municipal Corporation as the ground work of their Local Government Reform, is sufficient guarantee that the proposals of the Government cannot be, and are not, intended, to use the word of an hon. Member opposite, to affront the Municipal Corporations. The object the Government had in applying this Bill to the towns situated in the counties was to secure a regular and organised administration throughout the country, upon lines similar to those which we hoped would be adopted for all matters in which town and country are concerned. We desire to transfer to an elective body, on which all the Local Authorities within the county would be represented, the powers which are at present in the hands of the Central Department. The main object of the Local Government Act was decentralisation. As the House is aware, boroughs in the exercise of the powers conferred upon them are not altogether independent. If they fail in the performance of their duties, the Local Government Board can apply to the High Court for a mandamus compelling them to fulfil those duties. It is perfectly certain that the Local Government Board is not the authority to determine appeals, and we thought the County Council was exactly the kind of body to discharge that duty. But it is perfectly obvious, from what has taken place to-day, that this proposal is regarded with the greatest amount of jealousy by the Municipal Corporations, and the objection is largely supported by representatives of the rural parts of the counties on the County Councils. It is a view which, obviously, the Government cannot disregard. I think what has transpired inflicts a serious blow on the whole plan of Local Self-Government in this country. While I acknowledge, so far as this very question is concerned, that it stands on a somewhat different footing to other matters which the House might possibly have to consider in connection with Local administration and county administration, yet, by the House assenting to the proposal now before the Committee, I feel that it will do much to weaken the hands of the Government in transferring to the County Councils the various powers and duties which at one time they proposed or hoped to transfer. My hon. Friend who has moved an Amendment to the Amendment will have gathered that his proposal is one not likely to find acceptance. I would represent to him, therefore, the advisability of withdrawing his Amendment, and allowing the Committee to accept the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Dewsbury. I do not wish to conceal that I am suggesting something which I greatly regret. But I hope when the County Councils have been longer in existence, and when the administration of the powers they possess has created more confidence in them, the feeling of the municipalities will change. After the expression of opinion from all parts of the House, I think my hon. Friend would do well to withdraw his Amendment and to allow the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dewsbury to pass.

*(4.25.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): The right hon. Gentleman has said that by the adoption of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dewsbury a serious blow will be dealt to Local Self Government in this country; but I do not think the fault, if fault it be, is to be attributed to the step which the right hon. Gentleman is now taking; rather I think it is due to the form of his Bill to establish a Court of Appeal. Although in the marginal note to the clause the word "appeal" is used, I should say that the power which the Bill gives the County Council in certain circumstances is the power to over-ride the decision of the Local Authorities. That is rather more than an appeal. The Bill, in its original form, was to make the County Council the Court of Appeal in the event of the Local Authority not carrying out the Act; but the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman has on the Paper proposes to give the County Council power to over-ride the decision of the borough, and it is itself to carry out the decision. Nobody will regard me as unwatchful of any attempt by the boroughs to diminish the power and authority of the County Councils. In Committee, on the Local Government Bill, I endeavoured to resist, as far as possible, what seemed to be encroachments on the rights conferred upon them. Yet I join in the appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for East Somerset not to press this point. After all it is a small matter. Questions may arise on which it will be necessary to maintain the powers and rights of the County Councils. I doubt whether this is a matter sufficiently large to be worth fighting for. County Councils, I think, do not feel strongly on this point. It is important that borough and county members of County Councils should continue to work well together, as happily they do, as the hon. Member for Ripon has explained. There is some danger, if a clause of this kind is passed, of causing friction between the county and the borough members in reference to small matters. To my mind this Bill is scarcely of the slightest importance. I do not think it will have much effect, and I certainly do not think that in bringing in County Councils to over-ride the decisions of the boroughs in respect to these allotments you would accomplish anything at all. I would join in the appeal to the hon. Member for East Somerset not to press his Amendment to the Amendment.

*(4.31.) VISCOUNT EBRINGTON (Devon, Tavistock): I desire to point out the extraordinary state of things which will result in some counties if the Amendment is accepted as it stands. The smallest municipality will be free from appeal to the County Council, while the largest Local Board district will still be subject to appeal. In my own County of Devonshire, Torquay, which has a population of something like 40,000, is under a Local Board, and if the Amendment is accepted, there will be on the question of allotments an appeal from the Local Board to the County Council. The same thing will happen at Stonehouse, which has a considerable urban population: and, on the other hand, there is in another part of the same county a small municipality which is joined with seven other parishes to make up a sufficient area for the election of a County Councillor, and that municipality will be free from appeal. I venture to submit to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Local Government Board that if he accepts the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Oldroyd), he ought to extend it to places which have urban districts under Local Boards. I would further suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the operation of the Amendment should be limited in both cases to places with a population of 10,000 and upwards.

(4.35.) MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I shall feel inclined to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Somerset if it is pressed to a Division. Some of the larger municipalities, no doubt, could be trusted—perhaps better than the County Councils—to give an opinion in these matters, but, under the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dewsbury, it seems to me that some of the smaller boroughs would refuse to listen to the demands of the labourers, who would be absolutely without appeal at all. Under the Amendment large Local Boards, representing a population of 17,000, could be compelled to give the labourers allotments, whilst small municipalities, representing no more than 2,000 people, could ride rough-shod over the petitioners.

*(4.37.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I think that in discussing this matter we ought to remember that the Franchise is very different in Local Board districts and municipal districts. We regard the whole of the difficulty that has arisen to-day as due to the fact that the Government have not carried out their promise to give us District Councils. Until we have such bodies the Allotments Act will never be administered to the satisfaction of the labourers; but as to the Amendments before us, it must be borne in mind that, in the case of a municipality, if a Town Councillor does not respond to the wishes of the labourers, though they be a small minority in the constituency, they have the means, at election time, of testifying their disapproval of his conduct by their votes—and the desires of a minority, such as these labourers, are very likely to be supported by the bulk of the electors. The case of Torquay has been quoted, but I protest against singling out an instance of a town which has been so backward that, although it has 40,000 inhabitants, it has not yet obtained a charter. Take an instance, in Warwickshire, there we have three boroughs in close proximity—Coventry, Warwick, and Leamington. Two old boroughs and a modern one. Why should Coventry, as a county borough, be independent, but the ancient borough of Warwick and the modern borough of Leamington be made subservient to the County Council? Is there any reason why there should be an appeal against their decision in this matter? I do not think so, but, on the contrary, I think that the more responsibility you place on the shoulders of such municipalities the better will they do their work. It is because I believe that small boroughs are able to do their work well, and that, under the pressure of public opinion, they will do it well, that I support the Motion of the hon. Member for Dewsbury. The boroughs, as has been shown in the course of this Debate, have responded very satisfactorily to the demands made upon them by labourers under the Allotments Act—much more satisfactorily than the Rural Sanitary Authorities—and that being the case, I think they should be saved from the degrading review of the County Councils.

*(4.41.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I hope that, as the Government have stated their intention to accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Dewsbury, the hon. Member for East Somerset will be content to withdraw his Amendment. On the whole that seems to be the course which will best forward the interests of allotments, and the Committee may proceed then to make some further progress with the Bill.

*(4.42.) MR. HOBHOUSE: After the appeal made to me by both Front Benches, I should not be justified in putting the House to the trouble of a Division; but in withdrawing my Amendment I would ask the Government whether, at some future stage of the Bill, they could not take some step such as was suggested by my noble Friend (Lord Ebrington), for classifying the Local Authorities in a more satisfactory manner.

Original Amendment again proposed.

*(4.43.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I attach some importance to the proposal made by my noble Friend the Member for Devonshire as to Local Boards, and I would suggest to the Government that as the Bill is confessedly a temporary measure it should be confined to rural parishes. I can bear testimony from experience in my own Division as to the fitness of Local Boards to deal with the Act.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

*(4.44.) SIR WALTER FOSTER: I beg to move the Amendment standing on the Paper in my name, namely Clause 2, Page 1, line 12, leave out "six," and insert "two." On the Second Reading of the Bill, I pointed out that one of the difficulties we experienced in obtaining a proper administration of the Act, was that labourers in many parts of the country were afraid to take the initial step for obtaining allotments, lest they should offend the members of the Rural Sanitary Authorities, frequently including, as those bodies did, their own employers. It is surprising on looking down the list of such Public Bodies as have not put the Act in motion to find what a large proportion of them are Rural Sanitary Authorities. The farmers are, in many cases, opposed to their labourers having allotments, and the labourers are afraid very often to go before the body largely composed of the farmers, to request them to put the Act in force. Well, if it is hard for six labourers to sign the original application, it will be doubly hard for them to sign an appeal against the Local Authority. The labourer ought to be able to trust not to generosity or to patronage but to his rights under the law, and he ought to be able to enforce those rights without being obliged to get five other persons to support him. I move my Amendment with the object of limiting, as far as possible, the odium which will necessarily attach to those labourers who seek to put the law into force in opposition to an unwilling authority.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, to leave out the word "six," and insert the word "two."—(Sir Walter Foster.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'six' stand part of the Clause."

*(4.48.) THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): The Government cannot accept the hon. Member's Amendment which, I may say, I scarcely think he is serious in moving. It is absurd in these days to talk about labourers being afraid of enforcing their rights or of signing a requisition. It is a remarkable fact that it is only hon. Members opposite to whom labourers have expressed any fear that they will run a risk of losing their places or incurring any odium by signing such a requisition. I do not think that the County Councils ought to be set in motion under this measure unless there is a reasonable representation on the part of the district that there has been a failure to take action on the part of the Local Authorities. The principle here is the same as that in the original Act, and to that I am afraid we must adhere.

*(4.53.) MR. CHANNING: I give the hon. Gentleman full credit for sincerity when he says he is not aware there is any sense of intimidation amongst the labourers of the country.

*MR. LONG: I did not say that.

*MR. CHANNING: Amongst those with whom he is personally acquainted. If hon. Members opposite have not received communications from labourers expressing the fear they have to sign requisitions, it only shows that the labourers are unwilling to explain their grievances to Conservative Representatives. What is the position of the men who appeal in this case? They have already been, by the action of the Government, brought before the Guardians, and received a refusal from the Guardians. The people who are interested in getting allotments have made themselves obnoxious to a powerful body of men on whom very generally they depend for a livelihood, and, therefore, I submit my hon. Friend is right in suggesting that a smaller number of persons should be entitled to make this representation to the County Council. If the Government do not yield on this point, I trust my hon. Friend will press his Amendment to a Division.

*(4.56.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): The Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Long) has not given us any reason why the number should be "six;" he has only said he does not see any reason why the number should be "two." There would be no difficulty in many parishes in getting six men to sign, but three or four of the six would assuredly suffer for the action they had taken. This is a small point after all, one in which the Government might very well give way. If there is prima facie evidence by two people, surely that is enough.

*(4.58.) MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I should like to put a practical point before the President of the Local Government Board. The hon. Member for the Ilkeston Division (Sir W. Foster) thinks, as I do, there will be more difficulty in getting six signatures to a representation complaining of the action of the Sanitary Authorities than there would be in the original case—in getting six ratepayers merely to sign a representation that allotments are required. I admit that, in many cases, there would be no difficulty in getting six men to sign a representation to the Sanitary Authority that allotments are required. That is a very simple matter, but it is a totally different matter when you come to complain of the action of the authority. I think we made a mistake in the original Allotments Act in not reducing the number. When I moved an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill last Friday, I called attention to the large number of very small parishes, and I was told by Gentlemen opposite that it would be an insult to small parishes to join them to larger parishes. It is quite clear that, in a great number of parishes, it is impossible to get six ratepayers to sign a representation to the Sanitary Authority, because there are not six ratepayers in the parish. The Secretary to the Local Government Board laughs, but from a Return which one of the officials of the Local Government Board was good enough to provide me with. I find that in 1881 there were 331 parishes in England and Wales, the population of which did not exceed 25, and it may fairly be assumed that only one-fourth or one-fifth of these were ratepayers. There were 852 parishes in which the population was under 50, that means where there were only 12 ratepayers, and surely every one can see there must be considerable difficulty where there are only 12, and still more where there are only six, ratepayers in getting six ratepayers to sign a representation, firstly that they require allotments, and secondly complaining of the Sanitary Authority for not providing them with allotments. If there is only one man who requires an allotment, surely it is the intention of the Allotment Act that he should have just as great a right to have the Act put in force as a large number of men.

(5.5.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 222; Noes 160.—(Div. List, No. 72.)

Amendment proposed, after "and" in line 16, insert "suitable in quality and position."—(Mr. Channing.)

Amendment agreed to.

*CAPTAIN VERNEY: I would ask the Government to accept a verbal Amendment to line 17. As the clause reads "such persons may petition the County Council;" well, of course they can do this, any person may petition the County Council, and it does not require an Act of Parliament to declare that. I submit that the word "if" should be inserted after the word allotment; "if such persons petition the County Council" and so on to the end of the clause "the County Council shall proceed, etc., as hereinafter mentioned." It makes it mandatory instead of permissive.

Amendment proposed, line 17, after "such" insert "if."

Question put, and House cleared.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to say I would not have challenged a Division but for the discourtesy of Members of the Government, who refused to make any answer when the Amendment was moved.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

Amendment negatived.

(5.20.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): On behalf of the right hon. Member for Derby I desire to move the omission of the words from "on," in line 22, to "petition," in line 23.

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member for East Somerset (Mr. Hobhouse) has given notice of a similar Amendment, the omission of these and other words, for the purpose of making the clause apply so that the County Council shall act at once; perhaps it would be better to allow the hon. Member for East Somerset to move his Amendment, which embraces the omission the right hon. Gentleman desires to make, and then when we arrive at the proper point the consequent Amendment to line 23 may be moved.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: This Amendment stands in intimate relation to the proposed Amendment to line 23 to insert the words "within two months after the receipt of such petition." I think it best to move the Amendment, that the Government may express their intention as to the course they will take.

*MR. RITCHIE: As a matter of convenience the hon. Member may raise his Amendment on the Motion to omit these and other words of which the hon. Member for East Somerset has given notice. The omission of words is the preliminary Amendment.

*MR. COBB: Do I understand that if the hon. Member for East Somerset moves his Amendment my hon. Friend (Mr. Stevenson) can move the insertion of the words suggested by the right hon. Member for Derby? It will be observed that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Somerset goes to the omission of words beyond the omission now proposed.

*MR. RITCHIE: The operative part of the clause follows, but first it is a question of the omission of the words. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Somerset is accepted these words disappear from the clause, and then will follow the question of inserting other words, as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby.

*MR. COBB: But the result will be to weaken the effect of the second Amendment.

*(5.25.) MR. RITCHIE: The word proposed to be inserted should the Committee accept the omission would be "forthwith," having a more immediate effect than the words "within two months." The object of the Amendment as I understand is to make the operation of the clause more immediate, and that is also the object of the hon. Member for East Somerset, and either hon. Gentleman can carry out that object by moving the insertion of words.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: There are two objections to that course, and both on the same ground—that the proposed words are vague. There is something explicit about the words "within two months," but there is a vagueness about the word "forthwith," and that also attaches to the phrase "on prima facie evidence being given," which occurs both in the body of the Bill and in the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Somerset.

MR. RITCHIE: These words the hon. Member will move to strike out; it is then for the hon. Member to move the insertion of such words as he may desire.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I think, to prevent subsequent misapprehension, I had better move the Amendment now.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member can absolutely move the same Amendment subsequently; he is in no way prevented from carrying out his object by postponing it.

*MR. CHANNING: Will not that exclude the words "shall cause a local inquiry into the circumstances"?

THE CHAIRMAN: No; the proposition in the Amendment to line 32 is that there shall be a reference to the Standing Committee.

*MR. HOBHOUSE: The object of my Amendment is the same with that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby—to accelerate procedure. Under the Bill as it stands the petition must first be considered by the Council as a whole, and then referred by order to the Committee; but if my Amendment is adopted, then, as a matter of course, and without delay, it will go first to the Standing Committee, and it will be obvious this will be a saving of time. The Standing Committee will be called together with more ease and much more quickly than the Council itself.

Amendment proposed, in line 22, to leave out from the word "Council" to the word "and," in line 24.—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

Amendment agreed to.

Consequential Amendment in line 24, —(Mr. Hobhouse.)—agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 26, to leave out from beginning of line to end of Clause, and insert—

"Shall pass a Resolution to that effect, and thereupon the powers and duties of the Sanitary Authority under the principal Act, so far as regards that district or parish, shall be transferred from the Sanitary Authority to the County Council, and the County Council, in substitution for the Sanitary Authority, shall proceed to acquire land in accordance with the principal Act, and otherwise execute that Act in the said district or parish.

Provided that this section shall not affect the property in, or any powers or duties of the Sanitary Authority in relation to, any land which before the passing of the said Resolution was acquired by the Sanitary Authority under the principal Act."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

*(5.30.) MR. COBB: I do not rise to oppose this but simply to ask a question. I rather gathered from the right hon. Gentleman on Friday that he differed from me in the opinion I expressed that the effect of the operation of the Bill would be, in certain cases, to oust the authority of the Sanitary Authority and substitute that of the County Council for administering all the powers under the Act of 1887. I am not quite sure of the meaning and intention.

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member is, no doubt, quite right as to the powers with which the application under this Bill is concerned, but should there be any other allotments they would still remain under the administration of the Local Authority. The County Council may, if they think fit, re-transfer the power.

*MR. CHANNING: There is an Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Mid Devon (Mr. Seale-Hayne) in relation to this provision which I should like to move as an Amendment to the Amendment now before the Committee, that is to strike out the word from "provided" to the end of the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: First, we have to decide on the omission of the words; the Amendment will come in on the words proposed to be inserted.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(5.33.) MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): I have an Amendment to propose which does not, as an alternative course, interfere at all with the Act of 1887, or affect the Bill so far as it is an Appeal Bill. It is only directed to the new face placed upon the Bill by the right hon. Gentleman, when the Bill becomes, as I think I can show, an Administrative Bill of enormous dimensions under circumstances full of difficulty. Originally it was contemplated that this appeal from the Sanitary Authority should be heard, and that the matter should then, if desirable, be referred back to the Sanitary Authority as the Executive. In fact, there would be communications passing, during which the Sanitary Authority under pressure would have time to re-consider its decision. I feel there is likely to be, under this provision, a very large transference of action under the Act of 1887 to County Councils, because, rightly or wrongly, and probably because of much that has been said about them, Rural Sanitary Authorities are heartily sick of the Act. Now, the Amendment must be read in the light of Section 4 of the Bill, and then it will be seen that the County Council is to keep separate accounts, and, in fact, to have all the machinery for administration of the Allotments Act, and to create a vast bureau nominally directed by the Standing Committee of the Council, but only nominally, because it cannot be said that the County Council will know anything about allotments in, it may be, 200 or 300 parishes throughout the country. Therefore, although the Standing Committee will be supposed to bear the brunt of responsibility, really you are going to create under the Act an enormous agency of inspectors, lawyers, valuers, clerks, a long, tortuous, cumbersome machinery, through which I think very little of the wishes of the inhabitants will filter. It must be the view of most hon. Members you are going to create on an immense scale a system of State landlordism or County Council landlordism throughout the country, which, I think the Committee will agree, is uncalled for and unnecessary. The County Council will have to manage allotments, make rules and enforce them, collect rents, and when allotments fall out of occupation the County Council will become occupier. All this will be diffused throughout the country in relation to matters often of very trifling value. I feel very seriously that, by refusing to the inhabitants of a district the management and responsibility to which the people are entitled in reference to a purely local matter, you will keep up a seething mass of dissatisfaction. I know it is said you are to proceed by way of local inquiry, but I know something of these local inquiries. An Inspector goes down to a place altogether strange to him, and he has to collect evidence. The agricultural labourers to whom this gentleman will appear in the guise of a lawyer hold aloof in suspicion, and will have nothing to do with him; he then makes acquaintance with others in the district, is fed mentally and bodily, and returns to concoct a Report for the edification of the County Council. How natural is the alternative! It is only to give the inhabitants of the parish power to agree among themselves. And I believe that such a provision would be operative. I have had a good deal to do with allotments, and I say that this question can only be dealt with properly by those who live in the parish, and who, of course, know whether the land to be utilised for the purpose is suitable or not, who know with whom arrangements can be made, and whom it is useless to approach for the purpose. No mere local inquiry by a Committee appointed by the County Council could extract the necessary information. And, again, the inhabitants of a parish have many advantages for dealing themselves with such a matter. Why, then, cannot they be allowed to do it, with the restriction, of course, that what is done shall be voluntary. I agree that nothing could be more unwise than to give parishes compulsory powers which they are entirely unfit to exercise. Such a policy could only give rise to great difficulties. But I believe there are good prospects of the inhabitants agreeing among themselves, if only the President of the Local Government Board exercises the pressure which he will be enabled to, and I am confident that the result will be to secure general co-operation among the villagers. Supposing the parishes are small, you have good security for the good management of the allotments in the fact that it becomes almost a personal and private affair in which everyone is interested. And suppose that you have only two or three tiny allotments, is it not less rational, is it not less endurable, to put in force the cumbersome machinery which the County Council will employ? I believe that the machinery I have to suggest will prove one of the most successful forms of Local Government. I hold that, in the first place, if you appoint a Committee for a specific purpose you get the work done a thousand times better than if you appoint a body for general purposes and for a definite period; because, if you find your Committee neglecting its duty, or going outside the limits of the reference to it, you can promptly bring it to book, whereas if your general body is elected for a year, you may have to wait months before you can deal with it. Under the proposal of this Bill you will not enjoy the advantage of local knowledge, nor will the body you appoint be in harmony with the inhabitants of the village. How, then, can you expect the plan to work successfully? My personal experience in the matter of allotments has shown me how very Conservative men are in these matters. Some years ago a body of men applied to me for land for allotment purposes, and I lent it on the sole condition that they should manage it themselves by a committee of allotment holders and allotment workers. For two years I never went near the land; but when at last I did go I found everything in most satisfactory order. One entrance gate was locked, and near the other was posted a notice, which I commend to hon. Members opposite, that "Rents is now due, and must be paid according to Rule 20, or the lots will be forfeited." I found that the plots had been admirably managed by the committee of holders and workers. Now, I think we must all confess that the Act of 1887 has not proved a success. I am sure we are all anxious, both on this side of the House as well as on the opposite side, that this Bill should be a success. We are anxious that its provisions should be taken advantage of; we are desirous to take this opportunity of retrieving the mistake made in 1887. I do not believe that the Government will prevent our utilising the opportunity for so doing. I wish this Bill to meet with general approval throughout the country. I wish the Government to avoid the discredit and danger which must follow from "failure No. 2." I wish the Bill to be on lines which will accord with the general sense of the country. And having this desire I appeal to the Government to accept the suggestions I have put on the Paper.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the first word "authority," to insert the words "in an urban district."—(Mr. Stephens.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted in the proposed Amendment."

(5.47.) MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): May I, as a point of order, ask you, Sir, what we are discussing now? I was under the impression that we had not yet reached the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hornsey.

MR. STEPHENS: I asked the indulgence of the House to make the remarks I did because the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman now under Debate is inconsistent with the Amendment which I have put down, and if the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment were passed it would be incompetent for me to move mine.

THE CHAIRMAN: I shall have to put to the Committee, as an Amendment to the proposed Amendment, the insertion after the word "authority," of the words "in an urban district."

*(5.55.) MR. LONG: Nobody desires to question my hon. Friend's practical experience in allotment matters, or his bond fide desire to make this Bill satisfactory; but I do not think that he has shown to the House any reason for believing that the Act of 1887 has been a failure. When I find hon. Gentlemen opposite, who have distinguished themselves in connection with this subject by advocating the most extreme views as to the extension of the Local Government, cheering the hon. Member for Hornsey I am led to the conclusion that extremes are, indeed, meeting under this particular Bill. But while hon. Gentlemen opposite advocate the setting up a Parish Council, to be elected by ballot on the principle of one man one vote, and placing in their hands the control of all parochial affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey makes a very different proposal. In his proposal there is no voting by ballot, no one man one vote, and the result of the adoption by the Committee of his suggestion would be, in my judgment, to seriously delay any advance and reform in the system of Parochial or Local Government; because, as the hon. Gentleman must know full well, one of the greatest difficulties in the way of reform exists in the complexity and number of existing areas, and of the powers they already hold, and the obligations they have already incurred. Now, my hon. Friend's proposal, if adopted, would have this extraordinary result: that it would, in the case of urban districts, transfer the power to the County Council; but in the case of rural districts it would set up a new authority on the old system of election, and would add a new authority to the sufficiently large number of authorities already existing. I contend that my hon. Friend has not given the House any reason to believe that a greater prospect of success attends his proposal than that of the Government, which does not add to the existing authorities, and proposes the same machinery for the urban and the rural districts. My hon. Friend has drawn a painful picture of the terrible expenditure incurred under the Act of 1887.

And when he says that all admit that Bill to be a failure I am not sure that he speaks for anybody but the hon. Member for Hornsey, at any rate on this side of the House; and I think my hon. Friend can safely leave hon. Members opposite to give expression to their own views. But to return to the question of cost. I should like to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that there are standing in the name of my hon. Friend certain Consequential Amendments; and I think the Committee, after hearing the remarks of my hon. Friend with reference to the cost of working the Act of 1887, will be astonished when they read the last of those consequential Amendments, whereby my hon. Friend proposes that the new authority—

“ Shall appoint and may remove at pleasure such officers and servants as shall be necessary for the business of the Committee, . . . and with the approval of the vestry may appoint reasonable salaries, wages, and allowances for such officers and servants.”

If the proposal of my hon. Friend is agreed to the result will be to set up new authorities with power to provide salaries and allowances for the officers whom they may appoint, and this might very well lead to increased expenditure. There are, I hold, sufficient Local Authorities already, and it would be unwise to add to their number. Therefore, the Government recommend the Committee to adhere to our proposal, and not to adopt the somewhat remarkable recommendations of my hon. Friend.

(6.4.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I desire to support most heartily the proposal made by the hon. Member for Hornsey. I confess that, as a matter of order, I do not know the exact position in which we stand with regard to it, and so I will state broadly my opinions on this matter. I believe the Amendment before us deals with the urban districts, but I am more particularly concerned with the rural districts. I say distinctly that if the entire control of allotment matters is given to the County Councils they will have a great deal too much to do. Allotments should be regulated by committees appointed by the allottees themselves; and, therefore, although the Amendment put on the Paper by the hon. Member for Hornsey is not all we desire I shall support it as strongly as I can. I know that in the case of allotments in which a rev. friend of mine is interested they are governed by a committee appointed by the allottees themselves, with the vicar of the parish as chairman, and everything works admirably. Such committees have the local knowledge which is so valuable an element when allotment questions are under consideration. The fear that needless expenditure will be indulged in by such committees is groundless. At Stockton, near Rugby, where a system of the kind has been tried, a great success has been achieved. It has been said this afternoon that the Allotments Act is not an admitted failure. The Member for Devizes said the hon. Member for Hornsey was wrong when he declared it to be an admitted failure. No; the failure is not admitted, but it is a gross and notorious failure all the same; and if the hon. Member had used the word “notorious” instead of “admitted” he would have been strictly accurate. The acceptance of the present proposal would introduce a beneficial change, because it will convert a wretched fiasco into something like a benefit to the working classes.

*(6.11.) MR. CHANNING: The situation at which we have arrived is a somewhat surprising one. The hon. Member for Hornsey is evidently giving the Government a last chance of obtaining salvation. I do not for a single moment suppose that he binds himself to every letter and every sentence of the Amendments he has on the Paper; I suppose, rather, that he is offering the Government a chance to carry out in connection with the rural districts the principle which we have this afternoon decided to apply to the urban districts, and to ensure that the allotments question is dealt with by a Committee possessing local knowledge. I admit several of the contentions of the hon. Member for Wiltshire, and I agree that a Committee constructed on the lines suggested by the hon. Member for Hornsey would hardly be strong enough to deal with the financial questions involved. But I would urge the Government to give further consideration to this matter, and to see if they cannot, on the Report stage, bring up a clause for the creation of a Local Authority for the purposes of allotments in small areas. Having some knowledge of this question, I say that the Bill, if passed in its present form, will prove a mere fiasco, and will not achieve the objects which the Government have in view. I cannot support the Amendment in its present form; but I do urge the Government to apply to rural districts the principle which we have decided to apply to urban districts.

(6.15.) MR. COBB: I should like to know if the Government are willing to re-consider their decision in this matter. I am not going to discuss whether the Act of 1887 is or is not a failure. We have sufficiently discussed that point already, and we all have our own views upon it. It seems to me that the only difference between what I advocated on Friday last and the proposal of the hon. Member for Hornsey is one of name. He proposes to appoint a Committee which is to be elected by the Vestry. I know that there are objections to the mode of election by Vestry; but I venture to think that if the hon. Member's suggestion is accepted it will be necessary to elect the Parish Committee or Parish Council by ballot, and on the principle of one man one vote. The Secretary to the Local Government Board has suggested that a Parish Committee might incur expenses for offices. We shall want nothing of the kind, because in almost every village there is a schoolroom, partly maintained by the State, and these can be used for the purpose. I do not know if the hon. Member is aware that before the Bill of 1887 was brought in a proposal was made, in a Bill which I introduced, to appoint these very Committees, and that it was met by a promise on the part of the Government to deal with the question in a more satisfactory way. When the Bill was produced, however, it turned out that the Government thought Boards of Guardians to be more suitable authorities than Village Committees. The inhabitants of the villages hold a very different opinion. They prefer a Parish Council or a Local Committee. The hon. Member for Wiltshire has twitted us with giving up compulsory purchase. But I and my friends do not wish to abandon compulsory purchase; we leave that to the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division, who having for many years loudly advocated compulsory purchase as essential in dealing with allotments and small holdings, omitted altogether the Compulsory Clauses in his Bill last Session, and gave evidence in the same direction before the Select Committee on Small Holdings. I join in the appeal of my hon. Friend to the Government to consider whether some agreement cannot be arrived at.

*(6.21.) MR. RITCHIE: The Government cannot undertake anything in the direction the hon. Gentleman suggests. The same question was discussed on the proposed Instruction to the Committee, and the right hon. Member for Derby said—

“The Government might well flinch from accepting the proposal of the hon. Gentleman to set up a new authority in the parish for that particular purpose. If a new authority were set up it ought to be for other purposes. It would require great consideration, and, under the circumstances, he was not surprised at the Government declining to accept that portion of the proposal”

—the proposal which we are now discussing. The Government are now asked to embark in the creation of a new authority, and that in the face of the fact that hon. Members are not agreed as to what kind of authority it should be. I ask the Committee to consider the difficulty and complexity of the question we are asked to take up at this stage. It means practically the abandonment of the Bill. It may be a good Bill, or it may be a bad one. Hon. Members have different opinions on that point; but the Government think it a good Bill and much wanted. We are asked to set up that new authority, not for the purpose of managing the new allotments generally, but only those which shall be supplied by the County Councils on appeal. I cannot imagine that the Committee will ever consent to any such proposition as that of the hon. Member.

*(6.23.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: The authority which the hon. Member for Hornsey proposes to establish is not altogether new; it is identical with that established under the Free Libraries Act. In many counties, and especially is it the case in North Buckinghamshire, the County Councils are largely composed of Guardians, in North Bucks two-thirds are Guardians, and the appeal would, therefore, be from Guardians to Guardians. I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman realises the time which would be lost in taking action if his proposal is carried. At least, two years would be lost before a spade could be put into an allotment by the Twyford labourers, who have already waited three years. In the first place, the advertisement of action must be published in August or September; then the meeting cannot be held till December; then the Provisional Order can have no force until it is passed in this House in the next Session; and then at the succeeding Michaelmas a year's notice must be given to the tenant. And all this is supposing the proposal meets with no opposition, and that everybody is willing. Now we want a sharp and prompt remedy. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that the decision just come to by the House is a blow against Local Government. I say it is precisely the reverse. Whoever heard of one Elective Body appealing to another Elective Authority?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. and gallant Member is scarcely speaking to the Amendment.

(6.27.) MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I hold that two divergent principles are embodied in the Amendment; in one case you transfer certain powers from Urban Authorities to the County Council, or from a lower to a higher authority, and in the other you transfer power from the County Council to a Parish Committee, or from a higher to a lower authority. I think we should have an opportunity of dividing on each of the principles. I am opposed to the transfer of the powers under the Act to County Councils, but in favour of those powers being given to the Parish Authorities.

(6.29.) MR. STEPHENS: The Act of 1887 only placed compulsory powers in the hands of the County Authority; and as a parish is not a County Authority, I do not propose to give the parish compulsory powers. There is the greatest possible difference between what I propose and the proposal of the hon. Member for the Rugby Division. I propose the ancient operative Executive Body of the parish—the oldest authority we have, and which has exercised these powers with success, and never failing in their use. As to the officers, I admit the unfortunate slip made in the Amendment to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded; but, of course, these officers will never be wanted; all the powers have been taken, and it is quite absurd to suppose that any expense will arise. It will be possible for this Body to administer the affairs of the parish without officers. That may be a grievance, but it is not one which will be felt by the ratepayers.

*(4.46.) SIR WALTER FOSTER: I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to the position in which we stand. We have an Amendment of very wide range and great importance moved by the hon. Member opposite. That Amendment, as pointed out by the hon. Member for Spalding, raises two contradictory propositions. In view of the attitude taken by the Government towards the Amendment of the hon. Member and your suggestion, Sir, that we should be allowed to draw up an Amendment to avoid the difficulty, I beg to move, as that cannot be done in a moment, that you now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Walter Foster.)

*MR. RITCHIE: I hope the Committee will not assent to the proposal. We have been engaged now for a very long time in considering the matter, and the proposal of the hon. Gentleman, though apparently complicated, is in reality very simple. What he proposes is that the Urban Sanitary Authorities shall remain as the Bill has placed them; and, so far as the Rural Authorities are concerned, he proposes that when an appeal has been made to the County Council, and they decide that allotments shall be supplied, they shall go to the Vestry Committee appointed by the rural vote; but that the Committee shall have no power whatever of acquiring lands if they have to acquire them compulsorily. If this matter goes to a Division, you will divide on the question whether the County Council shall, by their Committee, acquire the allotments, or whether it shall be referred to the Parish Authority elected in the way the hon. Gentleman proposes, to carry out the behest of the County Council, but with no power of compulsory acquirement. I hope the Committee will now be allowed to come to a decision.

*(6.40.) MR. CHANNING: If I am in order, I would suggest the division of the Amendment, and the question which the right hon. Gentleman wishes to settle could at once be brought before the House. Will the hon. Member for Hornsey accept the following Amendment, to leave out the words after the word "authority" in the fourth line of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, and insert after "authority" the last five lines of his own Amendment, beginning with the words "in a rural district to a Committee," and so on, down to the end of the latter? That would at once raise the question whether the Committee would consent to the creation in a rural sanitary district of a Local Committee for this purpose. It is a perfectly plain issue to put before the House. I do not see why we should delay one moment if the right hon. Gentleman and the Member for Hornsey will consent, and in this case I would suggest to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilkeston to withdraw his Motion. Then I would suggest that the question of the Urban Sanitary Authority could be dealt with in a reasonable form which would command general support.

MR. STEPHENS: I think the suggestion of the hon. Member is a perfectly reasonable one. It is quite obvious that the Urban Authorities stand upon a totally different footing. I beg to withdraw my Amendment.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I beg to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment to Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment,

After the first word "authority," to leave out all the words to the end of the proposed Amendment, in order to add the words "in a rural district to a committee appointed by the inhabitants in vestry of such parish as herein-after provided, and the parish committee, in substitution for the sanitary authority, shall proceed to acquire land in accordance with the principal Act, and otherwise execute that Act in the said district or parish."—(Mr. Channing.)

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

*CAPTAIN VERNEY: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman accepts and adopts my statement that if his Amendment is carried the labourer cannot get his spade into the land until next Michaelmas two years?

*MR. RITCHIE: Certainly not.

MR. HALLEY STEWART: I only wish to state the issue which is before the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman says we are going to divide on the question of whether or not compulsory powers shall be included. I have explained that in voting for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hornsey I am voting against compulsory powers.

*MR. RITCHIE: I was dealing with the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman. Now we are dealing with a different proposition.

Ayes 223; Noes 146.—(Div. List, No. 73.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Debate arising.

It being after 10 minutes to Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
(PLEURO-PNEUMONIA) BILL.—(No. 168.)

Order for Committee read.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: As the measure is one in which hon. Members representing agricultural constituencies take considerable interest, I should be glad if Her Majesty's Government would give the House some assurance that it will be definitely proceeded with on a given day.

DR. TANNER: Last night we understood from the First Lord of the Treasury that this Bill would be taken as the first Order to-day.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No.

DR. TANNER: I must ask the Government to give us some definite assurance which will really conduce to the progress of business.

MR. J. COLLINGS: May I ask the Government, looking at the urgency of the Allotments Bill and the slow progress we are making with it, whether they will continue it on an early day?

Committee deferred till Thursday.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they communicate Copy of Fifth Report, &c., from the Select Committee appointed by their Lordships in the present Session of Parliament on the Sweating System, as desired by this House.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTION.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (ACQUISITION OF LAND).

MR. REID (Dumfries, &c.), rose, pursuant to notice, to move the following Resolution:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, a measure is urgently needed enabling Town Councils and County Councils in England and Scotland to acquire by agreement or compulsorily, on fair terms and by simple and inexpensive machinery, such land within or adjoining their several districts as may in their judgment be needed for the requirements of the inhabitants."

*MR. SPEAKER, interposing, said: I am bound to point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman what I have had an opportunity of pointing out to him in private before, that the Motion which he proposes to introduce anticipates discussion of the subjects dealt with in two measures that are already before the House. I refer to the Bill standing in the name of the hon. Member for the Leith District—Local Authorities (Scotland) Acquisition of Lands—and to another standing in the name of the hon. Member for Forfar—Land Purchase and Division (Scotland). Although I am unwilling to put any impediment in the way of the hon. and learned Gentleman, I do not see how he can make any statement without infringing on the principles contained in those two measures. The allotments question is clearly debarred, and the question of town holdings in Scotland and the acquisition of land by Town Councils and County Councils in Scotland appears to be specially debarred by the two Bills I have referred to. If, however, the hon. and learned Gentleman can discover any means of escaping from the difficulty I shall be very glad.

MR. REID: On the point of order I desire to advert to the terms of my Motion. It is quite true that Bills are being constantly brought forward to confer powers for various purposes on Town Councils and County Councils in Scotland. My proposition is to move a Resolution which should enable them to use their own judgment in regard to the purposes for which they take land; or, in the words of the Motion,

"To acquire by agreement or compulsorily on fair terms and by simple and inexpensive machinery, such land within or adjoining their several districts as may in their judgment be needed for the requirements of the inhabitants."

My proposition is that they should act generally, and in that sense I desire to move the Resolution.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. Gentleman is entirely out of order, according to the decisions laid down by the Chair, in referring by anticipation to matters dealt with in Bills already before the House. This is clearly a case of anticipation. One of the Bills I have mentioned is to enable County Councils in Scotland to acquire building land compulsorily, and the other—the Land Purchase and Division (Scotland) Bill—is for enabling Local Authorities to acquire land compulsorily for any purpose authorised by Act of Parliament, for sites for cottages, for allotments, and so on.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon Tyne): May I ask you, Sir, whether the two Bills you have mentioned do not relate exclusively to Scotland?

*MR. SPEAKER: Yes.

MR. J. MORLEY: Then I presume that if my hon. and learned Friend were to withdraw the words "and Scotland" from his Motion he would be in order.

*MR. SPEAKER: I made that suggestion to the hon. and learned Gentleman; but he, seeing that he represents a Scotch constituency, appeared unwilling to make the alteration. It is a matter for the discretion of the hon. and learned Member. If he is willing to withdraw the words "and Scotland" from his Motion, that appears to me to remove the objection. If those words were omitted, the hon. and learned Gentleman would be in order.

MR. REID: I will move the Resolution with the reference to Scotland omitted, and although I do, no doubt, attach very great importance to everything affecting Scotland, still I do not think that the Resolution will be impaired in its force or value when applied simply to the case of England. It will have the advantage that I shall be enabled to curtail my speech and give English Members more opportunity to present their views to the House. For a considerable period there has been a strong feeling growing that the land system of this country cannot be adequately dealt with on the basis of what I may call old-fashioned reform, which suggests improvements in the registration of titles and the means of transfer of land. The fact that so many Bills have been introduced to enable different localities to acquire land for various purposes is of itself one of the strongest arguments which could be adduced in support of the views I propose to submit to the House. So strong has been the growth of this feeling that there is what some may call a revolutionary feeling existing on the land question in the last few years. In order that there may be no misunderstanding of my position, and in order that my silence may not seem to give encouragement, let me say at once that I have no sympathy whatever with any attempt to take land from anybody who owns it except upon fair and honest terms. In what I have to say in regard to landowners, I wish to speak of the system, not of the men, believing as I do that human nature is very much the same all the world over, and a great many of the critics of the conduct of landlords would themselves follow the same course if they happened to become landlords. In England there is, undoubtedly, a very strong opinion that the ownership of land, uncontrolled by the action of any Local Authority, has been considerably abused, and has led to the depopulation of some parts of the country and to enormous congestion in the population of other parts. It has led to discomforts and injustice which the people are not entitled to be called upon indefinitely to endure. We cannot deny the necessity of putting some pressure upon landlords when we see the approval of the principle in the Allotments Bill of the Government, which I will not, of course, now discuss. I think that hon. Members who have knowledge on this subject will agree that these powers of compulsion cannot stop here. It is needed, for example, for small holdings; but without specifying any particular class of needs, I think I may appeal to hon. Members, do they not know instances of villages stunted in their growth and development, and of inhabitants restricted in occupation and debarred from the enjoyment of a home of their own, by the refusal of the landlord to sell land or to let, except upon impracticable conditions? The leasehold system which obtains so generally throughout England, I think, is now generally admitted to be detrimental to the interests of the population at large. I go further, and condemn the precarious tenure upon which so many persons occupy their houses. How can we hope to see the standard of comfort raised in England; how can we expect to see the people elevated by education and other benign influences, which are not likely to go very far in that direction, unless the people have the comfort of what they may call a home of their own? To very many people this is denied, and though I do not say it is general there are many instances of people being harshly evicted from their homes for very slight reason. I can give as good authority for my statement Mr. Froude, who, in the Nineteenth Century for September, 1880, has the following:—

“Not a mile from the place where I am now writing an estate on the coast of Devonshire came into the hands of an English Duke. There was a primitive village upon it, occupied by sailors, pilots, and fishermen, which is described in Domesday Book, and was inhabited at the Conquest by the actual forefathers of the late tenants whose names may be read there. The houses were out of repair. The Duke's predecessors had laid out nothing upon them for a century and had been contented with exacting the rents. When the present owner entered into possession it was represented to him that if the village was to continue it must be re-built, but that to re-build it would be a needless expense, for the people, living as they did on their wages as fishermen and seamen, would not cultivate his land, and were useless to him. The houses were therefore simply torn down, and nearly half the population were driven out into the world to find new homes.”

I do not believe that such cases often occur on a large scale in England, but there have been many cases where individuals have been driven from their homes. I should like to illustrate what I have to say by some brief reference to Scotch experience. I take the cases in order to show what the power of the landlord may be. The case of the crofters in the Highlands is a conspicuous instance, and not even the annals of Irish landlordism can exceed in horror the devastation of the Highlands some years ago. I hope that some hon. Member opposite will give the House the horrible details of the clearances that were effected in Sutherlandshire, where thousands of people were turned out of their ancestral homes to make way for sheep, and eventually for the land to be turned into deer forests for the amusement of English, Scotch, and American sportsmen.

*MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): How long ago?

MR. REID: These things began 70 years ago, and have been continued until 2,000,000 acres out of the 19,000,000 acres which Scotland contains have been turned into deer forests, with the result that land cannot be obtained for any other purpose. I have mentioned in the House before, how, in some places in that country, the tenants hold under a six months' tenure, and they can only bequeath their property with the consent of the landlord, who frequently disregards their bequests. Ten miles from Dumfries there is land admirably situated on the shores of the Solway for the establishment of a village or small town, and there is a strong desire for this, but not a few will the landlord grant. The town of Kilmarnock had to wait 12 years before the Local Authorities could purchase land for a public park with the sum of £10,000, which had been left them for that purpose. Again, at Greenock I believe the adjoining land belongs practically to one owner, who refuses to sell or let for building, and the borough suffers severely from the artificial price of land, created by the absence of all competition. I will go no further with Scotch illustrations, for I feel it would not be right to do so. London offers the most horrible cases of all, which are the result of overcrowding, giving rise to disease and immorality of the most frightful description. The freeholders, as a rule, exercise no supervision whatever over their property, and, indeed, are powerless to do so in consequence of the length of the leases they have granted. The result of this system has been shown by the evidence taken by the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Poor to be appalling. Hundreds of thousands of people are paying enormous rents for abominable accommodation. I may be allowed to quote a few words from the Report of the Commission in reference to London. On page 14 the Commissioners say—

"Among adults, too, overcrowding causes a vast amount of suffering which could be calculated by no bills of mortality, however accurate. Even statistics of actual disease consequent on overcrowding would not convey the whole truth as to the loss of health caused by it to the labouring classes. Some years ago the Board of Health instituted inquiries in the low neighbourhoods to see what was the amount of labour lost in the year not by illness, but by sheer exhaustion and inability to do work. It was found that upon the lowest average every workman or workwoman lost about 20 days in the year from simple exhaustion, and the wages thus lost would go towards paying an increased rent for a better house. There can be little doubt but that the same thing is going on now, perhaps even to a greater extent. . . . Nothing stronger could be said in describing the effect of overcrowding than that it is even more destructive to general health than conducive to the spread of epidemic and contagious diseases. Unquestionably, a large amount of the infection which ravages certain of the great cities is due to the close packing of the population. Typhus is particularly a disease which is associated with overcrowding, and when once an epidemic has broken out, its spread in overcrowded districts is almost inevitable. In Liverpool nearly one-fifth of the squalid houses, where the poor live in the closest quarters, are reported as always infected: that is to say, the seat of infectious disease. It is not surprising to learn that among the fever dens of that city overcrowding is growing less, owing to the fall of the population which mortality produces."

The reason is to be found a few pages further on, where the Commissioners say—

"Turning to the unquestioned causes which produce overcrowding and the generally lamentable condition of the homes of the labouring classes, the first which demands attention is the poverty of the inhabitants of the poorest quarters, or, in other words, the relation borne by the wages they receive to the rents they have to pay."

Charity and private enterprise are wholly unable to deal with matters of this gravity. Only on the lines of this Resolution and by a Government Bill can we grapple with the state of things existing now in London. I do not think it would be wise on my part to multiply instances, nor have I quoted these for the purpose of holding landlords up to odium, but to show how inadequate is our present system to deal with evils of this nature. Last year the President of the Local Government Board, in replying to me, said we might safely rely on the interests of the landlords themselves; but it is precisely the self-interest of landlords that has given rise to such evils as make a Resolution of this character necessary—selfish interests and competitive rents. Nor can a local Act of Parliament effectually deal with the subject. To obtain an Act of Parliament is a costly proceeding. The smaller towns in England cannot afford the large expense of obtaining a local Act or even a Provisional Order, to enable them to put an end to these great and growing evils. The costs of the litigation which follows the obtaining of a Provisional Order are most excessive and in many cases absolutely unnecessary, and with those costs the community are almost invariably saddled. After a Provisional Order is obtained it is necessary to have litigation for the purpose of ascertaining the true value of the land; and, as litigation on that subject is now conducted, no one who has any experience will dispute that the costs are frightful, most excessive, and absolutely unnecessary in many ways. Not only must there be a large array of so-called scientific witnesses for the purpose of proving the value, but every separate interest in any part of the land may be valued separately, and the community is saddled with the cost. No matter how unreasonable the owner of the land has been in refusing accommodation or in refusing a fair price, he never can be made liable for one shilling of the costs. He may have to pay his own costs in some extreme cases, but the Local Authority taking the land always has to pay its own. Besides, Provisional Orders can only be given for certain prescribed purposes. Suppose that the Burgh of Thornhill was desirous of buying out its landlords and of placing all the persons in the ambit of the town in an independent position, they could not do it by a Provisional Order, and it would be hopeless to try and do it by Act of Parliament, because this House has now about 20 times too much to do. Under these circumstances it is that I propose to confer on the Town Councils and County Councils the power to take land.

Of course, the land should be taken on fair terms—I mean at an honest price. I also think that some check should be placed upon the action of the Local Authorities. I should say that the President of the Local Government Board ought to have power to prevent any unfair use of their power by a Local Authority. Suppose, for example, the Local Authority wanted to take a private park, or a garden, or anything of the kind, it is quite right there should be some power to check them. Then, I think land should be taken by means of simple and inexpensive machinery. I should prefer that it should be done below a certain amount by the County Court Judge, with an assessor; or, in the case of large sums, by a Judge of the Supreme Court, also with an assessor, and I think that power ought to be given to deal with the costs of any inquiry in such a manner as to prevent those who had to part with the land being stimulated to ask and require unfair terms. If, in the opinion of the tribunal, such people acted unreasonably, the tribunal might be able to order them to pay the costs. Subject to these conditions, I would leave to the County Councils ample and complete discretion. The needs in the different parts of the country are very different, and the Local Authorities alone know what the requirements of their localities are. We have no time to ascertain the needs of localities, and if these things are to be done at all they must be done by the Local Authorities. It may be asked from what source the money is to come. I might with great ease point out that if the Government are prepared to give £33,000,000 to Ireland, which the Irish have never asked for and do not want, they might be prepared to give a little assistance for purposes I have spoken of. But I do not think it is at all necessary to make use of Imperial credit or funds in this case. Public works in Municipalities or counties will in the future, as now, be paid for out of local funds; but in cases where there are such requirements as I have been adverting to, as, for example, where a town requires an extension, and it is necessary to take land for the purpose, I believe that through the agency of Building Societies or Benefit Societies, which might combine for the purpose, it would be perfectly possible, and in many cases would happen, that the Town Council or County Council would exercise the power, and that the whole of the money would be found by those who would reap the advantage in common with the rest of the town. I believe if such powers as I propose were conferred, they would do a great deal of good, especially in villages, for example, which are oppressed by the leasehold system of tenure, and there are not a few in the South-West of England. The leasehold system would be put an end to at once if the County Council or the Town Council thought proper to interfere. Towns will be able to expand, and to do so at no unreasonable cost. I do not say that these would be powers sufficient to settle or dispose of these difficulties, nor do I suppose that I have been able to put an adequate number of illustrations before the House in the short time at my disposal. But I appeal to the private experience of individual Members, and I submit that land reform must take the direction of increasing the powers of Municipal Authorities. If those powers are increased great advantage will, I submit, ensue. I desire to see these reforms in order that, by means of prompt and kindly concessions, we may be able to avert the danger of the spread of discontent, which I regret as much as any man in this House, and which could never be harboured by people in this country unless it is founded on a refusal to remove a real grievance.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(9.46.) MR. A. H. D. ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): My hon. Friend, in the interesting speech which he has delivered, stated that he had asked me to say a few words on the question so far as it refers to English villages, and to that point I will, therefore, restrict my observations. But I wish, first, to make three preliminary remarks. The first has reference to the question of compulsion. I suppose we may admit, now that the Government have got an Allotments Act, that the question of compulsion is not worth discussing as a matter of principle, for it has already been conceded by the Government. When I first entered the House the acceptance of the principle seemed to be very far off indeed. I remember how the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division, who then represented Ipswich, was attacked by the present Minister of Agriculture for advocating this principle. The right hon. Gentleman talked about the "predatory instincts of a class whose Socialistic schemes were so admirably represented by the hon. Member." I suppose that it is we who have predatory instincts and Socialistic schemes at the present moment; but it seems to me that the matters for which we plead are quite as important, and not in any way more dangerous, than the principle of compulsion which the Government have already conceded. I agree with my hon. Friend that we might trust Local Bodies, if the application of compulsion is extended, not to infringe upon the amenities which may justly be claimed by landowners or others. For the purposes for which land is wanted in English villages, security of tenure is even more important than that the freehold of the land should be acquired. I quite agree that the Local Authority should retain some power over the land which it purchases, in the same way as Building Societies do, and that they should secure the annual increment by valuation from time to time. In the next place, I hold that there should be a common management of the buildings erected upon the land by the people for the people. I hold that it is most desirable to develop some kind of public opinion in the villages, because in too many at the present time there is hardly any public opinion. I believe that many landlords are now beginning to see clearly that this question of country life is not a mere question of how many pounds of beef or how many bushels of corn can be produced per acre; there is a question of human life. It is no answer to say that in some villages the state of things is everything that can be desired, because we know perfectly well that other villages are sadly neglected; while even in some, which are under a kind of benevolent management, there is no real freedom. The history of land shows that the tendency has been to put all the power in the hands of one man, and Mr. George Brodrick in his book says—

“All these changes have by no means weakened the power of the squire, who, on the contrary, is a greater man than ever relatively to the other classes in the village community, since he is no longer jostled by independent yeomen, but surrounded by obsequious tenants and labourers. This potentate concentrates in himself a variety of rights and prerogatives which in the aggregate amount to little short of patriarchal sovereignty.”

It is true that in many villages there is something of this patriarchal sovereignty. For certain purposes the inhabitants of villages have a fair claim to the use of pieces of land. There is the case of village halls, which are wanted for entertainments, for labourers' meetings, for the meetings of Friendly Societies, and for the formation of libraries. Only a few days ago I heard of an excellent village hall which was largely used by Churchmen; but when Dissenters asked to be allowed to give an entertainment in it, the vicar and the squire said “No.” A Dissenter in the village thereupon went to the vicar and said, “It is very hard, sir, to be a Nonconformist in this village.” If that is not boycotting it is something very like it. Possibly the hall was built mainly with the money of Churchmen, and if they chose they could, of course, keep the Dissenters out of it. The next purpose for which land is wanted is for use as recreation ground. In many villages there was no recreation ground for the people. Mr. Jessopp, a well-known writer, speaking of the East of England, says—

“The plain, ugly fact is patent to all who do not resolutely keep their eyes shut, that the agricultural labourers life has had all the joy taken out of it, and has become as dull and sodden a life as a man's can well be made. There are scores, perhaps hundreds, of villages where the inhabitants have absolutely no amusement of any kind outside the public house, where cricket or bowls or even skittles are as unknown as bear baiting, where the children play at marbles in the gutter in bodily fear that the road surveyor should come down upon them.”

A clergyman told me recently that in his parish it was utterly impossible, without an expenditure of money he could not afford, to get a field for his lads to play cricket in, the only place where they could play being the bottom of a dried-up pond. Then, again, there is the case of Working Men's Co-operative Societies, which ought to have a fair opportunity of securing a footing in every part of the country. Every North Countryman knows the splendid work which these societies have done; and I, therefore, advocate this, whatever hon. Members may think on the vexed question of the relationship of these societies to individual shopkeepers. Mr. Albert Pell, a late Member of this House, said, in his evidence before the Small Holdings Committee—

“If there was legislation for the compulsory taking of land in parishes or villages I should like to see legislation enabling Industrial Societies to get hold of freeholds for Co-operative Stores. My experience with regard to those societies is that they are at an enormous disadvantage in England from the inability to get into a village. People are always saying, ‘Oh, you will disturb some old woman,’ or ‘You will give offence to somebody.’ My own experience has taught me it is very difficult for the co-operative movement to get on from the difficulty which exists, especially in smaller villages, to get a place where they can securely carry on their business.”

I know of some villages where the societies cannot possibly obtain a footing except by the exercise of compulsory powers. The societies occupying premises on a tenure terminable at six months' notice cannot possibly be expected to develop. They may be excellently supported by the squire or the vicar, but the squire may die, and then what may happen? Somebody may succeed him who does not care for Co-operative Societies, and I submit that the only way in which they can develop would be by investing their savings in the form of new buildings, and they cannot be expected to do that until they are assured of security of tenure. I should like to give an instance of the control of our village schools in its direct bearing on those Co-operative Societies, which, I know, have the sympathy of many Gentlemen opposite. One of my Co-operative friends wrote to me the other day stating that he had been trying to establish branches of the Co-operative Stores in small villages, and, with that object, had endeavoured to get up entertainments for raising funds. In the first instance, a clergyman, as manager of a school, refused an application for the use of a school room for an entertainment; and, in another instance, a School Board made a promise to grant a school room on an undertaking that votes would be given for members who pledged themselves to grant such facilities. As my friend remarks, a refractory Elective Board can be dealt with successfully, but a refractory clergyman cannot. The short tenure of many Non-conformist Chapels, especially in Wales, and the fact that it is frequently uncertain how far any chapel can get a really good site in any village, must make us all feel that Religious Bodies ought to be treated on equal terms, and that any Religious Body who bonâ fide desires a site ought to be able to get it. I turn now to the case of village societies. Mr. Albert Pell says that he does not think there is a great desire to obtain land with a view to cultivation, but that there is a desire to obtain a bit of land to build a house on, with a garden adjoining. We all know the ordinary agricultural labourer cannot buy his house, but there are scattered about in many of our villages artisans, wheelwrights, blacksmiths, carpenters, shopkeepers, and others, who, if they were living in towns would take advantage of Building Societies to become owners of their own houses. I see no reason whatever why a genuine Building Society should not be allowed to provide for the wants of men of this sort in country districts. I think, also, there ought to be power to obtain land compulsorily, if necessary, on which to build intermediate schools in the best positions in towns and villages. Of course, none of these suggestions can be completely carried out until we get District Councils; but some step, at all events, can be taken in the direction we advocate. My hon. and learned Friend has alluded to the leasehold question. A good many landlords are saying, "If you propose leasehold enfranchisement we will grant no leases at all." The effect of adopting a policy of this kind will be that poor people will have no tenure whatever except from month to month. All I can say is, if landlords take this unreasonable line they must not be surprised at the extreme views some men adopt, especially in the towns. It is because I think we may find some intermediate method between boycotting on the one hand and violent measures on the other that I support this Motion. The son of a very liberal landlord said to me the other day, "If you were to give these powers to Building Societies you might find two or three cottages going into the hands of poachers." Another argument used against us is that unsanitary dwellings would spring up. What are our Sanitary Authorities for if they cannot keep our villages in a proper condition? Such arguments as these are thoroughly bad. There are two sides of village life, and one of them is usually concealed in the minds of the people themselves. I personally came across this case the other day. A carpenter, who devoted himself to social work, and the work of education among his fellows, happened to fall out of work, and accepted a situation as estate carpenter on a large estate in the South of England. After a year or two he went back to his native place and detailed his experience. He began first of all, he said, trying to get up concerts in the village in which he lived, but this was soon put a stop to. He said no effort whatever was encouraged among the people themselves unless it was brought to them from above, and he stated that the life was almost intolerable, because, as he said in his homely way, "It knocks all the manliness out of a man." I do not directly blame the agent, or the landlord, or the clergyman of this village, because I do not suppose they were conscious of the effect of the policy they adopted. I should, however, be inclined to say to any independent-minded man of fair education, who was wavering as to whether he should remain in or leave the village in which he lived: "If everything is done for you from above go to a place where you will find a more independent atmosphere in which to live." This is not a question to be settled by charity or money. I remember the Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking on the Irish Question in 1885, remarking that people who had become extremely rich thought that their cheque-book could solve all questions, and his observation might well be applied to the state of things in our villages. It is not by making model villages, model reading-rooms, and all the rest of it, that you are going to develop an independent spirit among working people. Give them something to manage for themselves; let them have halls of their own, libraries of their own, opportunities for acquiring bits of freehold land in good positions for Co-operative Societies, chapels, an dozen houses of their own, and then you will bring out the best of them, and they will be happier and pleasanter people to live among than they are at present. I think, on the one hand, there are many who imagine they are going to do the people good by Primrose League festivities; whilst, on the other hand, there are people who think they are going to settle all the questions that concern the land by wild and revolutionary schemes. Is there, I would ask, no intermediate course? I think there is. Though our proposals may seem small, I think that, if properly worked out, they will lead to more community of feeling among the poor, and to a greater sense of responsibility for their own affairs, such as will make a man a man. These things may work slowly, and will work slowly, but they will, I believe, give independence to many who now are not in the best sense of the word independent, and will lead to greater happiness by the road of wider and fuller opportunities.

(10.18.) MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): I think the House has some ground for feeling disappointed with the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid)—I do not mean because he has not been allowed to go much into the question, but because I think the Resolution he proposes is a totally different thing from that which he has attempted to advocate in his speech. The Motion declares that a measure is urgently needed for enabling Town Councils and County Councils in England to acquire land compulsorily for the benefit of the inhabitants. Now, a Town Council is a body created by statute for particular purposes of Local Government, and County Councils have been created in like manner for the purposes of County Government. My hon. and learned Friend wishes to show that these bodies have not the requisite powers in regard to the acquisition of land to enable them to fulfil the purposes of their existence. But he has not attempted to prove that these bodies have no powers. There are many duties cast on Town Councils, such as the duty of providing for drainage, providing recreation grounds, libraries, water supply, and artisans' dwellings, which necessitate the acquisition of land. Wherever it has been found necessary for Town Councils or Rural Boards to have power for acquiring land compulsorily, Parliament has conferred that power on them. As it has not been shown by either the Mover or the Seconder of the Motion that these bodies have not the requisite power for the purpose for which they have been called into existence, I suppose they are contented with the powers which exist in that respect. Then what is the proposition? The hon. and learned Gentleman began by dwelling on cases of hardship in regard to individuals, and insisted on the necessity for giving powers to Local Authorities for the acquisition of freehold property. Well, I know that it is desirable in some cases that powers for the acquisition of freehold should be given. The hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned a case in Devonshire, not within his own knowledge at all, but based on a statement by Mr. Froude, the historian—and here I may say that, though one is always happy to take Mr. Froude's opinion on a matter of history, it does not follow that his opinion is worth more than any one else's on the every day transactions of life. Then, having dealt with the case of alleged hardship in Devonshire—only one solitary case—the hon. and learned Gentleman flew off to Scotland. I will not go at length into the Scotch question, but I must say I have a lively recollection of what took place in the House in 1886. The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the crofters, but he entirely ignored the enormous rights and powers which, in 1886, were conferred upon the crofters where their holdings were too small. The hon. and learned Member challenged me to say in what cases I would give the powers he advocates. Well, I will tell him. Let him give me an instance in Devonshire, or anywhere else, where there are landlords so cruel and senseless as to refuse to let land which is needed for the interests of the inhabitants, and I shall be quite prepared to give power by Provisional Orders to enable a municipal Corporation or County Council, or some body responsible to this House, under proper check, to acquire land for the purpose of the people. That is where I would meet my hon. and learned Friend. Let him show me a case where he could prove the Preamble of a Bill or a Provisional Order for affording the relief he speaks of, and I will meet him. He has not, however, produced a shadow of a case. Having started in Devonshire and wandered off into Scotland—ignoring the liberal provision made in that country for the crofters—my hon. and learned Friend came back to London and declared that the case of the Metropolis is the most horrible of all. Well, what is the result of his statement? Why, that in London rents are absolutely competitive. I would ask why rents should not be absolutely competitive? Is there any part of the United Kingdom, or of the world, where rents are not competitive or in which anything else that is to be sold or hired is not governed by the laws of demand and supply? Hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to lose their heads over this question; they seem to think that different principles are to be applied to land as compared with any other property. That might be a good cry if we were dealing with the origin of society, and starting the question of a new State where a large number of people are suddenly thrown upon a tract of land which is only capable of accommodating a certain number, but here we have to deal with a country where the land has for centuries been in the occupation of somebody, and that somebody has been recognised by the State and by society as the owner of the land, who can give up the land in consideration of money paid for it. Land and money are convertible terms, and men who have made money should be encouraged to invest it in land. I am at a loss to see why a man who invests his money in land should be condemned when he looks for a fair interest upon it. My hon. and learned Friend, by way of illustrating further the horrible character of London, said that many people, hundreds of people, there are paying rents they could not afford. I am afraid that has been my own case through the whole course of my life; I really do not know anybody who does not think he is paying too much when he is asked to pay his rent. But what about the thousands and tens of thousands of people in London who are paying more than they can afford for food and other necessities of life? And this argument applies not only to London but to every part of the world. It is idle to make a complaint of that kind. My hon. and learned Friend says that we have in London fever dens. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman ignore the fact that here come in the powers of Municipal Bodies? Does he ignore the fact that the Municipal Bodies, when they find these fever dens, have power to destroy them, to proscribe whole areas, and to provide for the erection of new buildings? My hon. and learned Friend contended that something must be done, either on the lines of the Resolution or by confiscation. I thought from the first that my hon. and learned Friend meant confiscation. I agree with him that it does mean something on the lines of this Resolution, or by confiscation. My hon. Friend spoke of fair terms and simple machinery. What is meant by fair terms? I cannot but think that in the use of those words my hon. and learned Friend meant something in the nature of the so-called fair rent in Ireland to which the competitive value of the land has been reduced. Fair terms in the sense of the Resolution mean favourable terms for the tenant, but utterly unfair and harsh and wicked terms as against the owner of the property. It is a singular fact that the only instance in which my hon. Friend descended to particulars dealt with matters which Municipal and County Councils already have power to deal with. He quoted the demand for village halls. Well, town halls are now erected by Councils in nearly all boroughs, and vestry halls in nearly all Local Board districts; while the same authorities also have power to provide recreation grounds. School Boards, too, have compulsory powers for the purchase of land. But suppose the Municipal Authorities do get these powers, and do acquire land, they must charge a rent for it, and that rent will have to be fixed either by some rule of their own or on the competitive rule. It must come to exactly the same thing. I object to any increased powers being given, as proposed by the Resolution, until it has been pointed out specifically what those powers are to be.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "This House, while ready to consider definite proposals for conferring on county councils and town councils such further powers as may be shown to be needed for the requirements of the inhabitants within their jurisdiction, declines to assent to a general proposition which neither defines the nature of the requirements nor the mode in which they are to be met."—(Mr. Ambrose.)

—instead thereof.

(10.40.) COLONEL KENYON-SLA-NEY (Shropshire, Newport): I think I ought almost to apologise to the House for venturing to rise to second the Amendment, and my only excuse for doing so is to point out that rural districts are equally with urban interested in this question. It seems to me that the scope of the discussion has separated itself under two somewhat different heads, and I think the House will see in the speech of the Seconder of the Resolution that very different matters were alluded to to those which were touched upon by the Mover of it. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman who seconded the Resolution that in all he has said as to village life, and in all his aspirations for the development of manliness among the rural population, he has many a warm sympathiser on this side of the House, and he has no more hearty and sympathetic partisan than I profess myself to be. The only point is that we differ somewhat as to the means to be adopted in order to attain the end the hon Gentleman has in view. We think that end is not to be secured by perpetually calling in question the good motives and operations of the landlords, but that it is more likely to be promoted by freely acknowledging that they are doing a great deal to forward his object. So far as the operations of the landlords are concerned, I think that, although the hon. Gentleman has made out a good case for increased interest and philanthropic exertion, he has hardly brought forward any practical argument that would justify the House in supporting the Resolution that he has moved. But beyond that part of the question which refers to rural life, I notice that the Mover of the Resolution dealt more especially with the powers which it is proposed to give to Town Councils; and on that subject I think it would, perhaps, not be out of place to consider what use has been made by Town Councils of the powers which they already possess, and how far those powers have been used discreetly and moderately, and without inflicting injustice upon other interests with which they come in contact. I think the hon. Gentleman has been somewhat unlucky in the day on which he has chosen to move this Resolution; for, with his interest in legal matters, he will probably have noticed a case in which judgment was yesterday delivered by Lord Justice Fry. It was a case which bears directly upon the behaviour of Corporations towards rural localities with which they are brought into contact. The Corporation referred to in this case was that of Wolverhampton, and the allegation brought against it was that it had acquired certain land for uses which are intended to be amplified by the present Resolution. The allegation was that the Corporation had, by their action, changed a pure brook stream into a filthy and offensive stream; that they changed water formerly fit for cattle and domestic purposes into water unfit for such use; that they rendered the land where the water flowed unfit for the purpose of agriculture; and that they turned a pleasant trout stream into a filthy ditch. Now, this is a case in which a Town Council had exercised powers which it already possessed to acquire land for the purpose mentioned in this Resolution. They had acquired land, and they had used it in such a manner as to produce the results mentioned in the allegation; and in the end an injunction was granted restraining the Corporation from further polluting the brook. That injunction was granted in August, 1886, and yesterday Lord Justice Fry, in delivering judgment, found the Corporation guilty not only of disobeying the injunction, but of having wilfully disobeyed it; and in the end he granted what, in legal phrase, is termed a sequestration of the property of the Corporation. That surely is a strong case, and shows that there is, at all events, a reason for hesitation before the House grant increased powers to the Councils. The case of the supporters of the Resolution would be strengthened if they could show that the powers already possessed by Councils have been always exercised for the benefit and not to the injury of the community at large. Another fact within my personal knowledge has a direct bearing on this question. The Corporation of Wolverhampton have also acquired land, on which they have erected machinery for pumping water for the use of the town. In this particular case the Corporation have entirely deprived a considerable district around them of a large water supply, by the process of boring deep wells. There are, at this moment, several farm-houses and cottages in which not one drop of drinking water can be obtained, through the action of the Corporation. I personally waited on that body, and, while they admitted that this denudation of water was the direct result of their action, they told me that if there were more water they would take that as well. I adduce this case as another instance where the powers now sought to be amplified extend to a degree which enables a direct injustice to be inflicted on a rural district without any chance of redress. I repeat that the House should hesitate before it accepts a Resolution, the object of which is vaguely to increase and enlarge the powers which, it can be shown have, in the past, been used mischievously and unfairly. I think that the Amendment, which goes in the direction of limiting the vague and visionary language of the Resolution, would, if adopted, save the country from what might easily become a danger to the cause of justice and fair play.

*(10.56.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I think that hon. Members on this side of the House may congratulate themselves on the extreme candour of the arguments brought forward by the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment. The last speaker argued not only that the powers now possessed by Town Councils ought not to be extended, but that they have been abused, and ought, therefore, to be curtailed.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY: I never hinted that the powers should be curtailed, though I urged that the House ought to hesitate before it further amplified them.

*MR. D. CRAWFORD: I am in the judgment of the House whether, if the hon. Member's statement is correct, it is not a legitimate inference that the powers ought to be curtailed. Members on this side of the House, however, are of opinion that the powers at present possessed by Municipal Councils have been exercised with the utmost advantage to the country, and they are in sympathy with the argument of the hon. Member for Rotherham, when he said that, with the view of stimulating the manliness and independence of village communities, he was prepared to take the very distinct step in advance proposed in the Resolution. The Mover of the Amendment contended that this is, and ought to be, a pure question of supply and demand. There, I think, we approach the kernel of the question. I do not think that any Member of this House can complain of the moderation with which the hon. Members for Dumfries and Rotherham presented their views, nor can it be said that there was anything revolutionary in their proposals. By this Motion we aim at two things. We aim at obtaining a much-needed practical reform which we desire to get for purposes of an urgent character. But we also hope that the House will accede to the Motion as indicative of a certain stage in the advance of public opinion, and as a means of registering its view, that the use of land is not merely a question of supply and demand but is one in which the public and Parliament have a legitimate concern. We all know that it has been too much the custom to apply the phrase "A man may do what he likes with his own" to the possession of land. Hon. Members on this side of the House consider that opinion to be not only an erroneous one, but very far indeed from being a Conservative opinion. We consider it to be an opinion which is dangerous to the security of property; and it is, to a large extent, in a Conservative interest that we advocate this Motion. The arguments which have been urged by the Mover and the Seconder of the Amendment would lead to this result—that supposing a man by his title deeds possessed a whole county in England, he might clear it of population and make it a desert, and no one in this House would have a right to challenge the owner. We demur to and dispute this proposition. We are not advocates of any revolutionary disturbance of land tenure as at present in force. Indeed, I consider the systems of land nationalisation which are advocated as unsuitable if not fundamentally impossible; but if anything would bring into prominence those violent and revolutionary views it would be such arguments as were used by the Mover and the Seconder of the Amendment, to the effect that a man may do what he likes with his own and sweep off the face of his estate cottagers and everybody else and if it suits him to do so.

MR. AMBROSE: I never said anything of the kind, and it will be in the recollection of the House that I distinctly asserted that if any such case could be made out it would form a ground for the intervention of this House.

*MR. D. CRAWFORD: I am not surprised that the hon. Member has made that remonstrance. I am aware that he does not desire his arguments should be too stringently construed, but I would remind him that, when he was ridiculing the arguments of my hon. Friend in allusion to competitive rents, the hon. Gentleman said—"Why not have competitive rents in land? What is the difference between land and any other commodity? It is a pure question of supply and demand." Therefore, I say, I was only drawing a fair inference in stating that the hon. Member would deem any landowner justified in sweeping off every cottager from his estate. We all know how largely that sentiment prevails in the country. I have known, within my own experience, landlords, good and benevolent men, who had avowed that because they were not pleased in a case where there was a tendency in a village to extend in the direction of their houses, they would not allow cottages to be built in the direction of their estates. [Cries of "Name."] I know a case of hardship in this connection in Scotland. There is a very important and growing town in my own constituency which is rapidly increasing. There are mineral fields in the district, and the only terms upon which the landlord will permit houses to be built are, first, he exacts that a good and substantial house, sufficient to be a security for the ground rent, should be built, and that if the coal is taken out from below the house, and the house should tumble about this man's ears, the occupier is to have no claim for compensation. That, I say, is a tyrannical and dangerous use of property, which forces on the minds of the people of that county the fact that, though born there, they really have no place to live in. And things are getting worse in Scotland as well as in England. So far as our studies and knowledge carry us, I agree with the quotations from Mr. Brodrick's book which have been read, to the effect that the squire in England is now a more powerful man and the cottager possesses fewer rights than in former times. In several parts of the county that I represent it used to be the custom for the miners to save money and buy a house and plot of land of their own, and under that system a peculiarly fine type of men was cultivated. Under the present system, where, as a rule, miners' cottages belong to the landowner and where the tenant is not secure, the condition of the workmen, neither morally nor physically, can be compared to that of the older race of men who acquired an interest in their houses. We are aware that this Motion, in its operative part, must, under the Rules of the House, be restricted to England, but the question is one which interests my constituents most deeply, and that is my apology for intervening in this Debate. It is a question which touches their imagination more, perhaps, than any political question of the day. I feel assured that there is nothing in the Resolution which need prevent hon. Members opposite from voting for it. Many of those hon. Gentlemen profess their sympathy with the working man, and their desire to aid him in obtaining a more independent position.

Why, then, should they not assist in conferring on Municipal Bodies the right of acquiring land for the benefit of the working class? There is, at any rate, no argument in favour of the Motion which presses more upon my mind than that it is, in the best sense of the word, a Conservative Motion, and that, if hon. Members opposite will vote for it, they will do much to promote that security of tenure in regard to land in this country which they so much desire to ensure.

* (11.15.) COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): I desire to state, in addressing the House on this question, that I am not in favour of any doctrine of confiscation of landlords' property, and that on this side of the House, at any rate, contracts are held sacred, except where the interests of the community require any alteration. I desire to say a few words in reference to the acquisition of freehold for public buildings. In my own district, when a vestry hall was required, it had to be erected on a leasehold tenure, because it was not possible to buy the freehold. We are now looking for a central site for our baths and washhouses, and are unable to get anything but leasehold land. In the same way our free library could not be placed in the middle of our population on a freehold site. I can imagine no reason why Local Authorities should not have power to acquire land by compulsory purchase, for the purpose of erecting baths, washhouses, libraries, town halls, and other public buildings. The sooner some legislation is passed to carry into effect the recommendations of the Town Holdings Committee, even to a limited degree, the better it will be for our great populations. With regard to houses, there is, no doubt, considerable difficulty in allowing one man to purchase his freehold while another may not choose to exercise that power. I recognise the extreme difficulty of putting compulsory powers in the hands of individuals. But that difficulty would not occur where Local Authorities purchased, not one or two houses, but whole estates for the benefit of the community. In the parish of Plumstead, where I live, I recollect the land being let for agricultural purposes at £3 per acre in 1845. The income of an estate of 250 acres in Plumstead in 1845 was, therefore, £750 per annum, and the capital value of the estate at 20 years' purchase was £15,000. In consequence of the increase of the Government work at Woolwich, immediately after 1845 and after the Crimean War, it was necessary that additional houses should be erected for the accommodation of the workmen employed in the Government Establishment. If an Act such as that now asked for had been in operation, this 250 acres could have been acquired and about 5,000 houses built. But as the freehold could not be bought the houses had to be built on leasehold tenure. After making roads about 20 houses per acre were built on the leasehold tenure, for which £3 per annum ground rent per house was paid. The result is that an estate which was bringing in £750 per annum, and the capital value of which was £15,000, now brings in an income of £15,000, or its original capital value, every year, in consequence of the lucky circumstance of houses being required for workmen who are obliged to live near their work. The houses were built on leases for 70 years, which have now about 25 years to run. The landlord will have received about £1,000,000 in extra rent, without reckoning interest thereon, and in 25 years the houses, which cost £200 each to erect, will revert to him, and he will get another million of money. These 5,000 men who built these houses, chiefly with the aid of Building Societies, or paid heavy rents for these houses, will not have a relic left of that which they put on the ground; some people will have become millionaires, and others will have reverted to their original condition. In fairness, I ought to admit that those who have the leasehold houses, and let them, do not make a loss, because the rents charged enable them to recoup themselves for the money laid out and the interest upon it. This loss really falls on the workpeople in excessive rents. Now, if the community had stepped in, in the first instance, either the enormous profit I have mentioned would have belonged to the Municipality, or the rents would have been less during the whole of the time. It may be said that all that is past and gone, and nobody wishes to take the landlord's property away. But what is to be done now? It would be a very good thing, in my opinion, even now, if the municipality were to step in and make an arrangement by which the £3 a year ground-rent should be increased to £6 and give a perpetual lease. The result would be that those houses would not be forfeited, the 5,000 leaseholders would still retain their property, subject to a £6 ground-rent, and that ground-rent would at once double the freeholder's income, or could be sold for £150, and it was better to have £150 in cash 25 years before the lease expires than a house worth £200 25 years hence. There would be no loss in an arrangement of that kind; the landlord would be benefited, and the workmen would remain in permanent tenure of their houses. It only wants business men to consult together in order to effect some arrangement by which the thrift of the working classes can be permanent instead of evanescent. I give this practical example in answer to my hon. Friend who wished for practical instances. I leave the House to deal with a matter which affects the well being of the country. Working men are fully alive to the importance of having permanent homes—they value them very much, especially those who desire to live in the same locality. Certainly it is a desire which ought to be encouraged, I hope, by the whole of us. Permanent thrift will make the lives of the working people and their children happier than they have been in the past.

*(11.23.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Mr. Speaker, if the result of this Debate had only been to have caused the hon. Member to deliver the speech to which the House has just listened with a good deal of interest, it could not be described as otherwise than profitable; and entitle the Mover of the Resolution to our thanks. The speech with which the hon. Member who moved the Amendment favoured the House appeared to me to be one that might have been made 100 years ago, when it would have been in keeping with the then existing order of things. The hon. Member has apparently come into the world too late. It is a pity, because he might have been able to influence past generations, but we have outgrown the fossilised views he expressed in regard to the rights of property. There was a marked difference between the speeches of the Movers of the Motion and Amendment. The one pleaded for humanity, the other, from first to last, almost exclusively for property. The hon. Member does not seem to have any sympathy with anybody or anything in the world except the holders of property. The hon. Member for Harrow asked the Mover of the Resolution to produce an instance of hardship, and then he would consent to some power being vested in the Local Government Board. But what the Mover and Seconder of the Resolution pleaded for was that the people should have the opportunity of accomplishing their objects themselves. With that suspicion, which is still entertained of the working classes, the hon. Member said, "Prove to us that you suffer hardships and we will do something for you." But the people have outgrown those ideas. They are anxious to redress their wrongs in their own way. And I am satisfied that the people themselves are better acquainted with their own wants and aspirations than ever the hon. Member for Harrow can possibly be; and that they are better qualified to redress them than even he is. The speeches of the Mover and Seconder of the Resolution, I thought, bristled with instances of hardship, and the House has just heard another very remarkable case from the hon. Member for Woolwich. I can quite understand the hon. Member for Harrow saying to himself, during the delivery of the speech of the hon. Member for Woolwich, "Save me from my friends," because the speech of the hon. Member for Woolwich supplies him with one of the most remarkable instances ever, I think, afforded to this House, of the hardship, cruel wrong, and suffering inflicted upon the industrial classes. I hope after this the hon. Member for the Harrow Division will never again use the term "confiscation," or try to frighten the country out of its propriety, by talking of the danger there would be in giving Local Authorities the power of confiscating the property of the landlords. What have they been doing at Plumstead but confiscate?—["Oh!"]—I use the term advisedly—not land, but bricks and mortar, the dwellings which these men have raised by their money and skill. I am simply voicing the opinions entertained by the people with regard to this iniquitous system. The talk of confiscation comes from the hon. Member for Harrow with a very bad grace. The Seconder of the Motion treated the House to two remarkable illustrations of the danger of conferring on Local Authorities the power of doing that which we are asked, by the Resolution, to enable them to do. He told us that the Town Council of Wolverhampton had deprived certain cottagers and dwellers in farm-houses of a proper supply of water. Well, it has fallen to my lot to travel through many of the villages of the United Kingdom, and I have seen many instances of hardship in the matter of water supply inflicted on the villagers, not by Town Councils or Local Authorities, but by landlords. There are hundreds of villages throughout the country in which, owing to the action of the landlords, the people have no water supply other than that of the village pond, which contains water full of animalculæ, not fit even for animals to drink. If this Resolution is carried into effect it will, as one of its results, enable the people to remedy this state of things. A great deal of socialistic agitation now prevails, led by men nearly all of whom are terribly in earnest, and it is the experience which these men and their followers have obtained of rural life and of the sufferings to which the agricultural labourers have had to submit that has embittered their feelings. The ranks of Socialism in London and our large towns are becoming a dangerous force in the country—and I use the term “dangerous” advisedly—to the supporters of the existing state of things; they have been swollen by the influx of men from our villages who, in their country life, have suffered grievous wrongs and hardships such as those it is now sought to remedy. I would, therefore, ask hon. Members on both sides of the House seriously to consider whether by the adoption of a beneficial and practical Resolution such as that now submitted to us, they would not be doing something to deprive the advocates of extreme, and very often foolish, measures of the power they already possess and of their influence which increases day by day.

*(11.36.) MR. SHAW-STEWART (Renfrew, East): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down speaks of the benefits which would result if this Motion were passed, but he has omitted to point out in what particular way the Motion would benefit anybody.

*MR. CREMER: I suggested that it would benefit the villages by enabling them to obtain purer supplies of water.

*MR. SHAW-STEWART: I was about to say that all I could gather from the speech was that if this Motion were passed the animalculæ in village ponds might in some mysterious way vanish. But if all that is to happen is that the animalculæ in village ponds are to be replaced by the animalculæ in town ponds, I do not see that much will be gained. The hon. Member did not suggest what powers should be conferred on the Town Councils which they do not already possess for dealing with sanitary matters. The hon. Member for Lanarkshire made a general sweeping statement—which seemed to be founded on nothing more than gossip—as to the desire of certain landlords to drive everyone off their land. He did not mention the names. He found fault with the Seconder of the Motion for mentioning some cases of Town Councils in connection with which alleged hardships had occurred, and he would have been the first to complain if the names of those Town Councils had not been given; but he himself omitted to tell us who were the individuals of whom he spoke. I am surprised that the case of Scotland should have been gone into after your ruling, Sir, but it was touched upon, and the hon. Member who touched upon it dealt with a case with which I am tolerably familiar. The Mover of the Amendment instanced the case of Greenock, as to which he must have been misinformed, for during the last 40 years land has been acquirable by the Corporation of Greenock, and could have been acquired on fair terms. Tested by this case, the other examples of hardship adduced are of little weight, and therefore no case has been made out for the Motion, and it has not been shown that things would have been different if effect had been given to the Motion by legislation. For these reasons I shall support the Amendment.

*(11.42.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I believe the Debate on this Resolution will be productive of great good in the country. It states in a simple and plain way what is a great public need, and it is evaded by an Amendment which speaks about being ready to consider "definite proposals," but declining to assent to "general propositions." We heard in the earlier part of the evening my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Board of Trade say something about "A true blue argument." Well, I think the hon. Member how moved the Amendment made a speech which was worthy of being described as a very "true blue" speech; but, fortunately, we have heard from the same side of the House a speech of a very different character—I allude to that of the hon. Member for Woolwich. I would commend that speech to the attention of the Government and the Party opposite. I rejoice in this Debate, which indicates the greater interest taken in agricultural labourers since they have votes. Their interests are no longer the preserve of the hon. Member for Bordesley, whom I do not see in his place to-night. This Motion affords a touchstone and a test which will enable the labourers to determine who are their real friends, and who will assist them to obtain a greater enjoyment of the land which they believe is intended for the happiness and the use of all. True, the Resolution does not say how it is to be done; but while it deprives opponents of the opportunity of fastening upon details, it lays down a broad general principle which it is for statesmen to carry out. The labourers want land on fair terms free from the personality of the individual landlord, and under conditions which will save the unearned increment to themselves and their children, instead of allowing it to be appropriated by landlords big and small. Now, this Resolution fulfils all these conditions, and therefore, I for one, most loyally support it. The labourers know the interests of those who are against them—the landlords who for generations have fattened on the unearned increment of the community. An instance has been given of this by the hon. Member for Woolwich; and cases of this kind must be within the knowledge of every Member in his own constituency. I came across a case the other day, where a landowner was charging at the rate of £2 10s. for a tenth of an acre. That landowner is a Member of this House sitting on this side—though he does not vote with us. £25 a year for an acre of land let to agricultural tenants as garden allotments while the adjoining land is let by him at between £4 and £5 an acre. These cases are not singular; there is hardly a district in England in which they do not occur. The building lease dodge is another means by which the landlord fetters the growing community. The communities grow; they want elbow room, and the private owner of land fattens on the very needs of their existence; whereas I maintain that if communities were allowed to acquire lands around themselves on fair terms, so that they should receive the unearned increment, in 50 years' time there would be a property valuable enough to pay the whole of the local and poor rates. I would not interfere with any man's property unduly; but I hold that all individual ownership of land is subject to the general ownership of the community. I am one of those who hold the doctrine—Radical doctrine if you like to call it so—that God never intended the land to be possessed and enjoyed by a few people, but that He intended it for the benefit and enjoyment of all. And as I am in the habit of saying these things on village greens, and in village school rooms, I should be ashamed of myself if I did not say them here as well when opportunity offers.

*(11.52.) MR. WHARTON: The last speaker, so far as I understood him, alluded to the want of small holdings in England and Wales; but if it is not a matter of ancient history, I would remind him that the Party to which he belongs, in 1886 having turned out a Conservative Government on the question, had an opportunity of going on with the measure, but failed to avail themselves of it. It seems to me somewhat strange that so eminent a Member of the Party in power in 1886 should twit the Conservative Party—who really have done something towards enabling labourers to acquire small holdings—with not doing that which his own friends neglected to do when they had the opportunity. The Motion, so far as I understand it, is to enable Town Councils and County Councils, in some fashion not stated, to buy land for certain purposes which are very vaguely set forth. They are to be empowered to spend the ratepayers' money for some purpose, as to which the hon. Member has not been good enough to enlighten us. I came down here to-night expecting to hear an eminent lawyer—for the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries is a very eminent lawyer—propound a new Land Law for England; but I must say that I have received very little enlightenment. The hon. and learned Member began by stating that the landlords in England behaved very ill indeed. I was anxious to hear him give instances to prove his assertion, but he did not give any. All that he told us was that something unfair had been done in a fishing village on the coast of Devonshire.

MR. R. T. REID: I did not say that all landlords had behaved very ill indeed, or else I must have very ill indeed expressed my meaning. I said there were many cases of hardship, but that there were good landlords as well as bad.

MR. WHARTON: I am glad that I have elicited from the hon. and learned Member the confession that there are good landlords in England; but I must say that the hon. and learned Gentleman gave me the impression—and I think I shall be in the recollection of the House when I say that the general impression he conveyed was—that, as a rule, the landlords did not behave well. The hon. and learned Member went off to Sutherlandshire and talked about deer forests, and then he came to London, but I could learn absolutely nothing from his observations. The Seconder of the Motion made, as he always does, a very interesting speech; but it had very little to do with the Motion. He gave us a most interesting disquisition, chiefly in regard to co-operative stores and village halls; but in my county, at least, nearly every village hall has been built by that much-maligned individual, the great landlord. As no definite proposals for altering the system of land tenure have been submitted, there is really nothing to vote about. By carrying the Motion the House will be binding itself to great and fundamental changes for which no reasons have been adduced. That being the case, I shall feel bound to give my vote for the Amendment.

(12.0.) MR. BRUNNER: One hon. Member who spoke awhile ago expressed his desire not to interfere with the property of the landlords unduly, and at that a cheer went up from hon. Members opposite. But we have been complaining all the evening that the property of those who are not landlords except in name, namely, the leaseholders, have been unduly interfered with, and we trust that hon. Members opposite—kindly men as we know them to be—will extend their sympathy to this class. I listened with the utmost regret to the words which fell from my hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire (Mr. D. Crawford). The body of laws known as the Land Law of England has no worse result than this, that they brutalise the men who benefit by them. My hon. Friend will, I believe, be as kind a neighbour in Lanarkshire as my neighbours the great landowners are in Cheshire. I have seen a great deal of the difficulty of obtaining a pure water supply in villages, and if only on this account I should like to see this power conferred not only on Town and County Councils, but on all Rural and Urban Sanitary Authorities. Not long ago, I knew of a case of a landlord from whom the Sanitary Authority had obtained the lease of land from which to obtain water, charging a rent for the water obtained by his neighbours—most of whom were his tenants—while the waterworks were being executed. The water was running to waste, and though the landlord was losing nothing of any use to him he insisted on a rent. [Cries of "Name!"] No, Sir, I should be ashamed to give the name. I am not here to speak ill of my neighbours. The gentleman to whom I allude is a very kind man. He is respected wherever he is known, and comes of a Cheshire family, which has been respected as long as the records of this House have been on paper. Nevertheless, this man did not think it beneath him to charge a rent because his neighbours got the benefit of that which had cost him nothing whatever. If for no other reason than this, that the existence of this law hardens the feelings of the rich against the poor, I shall support the Motion.

(12.3.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I have listened to the Debate with the greatest possible attention; but I confess I am very little wiser than I was when it began with respect to the specific object which hon. Members opposite desire to obtain by the proposal submitted to the House. For I am bound to say that a vaguer or more indefinite Motion, supported by vaguer or more indefinite speeches, I do not recollect having ever listened to. The general drift of some of the speeches was tolerably clear, and undoubtedly it seems to me unhappily to be the case that we live in days when some politicians, at all events, appear to have as one of their chief objects a desire to obtain popular applause and popular support by appealing to the not unnatural wish of some classes of the people to become possessed of property which is not their own. What is the Motion before the House? It asserts that a measure is urgently needed to enable Town Councils and County Councils in England and Scotland to acquire by compulsion, if not by agreement, on what its supporters are pleased to describe as fair terms, such land within or adjoining their several districts as may, in their judgment, be needed for the requirements of the inhabitants. The first thing that occurs to me to ask is, What about the needs of the inhabitants in those districts who are to be deprived of their land? Surely their claims are entitled to some consideration; but those claims have not entered the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite even for a moment. How has the Motion been supported? The hon. Member who seconded it referred to some observations which I made on a former occasion with regard to the principle of compulsion. I acknowledge—nobody in these days disputes it for a moment—that the principle of compulsion with regard to the taking of land for a specific or definite object that is proved to be for the public good is undoubtedly accepted. It has been accepted by the present Government, and we do not deny that the Legislature, if it think fit, has the right to take land by compulsion. But the Legislature is bound not to think fit to do so unless it is clearly shown to be for the public good. Has it been shown in any one of the speeches this evening that there is any specific or definite object for the public good in the minds of Gentlemen opposite for which they desire to obtain the assent of the Legislature to the acquirement of land by compulsion? The hon. Member who seconded the Motion spoke of the necessity of obtaining free libraries and cricket grounds in various places where they are needed; and he dwelt on the subject of Co-operative Stores in some districts, expressing the opinion that it is most desirable that the use of the village schools should be allowed for the purposes of those who wish to promote the formation of such societies. In that last observation I cordially agree with the hon. Member, for I think that the use of such schools for purposes of that kind would promote an object which is for the general good of the inhabitants of the parish; but I have yet to learn that it is necessary that the House should assent to a vague proposition which would enable Town Councils and County Councils in all parts of the country to take land by compulsion under any pretext and for any purpose whatever. To whom do the people go when they want free libraries, cricket grounds, or public halls? Why, to the landlord of course. And can hon. Gentlemen opposite name any instance in which any landlord worthy of the name is not foremost in promoting such objects? Turning to the observations of the Mover of the Motion, I must say that in some respects I have never heard a more surprising speech. The Motion is one to enable Town and County Councils in England to acquire land by compulsion; yet the hon. Member found it necessary to travel to the North of Scotland for an illustration. He talked of the horrid scenes and the atrocities which occurred through the eviction of tenants in Sutherland.

MR. REID: I said devastation.

MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member may use what term he pleases. He referred to occurrences of 80 or 100 years ago. A more unfortunate or inaccurate reference could hardly have been made. What are the facts? I have myself had the opportunity of learning them from a man who devoted the whole of his life to the improvement and benefit of the people living in the interior of that country. The best proof of that is to be found in the monument erected to his memory. The fact is that year after year, owing to the climate and natural causes, the people were placed in such a condition of destitution, very often approaching starvation, that it became absolutely necessary for a landlord possessing any instincts of humanity at all to endeavour so to deal with the matter as to improve the condition of the people in the future. Steps were accordingly taken for the purpose of removing those people. [Ironical Opposition cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen would do well not to cheer too soon. Steps were taken to remove those people from the interior, in which it was almost impossible for them to live, to the coast of the country. That was done for two reasons—in the first place, the land near the coast was far the most fertile in the county; and, in the second place, the people were thus enabled to supplement their agricultural pursuits by fishing. The hon. Member made the alleged misconduct of the landed proprietors one of the main props of his wretched, indefinite Motion, but let me give a few of the facts. What was the condition of the people? It was described by a man who had visited the country over and over again. The description given was that—

“During 1816-17 these people suffered the extremes of want and human misery, and they existed on the bounty of the proprietor. Those who lived in the interior and had no cattle subsisted on nettle broth thickened with a little oatmeal, while those who had cattle resorted to the device of bleeding them and mixing the blood with meal. Every exertion was made by the proprietor. To those who had cattle he advanced money to the amount of £3,000, and to supply those who had no cattle he sent meal to the amount of £9,000.”

That is the work of a single year on the part of a landed proprietor, and it is work that has to be done year after year in the County of Sutherland to preserve these people from starvation.

MR. REID: Does the right hon. Gentleman justify the Sutherland evictions?

MR. CHAPLIN: Unquestionably I do. Why ask me such a question after the statement I have made to the House? Would the hon. Member have justified the retention of those people in a perpetual condition of misery and starvation? When I learn that the hon. Member has ever performed any acts of justice and humanity at great cost to himself such as I have just described, I will admit, what I do not admit at present, the right of the hon. Gentleman to pose as a critic in this matter. Then the hon. Member referred to a matter of quite a different character. He said there was great pressure at the present time for allotments and small holdings. The question of small holdings is one of great interest and importance, but as it is now under discussion before a Select Committee the hon. Member will excuse me if I reserve my opinion upon that question until the Committee has reported. The Party on this side of the House have not been backward in yielding to the demand for allotments, or in making arrangements and introducing legislation for their more numerous provision in the future. They have done so because they are convinced allotments are wanted. The hon. Member spoke of the tenants' precarious tenure of their cottages; but how does he propose to ameliorate their position? If the Local Authorities are substituted for the landlords, what guarantee is there that the tenants will be one whit better off? Nine labourers out of ten, if they were given the choice of holding their cottages either under an average landlord or under some Local Authority, some Parish Board, would not hesitate for a moment, but would choose the landlord. The hon. Member spoke of the uncontrolled power exercised by landlords over their land, and said that such power is injurious to the public interest. But whether it is injurious or not depends entirely upon how the power is exercised. Uncontrolled power badly used is undoubtedly most injurious to the public interest, and not only in the case of land. The same thing is true of the uncontrolled misuse of his income by any hon. Member in this House. Then the hon. Member said that the price to be given for land taken by compulsion is to be a fair price, and that by a fair price he means an honest price. But what is an honest price? Surely it is the worth of the land to the owner. Is that the view of the hon. Member, and is the owner to settle the price himself, or does the hon. Member desire that the land should be taken from the owner by compulsion, and that he should be paid less than he wants or holds the land to be worth? The hon. Member for Haggerston (Mr. Cremer) said that the people wish to redress their wrongs; but what are the wrongs which the people wish to redress in connection with this question? I have failed to gather any clear notion of the hon. Member's meaning, unless it is that the wrong under which the people suffer consists in this—that, certain persons happening to be the owners of plots of land, other people wish to possess that land in their place. What wrong can there be in the fact that I or any other person may have acquired by purchase or inheritance certain parcels or quantities of land, and which not unnaturally some other people would like to possess? But the most extraordinary statement we have heard this evening came from the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division (Mr. Winterbotham). After warmly thanking the Mover of the Resolution for the course which he has taken, the hon. Member, in a burst of pious aspiration, said, "Thank God this is an abstract Resolution and not a Bill." I was not surprised at this pious aspiration of the hon. Member; because, although hon. Members opposite never lose an opportunity of talking upon this question, they have always been deplorably backward when opportunities for action have presented themselves. The hon. Member candidly avowed that this Resolution was a bid for the labourers' vote. "If you will not do this thing," said the hon. Member, "make room for us." But what would be the use of making room for the Party opposite? Would their conduct be different from what it has been in the past? The labourers have only too good a recollection of their attitude with reference to this question. I have endeavoured, I hope not at too great length, to criticise some of the statements and suggestions in speeches from hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I may be permitted, in a few words, to state my position and the position of the Government in reference to this question. We freely admit that the compulsory principle must be recognised when the acquisition of land is proved to be for a genuine, specific, beneficial, and advantageous public purpose. I do not think there need be any doubt in the minds of

hon. Gentlemen opposite as to our feeling when I remind the House, as I am justified in doing, that I was almost the first person in this House, many years ago, to advocate the compulsory principle in a Bill with regard to the payment of compensation by landlords to agricultural tenants. I believe, also, that I was the first person in the House, certainly one of the first on the Conservative side of the House, to propose that in regard to allotments compulsion should be admitted as a principle where land could not be obtained without it. We did that because we were absolutely persuaded, after careful inquiry, that both of these were objects of great public advantage, which in the public interest it was desirable, and indeed more than desirable, we should adopt. If hon. Gentlemen opposite will show us definitely some good which can be accomplished by their proposal, if they will submit propositions to the House of Commons at any time in a definite shape and in a definite manner, and will prove to us that they are for the public good and advantage, then they may be assured that the Government will not be backward in entertaining these propositions. But we must have before us something more than vague speeches supporting a vague Motion such as has been submitted to us to-night. Until we have something different before us I hope hon. Members on both sides will unite in showing their sense of this vague and indefinite Motion by voting against it.

(12.34.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is not really an alarming speaker when he adopts the line he has taken up to-night; because we all remember that he took up the very self-same line when he met a proposal of this kind in reference to allotments, the moment it became serious, with what he described at the time as an "emphatic 'No.'"

MR. CHAPLIN: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to explain, as I have explained before, that when I gave that reply I said "No," not to the proposition for a Bill for allotments, which we said the Government were ready to introduce; I said "No" to a Vote of Censure thoroughly undeserved, and to nothing else.

MR. J. MORLEY: At all events the result, if not the intention, of the right hon. Gentleman's emphatic "No" was to negative the proposal for compulsory purchase. The right hon. Gentleman cannot give an emphatic "No" to that statement?

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes, I can; a most emphatic "No." I am afraid the memory of the right hon. Gentleman must be very deficient. A Vote of Censure was moved on the Government for not including the mention of an Allotments Bill in the Gracious Speech from the Throne. I answered, on behalf of the Government, that the Government were prepared to introduce an Allotments Bill, a Bill in which, so far as I recollect, the principle of compulsion was included.

MR. J. MORLEY: This is the first time we have heard that the principle of compulsion was included in a Bill the House never saw or heard of. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes the House to believe that in January, 1886, he was in favour and the Government was in favour of compulsory allotments, of course I unreservedly accept his statement. I look forward very confidently to the day when possibly the right hon. Gentleman himself will bring in a Bill carrying out the proposals which to-night he is going to vote against. I look forward to the time when he will say the Government accept the principle of compulsion. He has said so to-night, but he also says that it is only honest that the landlord should fix the price. Is the House to understand that the right hon. Gentleman seriously maintains that land is to be taken by compulsion, but at a price fixed by the landlord? I can only say that to that proposition we give an "emphatic No." Anybody can see that the time is not very far distant when landlords will not be allowed to fix the price of any land that may be taken, as the Motion suggests, by public bodies for public purposes. Anybody can see that such a principle as that is in these times undoubtedly doomed. The right hon. Gentleman has said exactly what he used to say upon allotments, that, when an improvement is required and land is required for the purpose, then the first person to go is the landlord. He used to say, in regard to allotments, that the people would rather go to a landlord than to a Local Board. True, there are many landlords to whom they would prefer to go, but these are the minority among landlords; but depend upon it the time has come when we have to accept the principle in legislation that popularly elected bodies must have power to acquire land for public purposes, or what they deem purposes of public utility; and if the right hon. Gentleman doubts that, I would refer him to the speech made to-night by one of the right hon. Gentleman's supporters. If he doubts the truth of what I say, let him weigh the speech of the hon. Member for Woolwich (Colonel Hughes). And, by-the-way, the right hon. Gentleman forgets, I think, the "Acquisition of Church Sites" Bill. He forgets that his own Party passed a Bill for the compulsory acquisition of church sites; but when an attempt was made to apply the same principle to chapels, a Gentleman who sits behind the right hon. Gentleman did his best to block that proposal, and to deny to Nonconformists the same compulsory powers that were given to Churchmen. The charge of vagueness has been brought against the Motion, and the able speeches in which it has been moved and supported. There was no vagueness in the able and, as I thought, most interesting speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Acland). There is no vagueness in the proposition of my hon. and learned Friend; and if anybody wants to know what the recommendations implied in the Motion are, I would refer him to no more recondite authority than the recommendations of the Town Holdings Committee. I am sure the President of the Local Government Board is well acquainted with those recommendations. The recommendations are not, it is true, all in favour of powers being given to County Councils, but they are recommendations pointing in the direction in which they may be—probably will be—expanded for County Councils and Town Councils to have compulsory powers. The Committee recommended that all religious bodies to whom land had been granted on lease by the freeholder for a place of worship or school should be allowed to purchase the fee, subject to fair compensation; and similar powers were recommended to be given to educational bodies, even when not elected; also to provident societies with reference to their buildings; and, lastly, and most important, was the recommendation that any public body should have power to procure the enfranchisement of any building required for purposes of general utility, on the ground that security of tenure in such an instance is of great importance to the community. Therefore, the proposal of my hon. and learned Friend is no revolutionary one; in principle and in spirit it has been admitted and recommended by a Committee of the House, upon which, of course, there was a Conservative majority. So far from the proposal implied in the Motion being destructive or violent, it is no more than an extension—and no very violent extension—of the principle which the Government themselves admit and are carrying out in their Allotments Act. The principle of the Allotments Act is that a public body shall have compulsory power to satisfy a certain kind of public demand. Where is the revolutionary character of a proposal to extend the same principle in the direction of other requirements which a locally-elected body may choose to think are requirements of public utility? I am quite sure that the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division (Mr. Winterbotham) gave exceedingly good advice when he said that to assent to, and still more to carry out in legislation, the principle involved in this Motion is a sure and the only way of avoiding a tremendous tide, which, if we do not meet it in time, will submerge a great many institutions which we on this side of the House value as much as hon. Members opposite. The hon. and learned Member who moved the Amendment to the Motion has taken up a position which I am sure Gentlemen sitting near the hon. and learned Gentleman must have heard with some consternation, and which will hardly be supported by them, however they may vote to-night. There are not 50 Gentlemen on the opposite Benches who will take the position of the hon. and learned Member, namely, that all these transactions are to be left purely and simply to the principle of demand and supply.

MR. AMBROSE: Indeed, I never said anything of the kind. I said that private transactions between man and man should be so regulated; but I admitted that upon legitimate ground being shown a Public Authority might take compulsory powers for public purposes.

MR. J. MORLEY: Then I must say that very elaborate passages in the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman were ill-conceived and not addressed to the Motion before the House. I am sure the House understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to have insisted on competitive rents remaining the law in the case of all these transactions in which public bodies might have concern; and, that being so, I think that my hon. Friend behind me has not pressed the hon. and learned Member too hard when he said that the Amendment rested upon nothing stronger than the old and, as I should have thought, almost universally repudiated, principle that a landowner can do what he likes with his own. I do not believe that that principle is now accepted in any quarter of the House, except perhaps by the hon. and learned Member himself. The speech of the hon. Member for Woolwich is a fair answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman. The subject of this Motion is one which undoubtedly, as years go on, will constantly be brought before the House. Large Municipalities, and small Municipalities also, will not endure that their expansion should be throttled and the conditions of their growth checked by the assertion of privileges, or it may be of the legal rights of owners of land, hostile to the welfare of those who have given to that land its real value. The question of the unearned increment will have to be faced within a measurable distance of time. It is unendurable that great increments which have not been earned by those to whom they accrue, but have been formed by the industry of others, should be absorbed by people who have contributed nothing to that increase. I remember when Mr. John Stuart Mill broached the doctrine 20 years ago. Mr. Mill was the last man to accept any modern doctrine of taking land without fair compensation; but if the doctrine of the unearned increment had prevailed at the time when he was speaking with reference to some of the great London proprietors, enough would have been intercepted to satisfy all the public purposes which it is now proposed to meet, and the demands of a great society like that of this Metropolis would have been fairly satisfied, without doing an injustice to a single landowner. These doctrines are in the air, they are now put forward, not quite for the first time, but almost, in this House. The discussion we have opened to-night will not be the last, but is the first of a series of discussions; and it is because I think that the Motion points towards a solution of the problem which is reasonable and moderate and involves no breach of equity towards any owner of property that I shall give it my most hearty support.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House, while ready to consider definite proposals for conferring on County Councils and Town Councils such further powers as may be shown to be needed for the requirements of the inhabitants within their jurisdiction, declines to assent to a general proposition which neither defines the nature of the requirements nor the mode in which they are to be met.

It being after One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at five minutes after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 7th May, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

THE NORWICH CHARITIES.

MR. S. HOARE (Norwich): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith whether the Charity Commissioners will re-consider those provisions of the scheme for the regulation of Doughty's and other Associated Charities at Norwich, by which the receipt of Poor Law relief within a stated period prior to appointment is made a disqualification for admission to the almshouses of the Charities, with a view to the reduction of the period so prescribed?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The Charity Commissioners will be prepared, upon receipt of a proper application, to re-consider the provisions of the scheme for Doughty's and other associated Charities at Norwich, with a view to reducing from three years to one year the period of disqualification for admission to the almshouses.

MR. J. J. COLMAN (Norwich): Will the Charity Commissioners assent to the printing, as a Parliamentary Paper, of the correspondence between the Corporation of Norwich and themselves?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I think, perhaps, it may meet the views of the hon. Member if he is supplied with a copy of the correspondence which has taken place. The matter is hardly of sufficient public interest to justify us in going to the expense of printing the whole of the correspondence. If the hon. Member will communicate with the Office he can see the file, and a copy will be supplied to him of the correspondence. He can then make what use of it he likes.

MR. J. J. COLMAN: I have the correspondence; I wish it printed as a Parliamentary Paper. I intend, hereafter, to move for it; and I should like to know if the Commissioners will assent to the Motion?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I do not think we have any objection, except on the ground of expense. The matter is not of exciting public interest, and the Treasury may object to accede to the hon. Gentleman's demand.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENT (SCOTLAND) (FERGUSON BEQUEST FUND) (ANSWER TO ADDRESS).

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD reported Her Majesty's Answer to the humble Address of the 17th day of March last, as followeth:—

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I have received your Address praying that I will withhold My Consent to the Scheme of the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Commissioners for the management of the Endowment known as the Ferguson Bequest Fund.

"I will withhold My Consent in conformity with your advice."

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENT (SCOTLAND) (REDHYTHE BURSARIES, &amp;c. FORDYCE) (ANSWER TO ADDRESS).

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD reported Her Majesty's Answer to the humble Address of the 31st day of March last, as followeth:—

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I have received your Address praying that I will withhold My Consent from that part of the Scheme of the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Commissioners for the management of the Endowments in the County of Banff, known as the Redhythe Bursaries, George Smith's Bounty, and the Stuart Mortification, which consists of and is contained in following words of Section 26 of the said Scheme (that is to say) 'or with the consent of the Governors at any School where higher instruction is efficiently given which the Bursar could attend while living with parents or relatives.'

"I have given directions for these words to be omitted accordingly in compliance with your advice."

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENT (SCOTLAND) (ORPHAN HOSPITAL SCHEME) (EDINBURGH) (ANSWER TO ADDRESS).

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD reported Her Majesty's Answer to the humble Address of the 31st day of March last, as followeth:—

O

'Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I have received your Address praying that I will withhold My Consent from the Scheme of the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Commissioners for the administration of the Orphan Hospital, Edinburgh, and I will comply with your advice."

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS BILL.—(No. 8.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.28.) MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire): Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the Bill now before the House are very simple, and intended to meet two admitted blots in the Charitable Trusts Bill, in consequence of which large funds, intended for charitable uses, are constantly being wasted, or diverted from public objects. Both Parties, when in power, have tried to remedy this evil, but unfortunately the measures which would have done this, were of so extensive a nature that though Lord Cairns in 1879, and Lord Selborne in 1881, introduced measures to deal with the question on the lines of the present Bill, and although a Committee in 1884, presided over by the Member for Bradford (Mr. Lefevre), and composed, of course, of Members from both sides of the House, reported unanimously in favour of the Amendments proposed in the present Bill, time has never been found to carry out the considerable measures of reform which were recommended; and this unfortunate and discreditable waste of money continues constantly to present scandals, which are a cruel injustice to the poor, who are thus defrauded, and I venture to think is not conducive to confidence in the promptitude and efficiency of our legislation. The promoters of this Bill have no personal grievance against the present system, but the Debate on the Vote on the Ecclesiastical Commission, in May, 1889, impressed upon them the necessity of putting a stop promptly to what is really a public scandal. It will be seen that they belong to both sides of the House. The only two Members on the Conservative side of the House who sat on the Commission of 1884 warmly supported the Bill. Its principles have had the approval of three Lord Chancellors, including the present one, and it is warmly supported by all the Liberal Members of the Committee of 1884, including the Chairman of the Committee, whose unwearied patience and thorough investigation of the whole subject, and the moderation of his Report, which carried I believe, the unanimous support of the Committee with him, will, I trust, bear fruit some time in a complete revision of the subject. But in the meantime he most cordially supports the removal of this, the most pressing evil calling for remedy. The Committee of 1884 were unanimous in reporting that—

"There is no ground for maintaining the limit in the Act of 1860 in respect to charities with an income of over £50 per annum, but a further step should be taken for transferring to Commissioners the powers exercised by the High Court of Justice for the control and reform of mischievous or wasted Charities."

For ample proof of such waste and misappropriation, I would refer the House to the evidence in the Report of 1884, summed up in Question 626 to 635, 641 to 655, 642 to 650; also Question 182 to 194, and 348 to 478. You will find one case where the income was £900 a year, £595 of which was spent in supervising the expenditure of £369. In the case of a charity of £10,000 a year, only £1,700 was utilised for charity, the whole of the remainder being spent on management. To deal with such cases, the Commissioners have to go to the expense of setting the Attorney General in motion, and bringing an action in the Court of Chancery, with all the attendant expenses. There is a case of a man who had £10,000 a year, who contended he was a proper recipient of the charity of a Trust, because he was poor compared with his brother, who had £20,000 a year. The hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. Lowther), who represents the Commission in the House, will be able to tell you that these scandals are still coming before them monthly, and that they have no power to prevent them. And is it not the height of absurdity that before you can, without an expensive Chancery suit, impoverishing the charity, interfere with men who are wasting, or even misappropriating charitable funds, you must ask the sanction of the very men who are neglecting their duty, or misapplying or even paying themselves for mismanaging Charitable Funds. You might as well require the policeman to ask permission from the thief, or other breaker of the law, before he interfered to prevent his continuing his misconduct. Clause 3 of the Bill is merely to remedy an oversight, in consequence of which, as the law now stands, if a charity has been obliged to get Parliamentary sanction for some change of Trust or some other matter, even though the Trustees themselves and those who thus benefit by the Trust, the Government and the Commissioners all combine to wish some needed improvement, it is impossible to do it without an Act of Parliament, and its inevitable, and, therefore, often prohibitory expense and delay. This matter needs no argument, and I am sure the House will see that the abuses ought to be remedied. I am very sorry that I have been able to lay before the House so imperfectly this question, particularly as I will be followed by the Mover of the Amendment who is a practical speaker, and who will be able to put his case with greater ability before the House than I have been able to put mine, but the scandal and abuses are so clear that I cannot but hope that the House will assent to the removal of these blots from the management of our charities. I have great pleasure in moving the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Rathbone.)

* (12.45.) Sir A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the Amendment for the rejection of the Bill. The hon Member said the Bill was simple and short. That description is not inconsistent with the character I am going to give it, that of being the most sweeping, comprehensive, and general proposal, and one much too inclusive for the purpose of achieving the objects which it has in view. I should not for a moment think of defending any of those scandals or abuses to which the hon. Member has referred, and, where they exist, I quite agree that it is desirable to save to the poor the means of help which have been given them. In the present state of the law, it is true there may be some difficulties in that direction, but they are not so great as have been described by the hon. Member. The present Bill contains remedies which will be effective I do not doubt for a moment, but they carry with them objections which I think will be shared by hon. Members after the discussion on the subject. Though I quite grant that the Mover of the Amendment is actuated by high sentiments, still I feel that the present Bill would, in the end, instead of having a beneficial, have the contrary effect upon the charities of the country. It is towards that point my observations will be directed. To appreciate the full effect of the Bill, it is necessary to trace the growth of the powers of the Commission. In 1853 the efforts of the Charity Commissioners were directed to the reform of obsolete charities, to adopt them to modern ideas, and to remove what was called the "dead hand"—the surviving influence of the pious founder, whose charities were frequently crippled by restrictive provisions long out of date. I grant the Charity Commissioners, in dealing with these restrictive provisions, have done a useful work, and have rendered the charities beneficial to the poor recipients with corresponding advantage to the country. But ever since the formation of the Commission in 1853, its object has been very greatly to extend its powers. The Commission has not only a good opinion of itself, justified generally speaking, but it is strongly of opinion that every one else, even those who live in the locality where the charity is administered, are impotent to effect the good for the recipients that can be achieved by the Commission itself. The Commission was originally limited to charities, the gross income of each of which was less than £30 a year; afterwards the power was extended to charities with incomes of not less than £50 a year. Since then, several attempts have been made to further extend its powers. The hon. Member for Carnarvonshire was quite right when he said Bills were introduced in 1881 and 1883.

MR. RATHBONE: And 1879.

*SIR A. ROLLIT: There may have been even more than two Bills. The hon. Member referred to the chorus of approval with which those measures were introduced. He never referred to the Debates in the other House, or I think he might have added that they were subjected to criticisms by Lord Salisbury and other noble Lords—criticisms which, it appears to me, might very well be applied to the present Bill, which, though in one sense more limited, is in others very much more inclusive than the Bills to which I have referred. There are, moreover, remedies for the abuses which exist, and remedies which have been applied. There is the remedy of gaining the consent of the Trustees. Although that consent may have been refused in some cases, I believe I am correct in saying that many charities have been modified with the concurrence of those who have taken part in their local administration. And if there have been exceptional instances to the contrary, I am in favour of providing some remedy of a less drastic character than that proposed by the Bill. There is also a right of access to the High Court for the purpose of constructing schemes, when they are in accordance with the general intention of the founder, though adapted to modern requirements. Again, if the doctrine of cy près is not applicable in any particular case, then Parliament may be resorted to, and under the direction of Parliament schemes have been modernised and made more beneficial. Now, Sir, the Trusts which would not be benefited by the Bill, but the contrary, are the larger Trusts in our towns—Municipal Trusts which are administered in our great towns, and which at present attract the active interest and co-operation of a class of men, the value of whose work is inestimable, and who would be deterred from taking further part by a measure which would transfer all the power from them to the Charity Commissioners, rendering themselves comparative nonentities in the administration of those charities. What does this short and simple measure do? By the 2nd clause it enables the Charity Commissioners to make orders under Section 2 of the Act of 1860, in the case of all charities,

“Upon the application of the Attorney General, or of any person or persons referred to in the said section two as authorised to apply to the Board for orders, in the same manner as they have power to make orders under the said section two in case of charity, the gross annual income of which does not exceed fifty pounds.”

So, by a few simple words you have the extension of the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners to all incomes of over £50. By the removal of that restriction the most inclusive and unlimited jurisdiction is given to the Commission. Section 3 of the Bill is—

“Any provisions relating to a charity contained in any Act of Parliament establishing a scheme approved and certified by the Board under Section 54 and the following sections of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, or in any Act of Parliament other than a public general Act, may be from time to time amended or altered by a scheme of the High Court of Justice, or of the Board in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction, as effectually as if the trust created by, and the provisions contained in, such Act had been established by the founder in the case of a charity having a founder.”

I have seldom read a more comprehensive section than this, and I contend that the effect of this measure, if passed, would be to give absolute control over the destiny of any charity, from the largest of our hospitals to the smallest of our village foundations, with the exception of the cases in which half of the funds are subscribed voluntarily, and of religious institutions. With those limited exceptions, the result of this measure would be to give the sole and exclusive control to the Charity Commissioners. The Commissioners would be able to divert any particular fund or the general funds of a charity; they would be able to form schemes without any reference to the wishes of the locality; they would be able to re-make the wills of founders; and they might alter any private Act of Parliament relating to such charities. All this might be done, not as in the past in Parliament, and subject to discussion in this House; not under the check of any public Debate whatever; but in the room of the Charity Commissioners, where there can be only a very limited audience, and where, under the provisions of the measure, there need be no Conference at all. If this Bill passed, in future it would only be a matter of courtesy if the Commissioners received the Local Trustees. We have heard of the dead hand, the influence of which has passed away in many cases. But by this Bill the Local Trustees are put on one side by a living hand, and the whole of this important work, which is essentially of a local character, is to be put into the hands of a Public Department without any material check upon it. We have heard something of the action of Local Charity Trustees. There are in our large towns numbers of men who will be interfered with by this Bill—men who make sacrifices of their time, and incur much trouble in the administration of Local Charities for the benefit of the poor, who highly appreciate their services. I feel quite sure that the Bill, if passed, would restrict the interest they take in the work, and I am convinced the House will gravely consider before it disturbs a local administration of these charities which has hitherto been successful, and which has not, indeed, been specifically impeached, except in one instance, by the Mover of the Bill. I am aware that in general terms the hon. Member did incorporate other instances, but I think he only alluded to one specifically. On the other hand, I know of a great many instances of a contrary character which would be covered by this Bill in a way which would be otherwise than beneficial. I say that the Local Charity Trustees, as a rule, have done that which has been to the advantage of the charities. Many times they have had differences with the Charity Commission—sometimes chronic differences which have lasted for years, but I would add to the opinion I have already expressed, that when these differences have taken place, generally speaking in the case of the larger charities, the Local Trustees have been in the right, and the view of the Charity Commissioners has been open to serious and successful challenge. Cases can be mentioned in which the Local Trustees have taken exception, and rightfully so, to the action and inaction of the Charity Commission. In the first place, it is alleged, and I think with some truth, that there are few Departments in which there are so many delays which are prejudicial to the interests of local charities. Very often we hear of these interests being neglected, and it would not be hard to prove that the difficulty has been in London rather than in the locality, and that it has been almost impossible to secure a definite course of action on the part of the Commissioners. Great delay takes place with regard to the transfer of property, and the investment of funds. It required years to induce the Charity Commission to consent to the investigation of charity funds in Corporation Stock—one of the best and safest forms of investment and one generally associated with the locality in which the charity exists. Well, I will give two instances where I think the action and inaction of the Charity Commission has been open to criticism, and where the Local Trustees have been right. The first of these is the case of the Grammar School at Hull. I am quite aware that this would not be materially affected by the Bill, but, on the other hand, the Bill would give additional and unrestricted powers to the Charity Commissioners, and, if in the course of their administration of a local charity, they have taken an unwise course in opposition to the wishes of Local Trustees that affords a strong reason against arming the Commissioners with these unrestricted powers. So far back as 1879 the Grammar School, an old and historic building, having become dilapidated, application was made for power to realise the property, with a view to the erection of a new building. Not until 1882 was an order made for the sale of the property, and when it was made the order contained directions—or, at any rate, specified the object—for the erection of a new building to replace the old one. The old school was sold, and plans for the new building approved by the Charity Commissioners. In 1882 the new site, also, was inspected and approved, but will it be believed that though the funds were transferred to the Official Trustee, they have been lying idle ever since, and the land has been let instead of the school being erected. The ground of the refusal to act, notwithstanding continual protests, is that there is no endowment provided for the school, but this point was only raised after the sale of the old property and the purchase of a new site. There was no material endowment of the old school. Notwithstanding the disadvantage of the school being held in a building unfitted for the purpose, the attendance increased by hundreds, and its work was most successful. True, now, owing to a large bequest to another school, the urgency is not so great, except for the scholars in the Grammar School, but the fact remains that although there was but a small endowment, the Commissioners had in their hands the funds produced by the sale of the old school, yet nothing was done towards the erection of the new school, and this affords a notable instance of the wise action of Local Trustees being balked by the inaction of the Commissioners, and by their resistance to a very reasonable request. Another instance is afforded from the same town. Some years ago it was proposed to sell some small almshouses and devote the proceeds to educational purposes. I, as one of the Trustees, and in my interest for the cause of education, concurred in the proposal. However, local sentiment was evoked, and strong local feeling expressed against the transfer of charitable funds to educational purposes, and ultimately the Commissioners were over-ruled and the transfer did not take place. The result has been that a splendid institution has been erected in Hull, which is doing admirable work. I give that as another instance in which the action of the Local Trustees was right, and the action of the Charity Commissioners wrong, although at the time I concurred in it, of which I repented, while they have not. I am only too glad that the charitable funds have not been diverted to educational purposes, but have been retained so beneficently for the purposes of the poor. The feeling against the unrestricted power of the Charity Commissioners is particularly strong in Hull. The Local Trustees consist of 20 of the leading men of the town, and the Trust is identified with the Corporation. At a recent meeting of these Trustees the proposals in this Bill were unanimously condemned as against the interest of the recipients of the charities. Both the Trustees and the Corporation have petitioned against the Bill. Hull has had considerable experience in these matters, and the attitude of the gentlemen to whom I have alluded forms a strong ground for believing that our Municipalities do not think that the Bill will improve the administration of local charities. The criticism of the Charity Commissioners is most noticeable in cases of educational charities, which are entirely placed under their control, and, therefore, I protest most earnestly against the control of all the local charities being handed over to them. There can be no doubt that the Local Trustees are better qualified by a knowledge of the local requirements of a district to manage its local charities. The Charity Commissioners, on the other hand, wish to centralise the control of all the charities in their own hands. The tendency of the present day, however, is in favour of decentralisation instead of centralisation. Even in a progressive country like Germany, State action has the effect of neutralising private interest and private enterprise, and lessening that personal sympathy which ought to exist in the administration of Charitable Trusts; it also has the effect of creating a feeling that the State ought to do all those things that are now done by private individuals. Nothing would be more regrettable than that such a state of affairs should spring up in this country. It is impossible to over-estimate the value to the recipients of charity of personal sympathy, such as that of Local Trustees, who are many of them men who devote the whole of their time to the improvement of the condition of the poorer classes. If I thought the public interest would be served by this Bill I should vote for it; but it is because I feel that the effect of such a measure would be to greatly restrict donations and bequests for charitable purposes that I am under an obligation to do what I can to defeat the Bill, which, though short and simple, is in all its characteristics far too inclusive in dealing with all the great charities of the country. The recommendations of the Committee of 1884 are systematically ignored in this Bill. That Committee recommended that the appeal to the High Court should be retained, but there is no qualification in this Bill which retains that appeal. The Report of the Committee of 1884 further recommended that where a change that is sought to be made is greater than the Court would sanction under the cy près doctrine, the scheme should be laid before Parliament and a Standing Committee formed for the purpose of supervising and considering such cases. In this measure there is no provision whatever for Parliamentary supervision. On the contrary, from the wording of Clause 3 such work may be done by the Commissioners in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction. There was a further recommendation in the Report of 1884 that provision should be made for the more direct recognition of the wishes of the locality. There are no such words in the Bill before the House, although that seems to me to be an absolutely essential check upon the action of the Commissioners. The Report of 1884 goes further and recommends that the initiative in the matter of such schemes should be in the hands of Municipal Corporations, and—anticipating the Act of 1888—of County Authorities. The very essence of the restrictions recommended in the Report of 1884 is the interest of the localities; but this Bill confers powers on the Commissioners without consideration for the interests of the localities. The House should, I think, pause very much before giving effect to this measure, which does so much which is highly objectionable. It provides powers of a most inclusive character, it provides for centralisation, it ignores local feeling and co-operation and local interest and sympathy, and it does not provide the local and Parliamentary checks which are so strongly recommended by the Parliamentary Committee of 1884. Such a Bill ought not to be passed by the House, and I feel I have no alternative but to move its rejection.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Albert Rollit.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

* (1.25.) MR. SAMUEL HOARE (Norwich): In rising to second the Amendment I should like first to say that I fully appreciate the reasons which have actuated hon. Members who have introduced this Bill. I agree with the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire that delay in the introduction of needful reforms is dangerous, and that it is no use locking the stable door when the horse is stolen; but my view is that we should not lock the stable door until the horse is supplied within the stable with everything he requires to enable him to live a comfortable and healthy life. My feeling is that if we lock the door by this Bill we shall only give rise to irritation and difficulties and weaken, rather than strengthen, the work of the Charity Commission. I feel that I must support my hon. Friend, and ask the House to support him too, in voting against the Second Reading of the Bill. I would ask the House to do this in its own interest, in the interest of the Charity Commissioners, in the interest of the Local Trustees, and last, though by no means least, in the interest of many thousands of poor people who are deeply interested in the question, and who have great difficulty at the present time in expressing any opinion on these matters which are of vital importance to themselves. I think the House should oppose this Bill in its own interest, because, as my hon. Friend has said, it practically ignores the recommendations of two important Committees, and in the interest of the Charity Commissioners, because it ignores their wishes as expressed in their last Report. The Bill gives greater powers to the Commissioners, and does not provide for representative bodies having a voice in the consideration of schemes in their own parishes; and, further, it does not give the Commissioners any wider powers for meeting the wishes of those most interested in the administration of the Charities. Lastly, it does not lay down a principle under which a new scheme can be discussed. There is only one kind of scheme on which the House has an opportunity of expressing its disagreement, and that is a scheme under the Endowed Schools Act. A great number of schemes have emanated from the Charity Commissioners in such a way that it is very difficult for the people interested in them to express their disapproval of any part of them. There are, I know, provisions for opposition to schemes to be brought forward; but the opposition has to take place before a Court, and it cannot be undertaken until the people have proved their right to appear. It is very desirable that there should be some change so that anybody interested in a scheme, and who wishes to express disapproval of it, can do so without cost to himself, and without having to call in the law to assist him. I realise that the Charity Commissioners are very careful before framing a scheme to take the opinion of the people in the locality; but I am trying to prove that when a scheme is issued it is very difficult indeed to bring any opposition to it before the Order is finally settled. I know there are other ways in which charity schemes are issued. I am aware that the Attorney General has power to issue a scheme, with which the Charity Commissioners have nothing whatever to do; and then there is one other kind of scheme which comes before the House, a scheme framed by Act of Parliament, which can only be altered by another Act of Parliament. The Commissioners say there is considerable hardship and inconvenience from this cause, and they hope there will be legislation on the subject. I regret provision is not made in this Bill to cover this point. But, at the same time, I base my opposition to the Bill mainly on the ground that the recommendations of the two Committees who went carefully into the system of the Charity Commissioners have not been adopted in the Bill. My hon. Friend has alluded to the 1884 Report; but he did not read that clause in which the Committee say—

"It is of the greatest importance that full public inquiry should be held before any scheme is eventually assented to."

My hon. Friend alluded to the fact that the Committee recommended that Municipal and Representative County Authorities formed the best bodies to initiate charity schemes. There is no allusion in the Bill to that point. All those of us who in our own localities have seen the difficulties that have arisen from there not having been sufficient public inquiry before a scheme has been settled, must realise that it is of the utmost importance that, before giving further powers to the Commissioners, there should be provision made to enable the poorest people affected by the scheme to express their views upon it without cost to themselves. There is another point worthy of consideration. The Committee on the Endowed Schools Act, who reported in 1887, recommended that greater publicity in respect to schemes under the Act should be given during the initial and subsequent stages; and that it was desirable that the wishes of the locality should be more consulted, and that in their administration the Governing Body should be left more unfettered. There is a feeling in many districts that while the Commissioners have endeavoured to do all in their power to formulate fair schemes, the poor people have had no opportunity of expressing their wishes, or if they have had that opportunity, it has involved great cost. As both of the Committees to which I have referred have recommended that charity schemes should be submitted to the representative bodies in the districts affected, I cannot agree to any extension of the power of the Commissioners, unless provision is made for that. The Commissioners have, no doubt, endeavoured to get the local opinion, but there is no distinct arrangement by which they are to do it. Indeed, I think it will be found they are only to use their discretion as to the publicity they may deem necessary. I know of a scheme which was only advertised twice in one local paper, and put up on the door of the Town Hall and the parish church. That, I am sure the House will agree, was hardly sufficient publicity to give to an important scheme. I am especially anxious that Local Representative Bodies should have every scheme affecting their districts come before them. I am aware the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) will say that any Municipal Corporation or County Council who wish to see a scheme is at liberty to pass a Resolution asking for the scheme; but I think it would be very much better that Representative Bodies should receive such schemes as a matter of course, and that the schemes should lie on the table of the Local Council for a certain period before it can come into force. The large constituency I represent has been fortunate in having many charities, which I have had several times to bring before the notice of the House, and I thank the Commissioners for the attention they have always given to the wants and requirements of our city. But, at the same time, I feel they are bound too tightly by the present law; that if they are to meet the wishes of the localities it will be necessary that the House, when it gives them wider powers to deal with charities, should give them further powers, so that they are not necessarily to be tied down or fettered by decisions of the Court. I scarcely like to touch on the legal question; but I understand, from answers given in the House, that it is held by the Judges impossible for the Commissioners in any way to relax the provision that people in receipt of pauper relief should receive no benefit from a charity, on the ground that it would be relieving the rates. In our city a great number of citizens are greatly dissatisfied with one scheme, about which I asked a question to day, because they believe that when it was framed they did not have sufficient opportunity of expressing their opinion against it. They would have liked to raise the question whether the rule as to relief could not have been relaxed. That is a question with which the House ought to deal. I know the case of a man who has brought up a family for years, in the midst of great difficulties, without going on the rates, but who, owing to an accident, was bound to call in the parish doctor. In consequence of that he is debarred from receiving any benefit from the charity, as things stand at present. This man has a very good character and is a credit to the place; but he cannot benefit from the charity, whilst persons of indifferent character are entitled to receive dole. The Commissioners should have power, when the citizens wish it, to relax the rule. There is another reason for my opposition—if the Bill is passed it will be a retrograde measure. Of late years we have been doing everything to give the people in localities a voice in the management of their own affairs, the control of enormous funds, and even of Imperial funds; yet on the question of charities, money left to a special locality, we propose to give the Commissioners sole charge. I desire that we should be consistent in the matter. Let us carry out the principle of letting the people manage their own affairs to the end. We certainly should not give the Commissioners further powers unless we provide that the people of the locality shall have a voice in the matter. It is no use framing schemes in which the people have no confidence. Whilst we have Local Representative Bodies, why should they be distrusted in such matters? Holding these views, I shall support the Amendment this the Bill be read a second time on this day six months, and I hope the House will not undo the great good which has been done by the passing of the Local Government Bill.

*(1.50.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): My hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone) rightly said this measure consists of two clauses taken from the Bill I had the honour to introduce in the years 1883 and 1884 on behalf of the then Government, and which in 1884 was sent to an important Committee, which unanimously recommended its provisions. My hon. Friend has done very wisely in confining the Bill to the two clauses, and in not entering into the more contentious matter contained in the original Bill. By so confining his measure, I think he will receive the almost unanimous support of the House. The hon. Member for Islington (Sir A. Rollit) has said the Bill is due to the ambition of the Charity Commissioners, and to the desire of that Body to centralise and increase their powers. That is certainly not the case. The Bill is due to the fact that successive Commissions and Committees, from 1835 onwards, have all been strongly in favour of giving the extended powers to the Charity Commissioners which the Bill proposes, for the purpose of putting an end to the serious scandals which exist. In 1835 there was a Committee of the House of Commons, on which Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell served, and which recommended that the very provisions before the House should be adopted; and the same provisions were included in the Bills of 1853 and 1860, and also in the Bills which were introduced by Lord Cairns and Lord Selborne in the other House, and in the Bill of 1884. The hon. Member for Islington went on to say that no cause for the Bill has been shown. If hon.

Members will refer to the Report of the Committee of 1884 they will find innumerable cases of the grossest mal-administration of charities and of abuse quoted by Sir Henry Longley and other gentlemen. Let me mention one case—that of Tewkesbury. There were a number of Bodies of Trustees in Tewkesbury with a total income of £1,300 a year. £700 of this sum was devoted to doles of money to the poor, though everyone knows that doles of money only do mischief to the class of people to whom they are given. In 1879, at the instance of the Chairman of the Board of Guardians and others, an inquiry was held by the Charity Commissioners, which resulted in the framing of a scheme for amalgamating the various Bodies of Trustees. The Trustees of two of the charities refused to give their consent, and they have continued to distribute money to the infinite mischief of the poor of the town. Then there is the case of Brown's Hospital at Stamford, which has an income of £1,200 a year. Only 12 almspeople are maintained; but there is a warder with a salary of £375 a year, and another official, a confrater, with a salary of £200 a year. A few years ago, in consequence of the depression of agriculture, the income of the charity fell off, and the Trustees found themselves unable to maintain even their 12 almspeople. The Charity Commissioners interfered, and urged the Trustees to reduce the expenses of management, and to do away with one or other of the expensive officers. But the Trustees declined to act on the advice of the Charity Commissioners, and actually, at the very moment that the rents were not sufficient to maintain the almspeople, they appointed a new confrater at a salary £200 a year. At present such charities cannot be reformed except with the consent of the majority of the Trustees. The Committee of 1884, on which there were many important Members of the House, unanimously came to the conclusion that the evils ought to be redressed in the manner proposed by the Bill. The hon. Member for Islington has pointed out some objections to the Bill in matters of detail, and has said that the measure itself will not even carry out the views of the Committee of 1884. I think I shall be able to show that the hon. Member is wrong in all the three cases he referred to. His first objection was that there would be no appeal to the Court of Chancery under the Bill. I think he is altogether wrong. It is quite true there is no clause in the measure conferring an appeal, but an appeal exists under the present law, and as it is not repealed by the Bill it will continue to be in force. If that is not so, it is a difficulty which can easily be remedied. The hon. Member next stated that although the Bill sanctions changes in a proposed scheme there is no provision to require any change to be laid before Parliament. I think my hon. Friend is wrong also in that respect. The Bill gives the Charity Commissioners no power whatever to frame schemes diverting the funds of a charity to any greater extent than is now permitted under the cy près doctrine of the Courts of Law. There was a clause to that effect in the Bill of 1884, and it was provided that in such cases the schemes sanctioned by the Charity Commissioners should be laid before Parliament. But the present Bill gives no such power, and therefore it does not seem necessary to require that the schemes sanctioned by the Charity Commissioners should come before Parliament. Thirdly, my hon. Friend said that there is no provision in the Bill requiring the Charity Commissioners to consult the Local Authorities. Now I, myself, hold that it is of the greatest importance that there should be a consultation with the Local Authorities, and I entirely agree with everything my hon. Friend said on that point. Especially since the constitution of County Councils I think it is most desirable that they should be consulted in cases of this kind; but I am bound to say that action has already been taken upon the recommendation of the Committee of 1884; and I am assured by the Charity Commissioners that in all cases the circumstances are laid before the Local Authorities and their views obtained. If my hon. Friend desires to go a little further, and to make it obligatory by statute that all the circumstances should be laid before the Local Authorities I have no objection, and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone) would not object to such an amendment of the Bill if it is considered necessary. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington based a large part of his objections upon the Bill, on what he said was the growing dissatisfaction of the public with the schemes of the Charity Commissioners, so far as they have hitherto gone. Now, I think that the state of this House does not bear out that contention. Compared with what the feeling was five, 10, or 15 years ago, I cannot but think that there is a growing feeling of content and confidence in the schemes and general administration of the Charity Commissioners which is very different from what it was in former days. There has been a growing satisfaction with the conclusions of the Commissioners; and although there may be individual cases in which the Charity Commissioners have come in conflict with particular bodies of Trustees, and even with the public opinion of a locality, yet, on the whole, the administration of the important work confided to them, and the framing of schemes under the Endowed Schools Act and the Charitable Trusts Act, has given satisfaction and contentment to the public. Allow me to remind the House that in respect of two very large classes of charities the law, within the last two years, has conceded to the Commissioners powers as wide, if not wider, than those proposed by this Bill. The whole of the charities known as endowed schools have been specially treated under the Endowed Schools Act, and the Charity Commissioners have received powers greater than those which are proposed to be conferred upon them by this Bill. There is another group of charities which have been specially dealt with by Parliament. I refer to such charities as that known as the City of London Parochial Charity, which has an income of between £50,000 and £60,000 a year. Under that Act the Commissioners have power to frame schemes for dealing with this charity and even to divert the proceeds from the people of London for whose benefit they were originally intended by the founders, as well as to make enormous changes in the management and distribution of the charities. Under this Act the Charity Commissioners have framed a scheme, which is now before Parliament, of a very wide and extensive character. If, then, the Charity Commissioners can be entrusted with the administration of schemes of such an important nature I cannot understand why they should not be also empowered to deal with other charities as proposed by this Bill. Having given great attention to the subject and having been a member of the Committee before whom Sir Henry Longley was examined and cross-examined at greater length than probably any other public officer was examined before, and having considered every objection that can be urged against the present measure, I venture to think that it is one that ought to commend itself to the House, and which, if carried into law, will be efficacious in putting an end to the grave abuse and mis-management of these charities which have been witnessed in the past and will result in these charitable endowments being really devoted to the purposes for which they were intended instead of being wasted and misapplied.

(2.30.) SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): I had the honour of serving six years ago upon the Select Committee to whom this question was referred, and I fully concurred in the Report which that Committee presented. I therefore felt that I could not refuse the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvonshire that I should come forward on the present occasion in support of his Bill which embodies one of the principal recommendations of the Committee. It seems to me that the case which has been adduced in regard to it is clear, that the existing law calls for further amendment, and that some such provision as is embodied in the Bill should be passed in order to enable so serious a matter to be dealt with. The measure is one of a very simple character extending only to the action already taken by Parliament, and I do not think it is likely to arouse any very serious objection. I was much astonished to hear the description of the Bill which was given by my hon. Friend the Member for South Islington, and the fearful consequences which may result from its adoption. He described it as a retrograde measure of centralisation. He drew a picture of the Charity Commissioners having power to entirely ignore the wishes of the founders and to make changes in their bequests without regard to the opinions of the Local Authorities or any other person whatever. He spoke of Trustees being appointed by the Charity Commissioners entirely contrary to the wishes of the district; of their being persons simply appointed for the purpose of carrying out a geographical system of centralised Local Government. I confess that if I had anticipated such consequences, I should have been one of the last to support the Bill. It is very clear from the evidence before the Committee of Sir Henry Longley, that in the larger charities, as well as in the smaller ones, the Commissioners must be guided by what is called the cy près doctrine. No doubt the Commissioners would be bound under this Bill, as they already are, if they thought a scheme ought to be departed from, to come to Parliament and ask for power to alter it. But it is altogether contrary to the experience of the past to suggest that if the Commissioners are entrusted with large powers they will be induced to ignore the will of the founder and to prescribe objectionable conditions. It is complained that the Bill only deals with a small part of the subject; but it must be borne in mind that larger measures have been introduced, and that it has been found practically impossible to carry them. It has, therefore, been thought better to take one step at a time, and to bring forward a simple Bill to enlarge the powers of the Charity Commissioners. I cannot conceive, should the necessity arise, that there can be any difficulty in introducing clauses into the Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Committee of 1884. The evidence of Sir Henry Longley was to the effect that the Charity Commissioners would always regard the assistance of Local Bodies as of the highest importance to them. But the House will remember that at the time the Committee sat, although the constitution of a good representative Local Authority had been much talked of, it did not seem to be likely to be created. Circumstances are different now; by the action of Her Majesty's Government, a representative Local Government has been constituted, and I have no doubt that the Commissioners would now regard with the highest satisfaction the assistance they would derive from the new Local Bodies both in suggesting the details of schemes and also in supplying the names of local men who would be inclined to act as Trustees. Therefore, I believe that the idea of the Local Authorities being over-ridden by any action from Whitehall is purely imaginary. I altogether disagree with the view which has been expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich (Mr. Hoare), that the administration of the Charity Commissioners is becoming unpopular and requires to be held in check. Having served on the Committee, I think I am entitled to say that the complaints against their administration of the local charities were very few, although they had at that time made between 8,000 and 9,000 orders and carried into law something like 1,000 schemes. Those schemes were not dealt with because they wished to interfere unnecessarily with local matters, but almost all of them were brought before them at the instance of the Trustees themselves. I trust that the Bill will pass without opposition after the assurances which have been given by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) and the assurance which I am also ready to give on behalf of the Committee which sat in 1884, that we should be quite ready to see the other recommendations of that Committee embodied in the measure.

*(2.40.) Mr. LENG (Dundee): I intend to support the Second Reading of the Bill, but I should not have risen to address the House except for one of the cases to which reference has been made. I went down to Hull a fortnight ago to attend a meeting of the old boys of the Hull Grammar School, and I found that there existed a strong feeling in connection with the scheme for the town that the Charity Trustees had not been properly treated by the Charity Commissioners; that, as a matter of fact, they had been used as puppets; that they had been misled, and that, to a certain extent, a breach of faith had been committed in the way in which the Commissioners had dealt with the scheme. The Commissioners themselves sanctioned the sale of the old school. They sent down an Assistant Commissioner or Inspector to survey the site of the new school; they approved the plans of the new school; they issued a formal order setting this forth, and they further insisted that the surplus of the money left over from the sale of the old school should be handed over to the Official Trustees. It was only after all this had been done that they intimated they would not allow the building of the new school to be proceeded with unless an endowment were provided for it. I put a question to the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) upon this subject the other day, and the answer which I received is not regarded by the Charity Trustees or those interested in the Hull Grammar School as satisfactory. The hon. Member alluded to the fact of there being a competition with the existing Grammar School as one reason why the Commissioners should be cautious how they acted; but the fact is, that notwithstanding that competition during the comparatively short time the present head master of the Hull Grammar School has had the management of the school, the number of scholars has increased from 39 to 190, and there is every prospect of a much larger increase if a proper building is provided. The hon. Gentleman further mentioned a bequest by the late Dr. Hymer of the sum of £50,000 for another school, but that could not have had any influence upon the decision of the Commissioners because the knowledge that such a bequest had been made came subsequent to their decision not to allow the scheme to be proceeded with. While I intend to support the Second Reading of the Bill, I must say that I think the Charity Commissioners, in their dealings with Local Bodies, should in all respects act with good faith and not in a manner to cause Local Trustees to lose a proper sense of self-respect and to feel themselves degraded. In the particular instance I have referred to they feel that advantage was taken of them. Their proceedings were approved and sanctioned at every stage until the money was sent to London, and then they were told, "We have approved of your plans, but we have now got the money and will not allow you to go on."

The public feeling is rather in favour of decentralisation than of centralisation; and if the Local Authorities find they are improperly treated, there will be such a strong feeling aroused against the Charity Commissioners as will demand a sweeping decrease of their power. I would, therefore, recommend the Commissioners to act in future so as to carry with them the confidence of the Local Authorities rather than to induce the Local Authorities to feel that they are snubbed and treated with contempt and disrespect.

*(250.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston):

This is a very short Bill, but its adoption would bring about an enormous extension of the powers of the Charity Commissioners. This extension is concerned with two things, which in their nature are separate and distinct, namely, cases in which the Trustees are alone in fault, and those in which the objects of the Trust are obsolete. Several instances have been mentioned in justification of the Bill, in which it is alleged that Charitable Trusts have been abused. In many of those cases the chief defects arose from the want of an efficient body of Trustees. And if a satisfactory set of Trustees could have been formed there would have been little difficulty in settling the application of the Charity. In such cases what seems to be wanted is a more limited power of dealing with the constitution of the Trusts, so as to leave the actual administration in the hands of a properly constituted body of Trustees. Reference has been made to the case of Stamford, where there has been a gross misapplication of the funds of a charity; but it appears to me that the existing law ought to be strong enough to deal with so strong a case as is described, and, if not, there is nothing to show that the charity funds could not, in the hands of a re-constituted body of Trustees, be applied to the purposes for which they were intended. It appears to me that the present Bill will frequently go beyond the necessities of the case, and I do not think it ought to be accepted without some further guarantees than the measure now contains, that the limitations proposed by the Committee of 1884 to be applied to an extension of the powers of the Charity Commissioners will be adopted. That Committee had regard to the danger of an alteration in the destination of the Trust Fund. Hitherto, cases have constantly occurred where the original destination of the Trust Fund has been entirely altered and something very like confiscation has resulted, especially in the case of Trusts which are known as doles. Funds bequeathed for doles have often been appropriated to a class of persons who were certainly not intended to receive them by the founder.

(3.0.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): As representing an agricultural Division in which the average rate of wages among the people is 12s. a week, and 6d. a considerable question, I, on behalf of my constituents, oppose the Second Reading of the Bill. Many are the communications I have received from labouring men expressing the strongest antagonism to the action of the Charity Commission, to whom they attribute the waste or diversion of endowments intended for the benefit of the labouring classes, but devoted to objects with which that class have no concern, or to which their interests are diametrically opposed. There are certain villages in Essex where the popular feeling is so strong that if a Charity Commissioner appeared there I should not like to have to answer for his safety. Last Session I put a notice of Motion on the Paper in reference to a reduction of the Vote for the salaries of the Commissioners in regard to a most flagrant case of maladministration in Essex, where the charity was so disposed of by the Commissioners that the labourers for whom it was designed got absolutely nothing out of it; a certain amount was set apart for building, a certain amount for books, a certain amount for the schoolmistress, and between these various stools the labourers came to the ground. There was also another case in a village a few miles from where I live, where the labourers were left out of the benefit of the fund of which they should, under the Trust, have been the beneficiaries. I would suggest to the House if the Charity Commissioners so act in the green leaf, how will they act in the dry? If they can do these things with their comparatively limited powers, what are they likely to do with much larger powers at their disposal? I hope the House will not put this extra straw on the back of the overlaid agricultural labourer. So far am I from wishing to give these Commissioners an enlarged field of action that I should like to see the disendowment of the office at Whitehall.

(3.5.) MR. COLMAN (Norwich): I shall support the Amendment before the House. There are proposals in the Bill with which most of us would agree thoroughly. I hold the view that there are many charities that need a considerable amount of overhauling, and that the funds might be turned to much better uses than those to which they are now devoted. But the question is, are we prepared to give these increased powers to the Charity Commission? and to this I, as one who has had experience of the Commissioners, say I am not prepared to give these powers unless coupled with safeguards such as I do not find in the clauses of this Bill. My hon. Colleague in the representation of Norwich has referred to some discussion—or dispute, perhaps, it should rather be called—which my constituents have had with the Commissioners, and he said the Commissioners had no doubt performed their duty with ability and with honesty. I will not dispute that statement, but I wish the Commissioners would give some indication of an appreciation of the probability that Trustees and Public Bodies may also have some amount—I will not say of ability—but, at any rate, of common sense and honesty in the administration of funds placed at their disposal. It has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) that a good deal of mischief is done by the distribution of doles to the poor, and I frankly admit that to be so; but I am bound to say that the rule the Charity Commissioners now proceed to lay down, and which they say they are compelled to lay down, although that may be a matter of dispute, as to the receipt of Poor Law relief disqualifying the recipient from the receipt of charity, is as injurious as the distribution of money. I am brought to the conclusion that matters of this kind should be left to the discretion of the Trustees. But our complaint is that the Commissioners will permit no local discretion; they lay down a hard and fast line. I maintain that we who are on the spot, and well acquainted, can form and exercise a better judgment on matters of detail relating to a Trust than can these Commissioners sitting in London. I feel that there is a good deal that is desirable in the Bill, and I wish that the promoters had laid down directions to the Commissioners to leave more to the discretion of Trustees. In my experience the men who occupy the position of Trustees are most capable men, who discharge the duties entrusted to them with impartiality and ability. They might well be allowed more discretion than the Commissioners are disposed to grant, and I feel that I should not be justified in supporting a proposal to confer these increased powers on the Commissioners.

(3.12.) MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The discussion has travelled over a great deal of ground; and as the Charity Commissioners, whom I have the honour to represent in this House, have been severely attacked upon numerous points, I am afraid I shall have to occupy the time of the House for some little space in replying in detail to the various attacks made on the administration of the Commission. First, perhaps, I had better take the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for South Islington (Sir A. Rollit). His chief ground of complaint against the Commissioners, and upon which he based his argument against the extension of their powers, was that they did not put in force the powers which they have; his complaint is that they have omitted to do the things they ought to have done, not that they have done the things they ought not to have done. I confess that does not seem to me a very valid argument against extending the powers of the Commission. The hon. Member also made one or two slight slips in which, perhaps, he will allow me to correct him. First, he said the Commission had an ambition towards centralisation, and that from time to time we brought in Bills to extend our own powers. Now that is absolutely inaccurate. The Commissioners have never brought in a Bill of their own. Governments of the day have, from time to time, brought in Bills—Members of the Party opposite have done so—to extend the scope of the Commission, but the Commissioners themselves have never taken the initiative in such matters. The hon. Member said that the original jurisdiction was limited to charities of £30, and then it was raised to £50, and that now it was sought to withdraw the limitation altogether. In that he was also inaccurate. The limitation of £30 was a limitation placed upon the County Court, and if my hon. Friend will refer to the 32nd section of the Charitable Trusts Act of 1853, he will find that the limitation is upon the action of the County Court, not on the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners at all. In the Act of 1860 the jurisdiction of the Commission was limited to charities of incomes of £50. Remarks have been made as to how that limitation got into the Act, and I think, as being pertinent to that, I might quote the evidence of Mr. Lowe (Lord Sherbrooke), who introduced that Act, and who gave evidence before the Schools Inquiry Commission. He said—

“There are several matters which ought to be extended, because they were concessions made greatly against my Bill of 1860. In the first place Section 4 provides that the Charity Commission shall have no jurisdiction over any charity whatever, except by consent, which has above £50 a year. I would repeal that clause. The jurisdiction of the Charity Commission, after all, is not a contentious jurisdiction; it is not in the nature of a trial or a law-suit, but an administrative and ancillary jurisdiction, and is worked mainly on that footing.”

That is the only light I can throw on the limitation of £50. Hon. Members have criticised the Commission in various ways, and it is right to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford that, as no doubt he is well aware, criticisms were brought to a head upon the introduction of the Bill of 1883. The Bill of 1883 proposed to extend the powers of the Charity Commission, and was referred to a Select Committee of which the right hon. Gentleman was Chairman. That Committee inquired at great length, at enormous length, into the whole administration of the Commission, and the complaints which were made against the action of the Commission were brought before that Committee and thoroughly sifted. The taking of evidence lasted through one if not more than one Session, and in the final Report, agreed upon, I think, almost unanimously, the action of the Commission was completely vindicated. I think I need only read one paragraph from the Report to prove that—

“Your Committee, after reviewing the conduct and policy of the Charity Commission in the administration of the powers already conferred upon them by ‘The Charitable Trusts Act,’ and having investigated matters in complaint, are of opinion that the Commissioners have exercised their powers with discretion and sound policy and in a way to cause no greater friction than might have been expected from an administrative body exercising very ample powers of a judicial character, in which they were brought into conflict with a great variety of local bodies with divergent interests and views.”

Then, in the last paragraph, they say—

“We think it right to say that the evidence laid before us, so far as it goes, shows that the charges made against the Commissioners of hostility to labourers and of a disposition to support Trustees in not letting land, or in demanding unreasonable terms, appear to have been made under a misapprehension of the intention and actions of the Commissioners.”

Well, up to that time the charges were fully inquired into; and, in relation to those charges, the conduct of the Commissioners was, I submit, amply, fully vindicated. And now the question comes, has anything occurred since 1884 on which to base fresh charges against the Commissioners? I think my hon. Friend the Member for South Islington pointed to the fact that there have been constant Debates in the House, growing more and more constant in relation to schemes framed by the Endowed Schools' Branch of the Commission. Granting this has been the case, what has been the verdict of the House on these various occasions? I believe since 1884 there has been only one case in which the action of the Charity Commissioners has not been supported by Parliament—there may be two cases—I have only in mind the case of West Lavington. With one exception, or at most two, the action and the schemes of the Commission have been supported by Parliament, and in the great majority of cases where discussions have occurred here, or in another place, these educational schemes have received the emphatic sanction of Parliament. Therefore, so far as this objection of the hon. Member goes, I think we can plead the approval of Parliament of the policy we have been carrying out in this respect. I might also remind the House that it is only exceptional cases that come before the House at all, and that a great many of the schemes framed under the Endowed Schools Act, when they go to the Education Department, receive the assent of that Department, and do not come upon the Table of this House at all; they are approved in the neighbourhood and approved by the Education Department, and go through, as a matter of course. It is only in a very few exceptional cases that the schemes of the Charity Commission come under the ken of this House at all, and so far the work of the Commission is successfully done. Then, my hon. Friend the Member for South Islington has condemned the idea of the absolute control of all charities coming into the hands of the Charity Commission. Why, when Trustees agree, or where a majority of Trustees agree now to make application to the Charity Commission, the “absolute control,” to quote my hon. Friend's words of all charities is in the hands of the Commissioners at the present moment. Let me further point out this, that when the majority of Trustees do not agree to appeal to the Charity Commission, the Court of Chancery has absolute control. But the reason why hon. Members have introduced this Bill is, that it has been shown that enormous costs are, from time to time, incurred in framing schemes by the Court of Chancery for carrying out the ordinary administrative law of Chancery, which could be carried through at very slight expense, almost nominal expense if the Trustees would come to the Charity Commission. Then I think those who have opposed this Bill have fallen into the error of supposing that the Commissioners would have unrestricted power to deal with all charities in any way they please. No such thing could possibly occur. The Charity Commission is practically a branch of the Court of Chancery. It is bound by the decision of the Court just as much as a County Court, or Court of first instance, is bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal or of the House of Lords. We are bound to follow the decision of the Court, we are bound to follow the ordinary law, and we are bound also to follow the cy près doctrine, which my hon. Friend knows well we cannot go beyond, even if we wished to do so. Therefore, to assume that it would be possible under the enlarged powers of the Bill to go beyond the cy près doctrine, is to assume an utter impossibility; we should be bound still to follow that doctrine, and could not divert charities from one to a totally different and inconsistent purpose. Then, again—the point has been made clear, but I am not quite sure whether my hon. Friend is convinced—he took exception to the Bill because it contains no provision permitting an appeal from the Charity Commission to the Court of Chancery. I think such a provision is unnecessary, for this appeal exists now from every act of the Commissioners. If the Commissioners make some act, or do something contrary to the law, or which is beyond their statutory powers, a full appeal exists at the present time to the Court of Chancery. I say—it is matter rather of construction by lawyers than for discussion in this House—that this appeal will equally exist under any other Act, unless by that Act it is specially excluded, and, as in this Bill it is not specially excluded, I submit the power of appeal still remains, whether the powers of the Commission are enlarged or not. Then my hon. Friend, as did also the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Leng), turned to a special case, that of the Grammar School at Hull. That case, curiously enough, is not dealt with at all under the “Charitable Trusts Act,” but under the Endowed Schools Branch of the Charity Commission, and is, therefore, hardly a case in point, hardly germane to the argument just now, which is as to extending the Charitable Trusts powers of the Commission. The facts in regard to the Grammar School at Hull, so far as I can gather them, are these—the Charity Commissioners were led to believe that a large endowment in Hull might be made available for educational purposes, and, upon that understanding, the Commissioners agreed with the Trustees to go forward with the proposed alteration of the Grammar School, and, with this understanding, agreed to the purchase of a site, and approved the plans submitted to them. It then turned out that the Charity Commissioners had been—I will not say misled—had been induced to take a wrong estimate of the amount of opposition which was likely to be raised in the town of Hull, and they found that the opposition was very great to their taking this particular endowment, and using it in this particular way. Thereupon the Commissioners said they were unable to allow the Trustees to go forward with their scheme, because they did not believe a school, the endowment of which was going to be entirely sunk in bricks and mortar, could be started with the probability of success. My hon. Friend has pointed to the very wise action of the Local Trustees, but it turned out, on investigation of accounts, that the Trustees of this Charity had spent no less than £600 out of capital in keeping the school going, and I say if my hon. Friend had wanted to bring a case to convince the House of the desirability of a Central Department of some sort, having an eye to the management of the corpus, he could not have found a better one.

*SIR ALBERT ROLLIT: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend, but I think he should have added that this sum was spent to provide temporary premises, without which the school could not possibly be conducted.

MR. LENG: It was in 1875 that the suggestion was made that £10,000 should be taken from Alderman Jennings' endowment, but the order of the Commissioners is dated August 10th, 1883.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: That may be good ground for the complaint of delay; but I do not think it answers what I have said, that the Charity Commission were led to believe that the endowment might be employed for advancing the interest of the Grammar School, that it was not until the order was made that opposition sprang up, and they were obliged to drop the matter. My hon.

Friend treats the matter as if the Charity Commission were animated with a desire to deprive the inhabitants of Hull of the benefit of the Grammar School; but nothing can be farther from the actual facts of the case. If the Commissioners can see their way to start the school with any chance of success with an endowment, I am sure they will be only too glad to advance the matter as rapidly as possible; but when they come to consider that there already exist very considerable educational appointments in Hull, and that, as the hon. Member said, quite recently no less than £50,000 under a bequest became available for educational advancement similar to that provided by the Grammar School, then I say it would be a very unwise proceeding to allow this Grammar School to be re-organised on a large scale, and tying up the whole of the endowment in site and building. I am sorry to have detained the House so long over a minor matter; but as two hon. Members had dwelt upon it, I was obliged to go into this. The chief burden of my hon. Friend's remarks were strongly against centralisation. His arguments might, 40 years ago, have been used with force against the Charitable Trusts Bill of 1853; but the House has accepted the central control, and it has been found to work beneficially, saving thousands and thousands of pounds which otherwise would have been wasted and lost. Then my hon. Friend complained of the administrative control exercised by the Commission; but let me point out that Trustees go on administering the schemes; it is only the corpus of the property which we are specially concerned to preserve. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich has objected to the Bill on various grounds, the chief of which was that the action of the Charity Commissioners was not sufficiently made known to the poor in the several districts affected. I quite agree that that is a matter of great importance; but I will put it to him, in what way can we bring home to the poor the knowledge that these matters are going forward? To advertise in every newspaper circulating in the town or county affected would cost an enormous lot of money, and would in many instances swallow up a great part of the funds of the charity. I have already stated that if a County Council will pass a resolution once for all that they wish to have copies of all schemes applicable to their district the Commissioners will be prepared to accede to that resolution. At the present time the Commissioners forward to every Municipal Council a copy of every scheme which in any way affects the town represented by that body; and this circumstance, in addition to what I have said about the County Councils, goes far to meet the objection of the hon. Member. I hold, too, it would be very much to the advantage of the Charity Commissioners to have a Local Body to deal with. At present it is rather difficult to gauge public feeling. We have, I may say, adopted some of the recommendations made by the Committee of 1884, one of which was that where the Commission were dealing with a charity within the limits of a Municipal Corporation notice should be given to that Corporation of any scheme affecting the charity, and that, if thought desirable, a public inquiry should be held before any scheme is finally settled. That course has been pursued since 1884. In regard to another point raised by the hon. Gentleman, I may observe that it has been laid down by the Courts of Law that, as a rule, persons in receipt of parochial relief are not entitled to the benefit of a charity intended for the poor. This rule is well-established, although it has sometimes been followed with reluctance. A great many people follow the law with reluctance; but nothing can be clearer than that that is the law, and the Commissioners would transgress their powers if they went outside that well-established rule of law. It may be that they are among the people who have followed this particular law with reluctance; but certainly we could not undertake to over-rule such high authorities as Lord Eldon and the late Master of the Rolls. My hon. Friend looks forward to the day when Local Bodies are going to have a good deal more to do with the charities than they possess at present, and when they will perhaps take over the powers of the Charity Commissioners. Then, why not make those powers complete now? My hon. Friend the Member for Preston raised some points with regard to this Bill which deserve notice. He says that many of these matters could be easily dealt with if the Body of Trustees were re-constituted. That is the great difficulty the Commissioners have, for unless the majority of the Trustees make application we cannot re-constitute them. In fact, that is one of the points with regard to which the greatest reluctance is shown, because the Trustees are not prepared to have the representative element introduced into their body. This House has, from time to time, laid it down that it is desirable to introduce the representative element on the Governing Body of Trustees; but many of the Trustees greatly object to it, and will not make the application which is necessary before we can re-constitute them. Then the hon. Member asked me about the 3rd clause of the Bill, and said power would be given to the Commissioners to over-rule Acts of Parliament. The object of the clause is simply to save Trustees the enormous expense and the great delay in getting a private Bill passed. It is now necessary to get a private Act of Parliament passed even for trivial matters of administration; and the Bill simply asks that we shall have the same power to deal with charities constituted under an Act of Parliament as we have for dealing with charities constituted by schemes of the Court of Chancery or of the Charity Commissioners themselves. The hon. Member for South Essex is very anxious to disestablish and disendow the Commissioners, because he says they propounded a scheme for the administration of a charity in Essex by which the funds were grossly mismanaged. The truth is that that particular scheme was not framed by the Charity Commissioners at all, but by the Court of Chancery. Reference has been made to scandals in charity administration which are calling loudly to be set right, and comments have been made as if every charity over £50 is badly administered, and every charity under that limit is well administered. A great many of the large charities are admirably administered, but there are some charities with large incomes that are very badly administered; and it is in order to bring these within the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners that the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire has promoted the present Bill. There are three points in regard to which the powers of the Commissioners will be enlarged. In the first place, there is the appointment of Trustees. At present, when these appointments are made by the Charity Commissioners, the cost is about 10s. for the stamp and a few shillings for advertising; but if application is made to the Court of Chancery to make the appointment the cost is very heavy indeed. I can give illustrations to prove that. In the case of one charity, with an income of £85 a year, it cost exactly £32 to get new Trustees appointed; and the cost in the case of another charity, with an income of £420, was £75. Then, as to the endowment of St. Luke's, Middlesex, the amount of which is £530. In order to get an apportionment between the eleemosynary and educational parts of the charity, and to get new Trustees appointed, application was made to the Court at an expense of £475; yet this would have been done by the Charity Commissioners for a nominal sum. The appointment of Trustees is made by the Charity Commissioners after public notice and after receiving objections; but the Court makes the appointments without public notice and without receiving objections. Another most important point is that of vesting the funds in an Official Trustee. The hon. Member for Dundee seems to have a curious view of the duties of the Official Trustee, and he referred to the Charity Commissioners as chuckling and rubbing their hands over the fact of getting the money into their possession. But vesting the money with an Official Trustee means simply that the money is invested in his name, and he has nothing to do with its administration. The administration of the fund remains in the hands of the Trustees of the charity. Cases are numerous in which charities have been completely lost in consequence of not being invested in the name of some permanent Official Trustee. The Bank of England, for instance, knows nothing of the existence of the Trust; it only knows of the existence of the fund and the name of the man to whom the money is to be paid. The man dies; what is everybody's business is nobody's business; no one looks after the matter, and the consequence is that time after time charities lapse and every trace of them is lost. When the funds are invested in the name of an Official Trustee such things cannot happen. The greater part of the administration of the Charity Commissioners relates to the framing of schemes, and the cost when the scheme is made by them is very different from what it is when application is made to the Court of Chancery. Sylvester's Charity has an income of £800 a year. The Charity Commissioners asked the Trustees to make application to them for a scheme, but the Trustees refused. The Charity Commissioners certified the case to the Attorney General, who took it into the Court of Chancery. A scheme was made by the Court exactly in accordance with the views of the Charity Commissioners; it cost the charity £883, but might have been had for a mere trifle from the Charity Commissioners. It cannot be denied that the action of the Charity Commissioners has, on the whole, been beneficial and has saved large sums of money. If beneficial in the case of small charities, why deny to large charities the benefits of that action? Bills of this kind have been before the House from time to time, and in no case, as far as my memory serves me, have they been rejected, although they have been dropped from want of time. This House has not denied the principle that the aid of the Charity Commissioners should be given to large charities as well as small.

(3.55.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): As far as I am concerned, there is no attack intended to be made upon the Charity Commissioners by the proposal to reject this Bill. The question is, whether a system which deprives the poor and defenceless of the privileges and benefits which they have for ages enjoyed shall be not only maintained, but enlarged? Members of this House have to defend a class of people who are not only unable to defend themselves, but who have been deprived of benefits without knowing it until the mischief is done. I appeal to those who know the condition of the poor whether the time has not come for this House to provide greater securities, and to see that where the form of the benefits is changed the benefits themselves shall be secured to those for whom the givers of the benefits intended them. Those who know the results of the administration of the Charity Commissioners must be aware that the poorest and most helpless, and those least able to speak for themselves, have been the sufferers. It is not by piecemeal legislation that we ought to deal with such enormous sums of money. The Government, if they will undertake to provide a complete measure, will be doing good service. If it is in the power of Trustees to come to the Charity Commissioners as advisers and helpers there will be hundreds of applications; but the Charity Commissioners insist that the Trustees shall abolish themselves and hand over to them the whole of the Trust property to do what they please with it. The policy of the Charity Commissioners has been a complete barrier in hundreds of cases where the Trustees would gladly reform themselves; but they are not willing to hand over the funds of the charity to the Commissioners, who might deal with it in a manner which the locality did not desire or approve. Then it is said that they could not go beyond the cy près doctrine, but it is their view of what is within their powers which is hard on the poorer classes. It is true that there is an appeal to the Court of Chancery, but that is of no use to the poor man. We have been told that the Trustees appointed by the Charity Commissioners have full power of administration, on which point the hon. Member gave the House to understand that everything was put into the hands of the local Trustees to be carried out for the good of the neighbourhood; but what is the fact? As one who has been connected with the administration of one of the largest Foundations under the Charity Commissioners in my own neighbourhood, I can say it is true that we had the power to sweep the doorsteps or to decide upon some small matter connected with furniture, and scarcely that; but beyond this there was absolutely no power for us to do anything at all without the consent of two or three gentlemen sitting at Whitehall. It is humiliating to think that the local representatives of a city containing some 500,000 inhabitants should have to place themselves in communication with the Charity Commissioners about the smallest things they consider necessary in the management of the institution with which they were connected. The expense we have been put to, and the absurd positions in which we have been placed, would appear absolutely ridiculous to the House if I were to go into anything like detail. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford has brought forward a case or two in favour of the Charity Commissioners. Well, I may state that I was myself examined for three days before the Commissioners, and I believe that on that occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle was in the chair.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): No.

MR. J. COLLINGS: At any rate I am correct in saying that the right hon. Gentleman examined me.

MR. J. MORLEY: That is so.

MR. J. COLLINGS: On that occasion I gave evidence of cases of hardship, and I may add that I was under examination for some three or four days, during which time there was practically nothing in the testimony given beyond proof of such cases. I may add that that evidence has never been disputed. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford has taken credit for the Report in which that Committee absolved the Charity Commissioners from any charges as to the administration of the Allotments Act. If the right hon. Gentleman will look at the paragraph preceding the one to which he refers he will see that the Committee were at that time just at the end of their labours. Believing that they had not sufficient time to examine the allotments question thoroughly, they deferred reporting upon that until the next Session, and the Committee generally were of opinion that that point was so far settled; but there was another meeting at which only five members of the Committee were present, and on that occasion a paragraph was agreed to; and against that paragraph the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle then entered his protest. It was, in point of fact, a Report in itself, and that Report whitewashes the Charity Commissioners as to their action on the subject referred to. It is for that paragraph that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford takes credit; and I do not think that what was then done was a very creditable proceeding considering that the Committee generally had been led to believe that the matter was not to be reported on until the next Session. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne voted against that paragraph, as hon. Members will see if they refer to the Report. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford has stated that no cases of abuse were reported; but I think I shall be able to show, on the contrary, that there were many such cases. He also stated that doles of money given to the poor had a very damaging and pauperising effect. On that point I do not say that reforms are not wanting in the administration of those charities, and I only wish the Government would undertake to deal with the entire question in order to secure the necessary reforms. I would only ask one condition, which would be backed by every constituency in the Kingdom. It is that no system should be introduced that would interfere with, except in the sense of securing, the rights of the poorer class. This is practically the issue upon which we are now going to vote. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford has said that the Committee of 1884 were unanimously of opinion that the evils reported on should be redressed in the manner proposed by this Bill. I do not think that that is quite a fair statement of the fact, because the Committee in question has reported that those evils should be redressed by half a dozen provisions of a very important character. This Bill proposes to deal with one of those provisions which is in itself a most mischievous one, but which might be tolerated if surrounded by the safeguards suggested in the Committee's recommendations. We, however, are now asked to adopt the mischievous provision, and to leave out all the safeguards, without which, I venture to affirm, the Committee would not have made a unanimous proposal. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford says the Bill does not give greater powers to the Charity Commissioners than they now possess. That is quite true. But you wish to extend the powers the Commissioners exercise in regard to all the charities, in the face of the experience we have already had of the way in which they deal with charities of £50 and less. That is a very important proposition. The fact is that in the body called the Charity Commissioners—very estimable men in the discharge of their duties, but whose bad traditions have not been quite got rid of yet—there is one member who is all for endowed schools. I believe that under any circumstances, private or public, in which wealth might come to him, his first instinct would be to found an endowed school. For my own part, I am not against middle-class endowed schools; but I am decidedly against carving these schools out of the heritage of the poor.

MR. RATHBONE: This Bill does not deal with endowed schools at all.

MR. J. COLLINGS: Yes; but the things are so mixed that it is hardly possible to separate the two; for when we come to the 37th clause of the Endowed Schools Bill, which is a Charitable Trust Clause, it is impossible to avoid doing what almost every speaker has done, namely, mix up the two things and connect them with the Charity Commission. The hon. Member wanted to know what examples could be adduced of the way in which the poor were hardly dealt with. For my own part, I could keep this House, as I kept the Committee upstairs, for three days while detailing such cases; but I will spare the House that infliction, and will only touch a case or two. Take the case of a parish in Warwickshire, where, by an order of the Court of Chancery, the parish had possessed for 25 years a fund devoted to medical attendance for poor women in confinement, and for the supply of baby-linen; and here I would say, let no one minimise the importance of the supply of nurses and the necessary comforts to these poor people at such times. Then there were provisions for the supply of clothing, and free education, and for almshouses, and other things, all tending to show how the necessities of the poor were regarded. Well, what did the Commissioners do in that case? In the year 1879 they took

£15,000 from those poor people and spent it in the extension of an old grammar school. That, no doubt, was a very good thing in itself; but it certainly was not needed to the extent of the sum provided. However, I have not a word to say against it, except that the poor had this amount taken away from their charities, and applied to the purposes of middle class education. But as if this were not enough, there is a second scheme now hanging fire, for which I hope the Charity Commissioners will blush, and which I trust the House will never allow to pass, and that is, a scheme under which they propose to take another £17,000 for the purposes of a high school; so that should this proposal be carried the poor will be deprived of no less a sum than £32,000 in promotion of a scheme for the benefit of the children of the well-to-do class. Doubtless, high schools, both for boys and girls, are good things in themselves; but to carve them out of charities intended for the poor is a thing which I think we ought not to do, or even to admit the possibility of. It is said that they give a quid pro quo in the shape of scholarships, and such like advantages, to the poorer classes. I reply that that is no benefit at all; and on this point I would quote the remarks of a gentleman whose name is well known to most of us, the Rev. Canon Evans, for many years Head Master of the High School of Birmingham, and a great authority on this subject. This witness, when asked before the Committee whether these scholarships were of the use they were supposed to be to the poor children, said—

“ I have observed they are generally carried off by the children of rather well-to-do parents, that the charity funds are taken away from the poor, and that the educational advantages given in return are illusory. The poor feel that a very great wrong has been done to them.”

The witness proceeded to give instances in illustration of his statement. I might quote many cases showing that what Mr. Evans here states is perfectly true. I am sorry to have detained the House so long, but the question is to me one of the deepest interest. The powers the Charity Commissioners already possess are, I think, sufficient to carry us on until the Government can frame some comprehensive scheme for dealing with whatever difficulties exist. Every scheme ought to be laid on the Table of this House or before a Standing Committee of the House, similar to that which deals with the Inclosure Bills, and that Committee should examine the various schemes in order to see that the interests of all parties are fairly dealt with. Prior to the Act of Mr. Lowe, now Lord Sherbrooke, I think these schemes were laid upon the Table, and it was he who introduced the £50 limit, it being felt that some limit was required in order to save the rights of the poor. The House must not think that this is a small matter; because according to the Report of 1876 there were about 36,000 charities dealing with a sum amounting to upwards of £2,250,000 sterling. Of this sum there was just upon £200,000 for the medical charities, to which I attach great importance, and £646,000 for the free education of the poor. If you talk of free education to the Charity Commissioners it is like showing the proverbial red rag to the bull, because they have the idea that the Legislature, ever since 1870, has imposed the condition that they must not assist free education. They are dealing with enormous sums of money, and there is upwards of £1,000,000 sterling, which belongs to the poor in the shape of doles of money, alms-houses, articles of food and clothing, and so on, some of which ought to be kept sacred to the uses of the poor. What I wish now to suggest, is that we would rather have this Bill withdrawn, and that Her Majesty's Government should undertake to introduce a Bill of their own dealing with the entire question. If the Bill be not withdrawn under these circumstances, I trust the House will refuse its assent to the Second Reading. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford brought in a Bill far more important than this, although it contained a clause similar to the main provision of the present Bill; but the House felt that there was great danger of injustice in passing this measure, and for that reason it was sent to a Select Committee, which was the means of proving the existence of the dreaded evil. I am happy to inform the House that this is the last point I shall refer to.

What I want the Government to do in the interests of the poorer classes—for I respectfully suggest that that is the point at issue—is to determine that if we are to adopt one of the recommendations of the Committee we should adopt them all. We want the appointment of a Standing Committee of the House of Commons, as recommended by the Select Committee, to consider the different schemes; and here I am speaking of all schemes, and not merely those which are opposed, because I have known many schemes that have gone through Parliament without the poor people who have been affected by them knowing anything at all about their acceptance. We also want a provision under which the County Councils shall not only be made acquainted with the schemes which are proposed, but shall have the introduction of the schemes themselves; because we say that they are the authorities who can best understand the wants of the different localities. In regard to this point, the Select Committee is only following the strong recommendations of the Schools Inquiry Commission, which went most thoroughly into the matter, and which so valued the suggestion that the Local Authority should initiate schemes that they positively proposed to found Provincial Councils for the purpose. They say that some Provincial Authority should have power to acquire houses to be approved by the Sanitary Authority, to propose schemes for the creation of Trusts in regard to endowed schools, to sanction the expenditure of money on schools, to have charge of the sites and removals of schools, to sanction, vary, or consolidate the conditions, to hear appeals, to bring before the Charity Commissioners endowments for purposes other than education, and, if necessary, to propose schemes for their variation. Such were the recommendations in the Report of the Schools Inquiry Commission which was endorsed by the Select Committee on Charity Trusts. Therefore, I say, these are matters that should be dealt with in a general Bill. We have all the necessary machinery ready to our hands, and I think the action of the County Councils sufficiently shows a state of public spirit in regard to public matters that could not be found in any other country in the world. What, then, could we do better than entrust those bodies with the administration of all these schemes? With great deference to the Charity Commissioners, I contend that they cannot be expected to manage these matters so well as those who reside in, and are well acquainted with, the different localities. Let us take a case in which there is a proposal to divert the money belonging to a particular Trust from one use to another. The Charity Commissioners, in all probability, have never, during the whole course of their lives, set foot in the parish whose interests are affected; and it stands to reason that the representatives of the district are those who should initiate the scheme, and who, in so doing, would best study the wants of the poorer classes. When hon. Members say that doles to the poor are not proper things I should like them to go into our villages and see the God-forsaken look about some of them, and then tell us that a charity of even £50 a year is not likely to add to their comforts much more than if it were taken away and given to what is called a middle-class school. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford has said that these advantages have the effect of pauperising the poor. It is often said that if you give a poor man anything you pauperise him; but, on the other hand, if, in a wealthy town like Birmingham, a rich manufacturer gets £50 worth of education for his son out of a charity which does not always belong to him in exchange for a payment of £8 a year, that is not pauperising. It is only where the poor are benefited by a charity that pauperisation comes in! I am glad to find that of late there has been a reform in regard to the preparation of schemes by the Charity Commissioners, and that it is now becoming the practice to send those schemes down to the Local Authorities, in order that they may be enabled to express their views with regard to them. I myself recollect a case in which a notice was sent to a Town Council some time ago, and that notice was posted up on the Town Hall, and an advertisement inserted in the newspapers. We saw that it was proposed to put the management of a Trust in the hands of the Birmingham Town Council; but as it only went to the extent of electing managers rated at £60 a year, and as we had very high class working men in the Council, I myself moved that it be kicked out of the Council Chamber, and that was done. Who manages the Trust now I do not know, and, for my part, I feel no concern in the matter. I have now put before the House the arguments that occur to me why this Bill should be withdrawn; and I would appeal to my hon. Friend behind me to adopt that course, on the understanding that Her Majesty's Government will bring in a Bill dealing not only with his proposal, but also with all the safeguards for the interests of the poor which were recommended by the Select Committee and had the sanction of the largest Inquiry Commission that ever investigated the subject. This, I venture to say, would be a complete answer to those who are, or who fancy themselves to be, injured by the action of the Charity Commissioners; while it would have the effect of relieving the Commissioners themselves from work which they are not best fitted to do, and of giving them more time and opportunity for discharging the important functions they can perform better, perhaps, than any other body.

\(4.30.) THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes):* My hon. Friend who has just sat down has spoken upon the subject with all the intensity and warmth that the views to which he has frequently given expression entitle him to make use of in a Debate of this kind. We know he holds very strongly the views he has put before us to-day; and all I would ask him to believe is that those of us who are unable to endorse the statements he makes as to the Charity Commissioners, still desire equally with him that there should be a proper application of moneys left for the benefit of the poor. I do not think my hon. Friend has been quite justified in the description he has given of the issue before the House. He said the issue was that of justice on the one hand, and hardship of administration on the other. I would venture very respectfully to point out that the issue is rather between enabling the Charity Commissioners to deal with the charities, the funds of which are now being wasted on the one hand, and, on the other, delaying our decisions, with the result of allowing the present state of things to continue. My hon. Friend alluded to the finding of the Committee on Charitable Trusts respecting the question of allotments, and took exception to the fact that the paragraph at the conclusion of our Report was inserted at the last meeting when only five members were present. That is the case. But I should like to tell the House who the Members present were. If they had been exclusively gentlemen sitting on this side of the House, or gentlemen whose views were supposed to be opposed to the principle of allotments, I think that what my hon. Friend says would have had greater weight. The Members were:—The hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr Bryce), Sir T. D. Acland, who is well-known in this House as a friend of the great labouring cause and of the interests of the labourers; Mr. Davy, and my friend, Mr. Pell, who was formerly in this House, and who will not be accused of being an ultra Tory, or being opposed to the interests of the labourers. The opposition to the Resolution of the Committee was not formidable in numbers; but was, undoubtedly, formidable in quality and degree, because it consisted of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley). However, I think the names of the four gentlemen who voted for the paragraph are such as to justify the House in believing that it fairly represented the views of those who belong to the more advanced section of opinion on this subject. I would respectfully submit to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich (Mr. S. Hoare), and the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Collings), that the arguments they have advanced might be more suitably used in Committee than on the Second Reading of the Bill. I would remind the House that the Charity Commissioners were put on their trial before the Committee, who went exhaustively into the whole question, and the Commissioners came out absolutely with flying colours. The Committee reported that while undoubtedly there had been cases in which the Commissioners had erred, yet, in the main, their action had been wise and discreet, and that there had not been any greater friction than might necessarily have been expected considering the large, important, and difficult questions they had to deal with. I do not think the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Collings) can produce evidence of the hardship to which he has referred. He had abundant opportunities before the Committee, whose conclusions certainly do not justify any hostile condemnation of the Charity Commissioners, either on the ground of injustice to the poor or hardship to the labourers. The hon. Member asked that the Bill should be withdrawn, and that the Government should bring in another measure dealing with the whole question. Really, Sir, in view of the enormous amount of business now before the House, I think he must have been making a little joke.

MR. COLLINGS: I did not mean now.

*MR. LONG: Well, it would surely be better to take advantage of this opportunity of dealing with the question than to postpone all action for another year. It has been suggested that these schemes should be referred to the District Councils. I confess that, for my own part, I do not think it would be judicious to refer them to the District Councils. It is quite conceivable, and indeed almost probable, that there would be cases of charities affecting the inhabitants of several adjoining parishes; and it is also probable that in many cases these parishes would not be in the area of the same District Councils, and you might have the interests of the various Councils conflicting. Hon. Members know also that these questions of charities arouse an immense amount of feeling, so much so that it might be difficult to get a calm and deliberate judgment if those who had to settle them were themselves interested in them. There is, however, I think, a great deal to be said for the suggestion that the County Councils should have a voice in this matter. I would suggest that nothing has been said either by the Mover of the Second Reading or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) which would deter the House from introducing into the Bill such alterations as would give the County Councils statutory powers similar to those voluntarily given by the Charity Commissioners now. The Government are anxious to obtain the assistance of the Commissioners all over the country in dealing with these questions. The Charity Commissioners have informed the County Councils that if they would pass a general resolution expressing their desire that these schemes should be referred to them the Commissioners would agree to refer them to them. If hon. Members think it would be desirable that this should be made a statutory power, instead of being left to the discretion of the Charity Commissioners, the time for inserting such a provision in the Bill would be when the measure reaches the Committee stage. I, myself, should be glad to see such a provision adopted; and I think that, instead of wrecking the Bill at this stage, it would be far better to pass the Second Reading to-day, and put our heads together in Committee to see if we cannot make it a measure which will meet the wishes of all those who have the same object in view. Though I cannot endorse all that fell from my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Essex (Major Rasch), as to the feeling of the labourers on this question, I know there is frequently strong feeling in the country districts as to the action of the Charity Commissioners. I do not agree with my hon. and gallant Friend that there would be any danger to the lives of the Commissioners if they went down to make inquiries. They might hear some home truths; but, at all events in Wiltshire, their lives and limbs would be safe. I think it is only due to the Charity Commissioners to say that, whether we approve of all they have done or not, we must admit that considering the vastness of the work they have had to do they have done it well, and that they have acted on the whole justly and fairly. So far as the Government are concerned, we shall be prepared to welcome such an alteration with regard to the County Councils as has been indicated by one or two hon. Members.

(4.17.) MR. GROTRIAN (Hull, East): The speech to which we have just listened no doubt disarms, to a certain extent, a great deal of the criticism to which the Bill has been subjected. The question to my mind is, however, whether, when the Bill reaches Committee, we can so alter it as to meet some of the great objections which have been urged against it. I am afraid that in Committee it will not be held to be in order to carry out some of the Select Committees' recommendations. The Committee expressed the opinion that Municipal and Representative County Authorities are the best authorities to initiate schemes under which endowed charities of a district may be acquired; but that it should be left to the Charity Commission to see that the schemes are in proper form and in accordance with the law, and the exercise of a general control over the provisions contained in them. That is what I should like to see carried out in this Bill. The initiation of schemes, to my mind, should be left to the Representative Bodies, and not to the Charity Commissioners. It has been stated to-day that this Bill has no reference to, and can have no effect upon, schools which are dealt with under the Endowed Schools Act; but, in my experience, somehow these questions do seem to be mixed up. A case has been referred to once or twice which took place in Hull—a scheme for the endowment of a Grammar School for the promotion of middle-class education. It was in that case attempted to divert the funds from the Ferris' Charity, and though I wish well to the Hull Grammar School, I am exceedingly glad that the scheme was not carried out, as it would have been a distinct departure from the objects and wishes of the Founder, and an injury to the poor and needy of Hull. The question in my mind is the course I shall take on the Bill. I am anxious to see the main principle carried out; but I am in doubt whether, if this Bill is passed, an opportunity will not be lost of passing a better one for carrying out the recommendations of the Committees. In my vote I shall be much influenced by what the Representative of the Government says on the two points I have raised.

ley Division, that this is not a complete measure, and that it is difficult to vote for it in its present shape. Still, I am not prepared to vote against a Bill which is based, so far as it goes, on an excellent principle. It is said that Amendments extending its scope in the direction indicated will be out of order in Committee. I am not prepared to accept that view; but this difficulty, if it exists at all, can be met by an Instruction to the Committee, and I trust that Her Majesty's Government will undertake to move such an Instruction, if necessary, and that they will also agree to send the Bill to the Standing Committee on Law.

*(4.56.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): Perhaps even at this late hour the House will allow me to say a word or two on this question, seeing that I had the honour of being a Member of the Committee of 1887. It was my intention earlier in the day to have voted against the Bill; but as I have heard speeches containing attacks on the Commissioners, a body for whom I entertain the highest respect, which I believe to be unjust, in vindication of that body I shall vote for the Bill. It was said before the Committee of 1887 that the poor were excluded from the benefit of the charities. An inquiry was made into that subject during two years, and the result was the justification of the action of the Commissioners. The evidence showed that out of 3,989 scholarships formed under the schemes 1,145 were gained by scholars at elementary schools, and it was proved that the proportion of the children of the working classes who were obtaining them was increasing. The Committee reported that the Commissioners desired to do justice to the class for whom the charity was originally intended. The Bill is certainly incomplete, as it does not contain clauses carrying out the recommendations of the Committees of 1884 and 1887; but I see no reason why, at a later stage, that should not be rectified. I believe the Bill contains the elements of wise and useful legislation, and have great pleasure in supporting it.

*(4.58.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I must protest against the suggestion of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division, that the issue before the House is whether property intended for the poor is to be diverted to the rich. If I thought that that was directly or indirectly the issue I should certainly vote against the Second Reading, for I yield to none in my desire to maintain for the poor the endowments originally made in their interest. During the past five years I have endeavoured in every scheme that has come before me to preserve the benefits to the poor. The hon. Member for the Bordesley Division also very unnecessarily referred to a case at Sutton Colefield, in Warwickshire, in which it was alleged that a large sum of money—£15,000 a year—had been diverted. The hon. Gentleman ought to have also stated that the case was inquired into by the Committee, which found that the action of the Charity Commissioners had been in accordance with the original endowment, and not contrary to it. The Report said that the original gift contemplated the benefit of all classes of the inhabitants, and that, while the scheme of the Charity Commissioners proposed a limited measure of endowment for the purposes of higher education, the larger part of the endowment was appropriated for the benefit of the poor. That case, however, has nothing to do with the subject of this Bill, and appears to have been introduced merely for the purpose of influencing the mind of the House in regard to the Charity Commissioners. Will the House believe that this Sutton Colefield scheme was under the Endowed Schools Act and had been on the Table of the House 40 days before it came into force? If anybody is responsible for that scheme, therefore, it is the House of Commons quite as much as the Charity Commissioners. Is it fair, I would ask, in connection with this Bill, to bring forward a case which would not be affected by this Bill, but is subject to the very safeguards which the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Collings) desires should be imported into this measure. I am informed that the Hull case was also under the Endowed Schools Act in the same way. Unless it can be shown that this Bill, directly or indirectly, touches the powers of the Commissioners under the Endowed Schools Acts, I submit that the arguments founded in any case of this kind are nihil ad rem in connection with the issue before us. The hon. Member for Bordesley said it was unjust to divert money intended for doles. I must remind the House that this question is settled by Section 30 of the Endowed Schools Act. The House has determined, in its wisdom, that charities which are wholly or partially applied to doles in money or kind may be appropriated for other purposes. During the last five years I have had some 10 or 15 cases of that kind before me, and such cases have gone before the Courts. I state, without hesitation, that the extension of the dole system, where the amount of the income of the charity has largely increased, is an unmixed evil. I do not for a moment suggest that it is not a prudent and proper thing to have power to grant money to persons in distress during the winter, or in bad times, and in none of the schemes that have come before me have I omitted to give such power, but I could give the House instances in which the money originally left has largely increased from £200 or £300 to £1,000 or £1,200. It surely will not be contended that it would be wise to apply these largely increased sums in the form of doles.

MR. COLLINGS: I distinctly stated that I did not defend doles, but I argued that if the House considers some other form of charity was better the money should then go to the same class as that for which the doles were meant.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I am extremely glad to hear that from the hon. Member, but, as a matter of fact, I do not think he went so far as that in his speech. It has been suggested that the action of the Charity Commissioners has been to withdraw charities from those for whom they were meant, to transfer them to other persons. I do not pretend to say there has never been such a case, but certainly no such case has come under my knowledge. I cannot help thinking that what is in the mind of the hon. Member for Bordesley is that there have been cases under the Endowed Schools Act where this has been done. This, however, is a matter with which we are not concerned to-day, as this measure does not touch the Endowed Schools Act. If it had been possible to show that the money left for medical aid, for nursing, and so on, had been taken away from the poor and given to the rich it would be a most important case to deal with. I do not believe any such case exists, and, if it does, the action complained of must have been taken a very long time ago. Perhaps the House will understand that this matter of nursing the poor and assisting them in times of sickness is always prominently before those who have the administration of these schemes. I wish the House to understand that, in all the schemes that come before me where the cy près doctrine is applied, we always look first after the people who are intended to receive the benefit, and when we find the income has largely increased we endeavour to devote some portion of the amount to the original object of the founder of the Charity, and devote the remainder to kindred charities, the benefits of which will go to the same class of persons. It is not just to suggest that the persons who have to deal with these matters are not actuated by the same philanthropic motives as the hon. Member. Beyond removing the limit of £50, which I think will be generally regarded as an arbitrary limit, the Bill does not extend the powers of the Commissioners. In my opinion, the power of appeal will be preserved under the Bill as it stands, but if the hon. Member for Islington will bring forward a clause in Committee with the object of making this certain, I shall be happy to consider it. It is because we desire to protect charities that we think that the removal of the £50 limit would be an advantage, and not because we think it would enable the Charity Commissioners to carry out any improper schemes. Speaking for myself—because this is not a Government matter—I have not the smallest objection to other safeguards being inserted in the Bill for the control of the Local Authorities, provided that they are guarded by proper clauses. I cannot conceive that it could possibly be out of order to bring up under this Bill the very same proposals as were mentioned in the Report of the Committee as being desirable. The hon. Member for Bordesley thinks it would be an extremely wrong thing that the Charity Commissioners, or the High Court, should be able to alter the schemes which are controlled by Act of Parliament. It is by no means clear that the Court of Chancery has not got this power at the present time. I have had before me, during the last year or two, a couple of cases in which charities, which would be charities in the ordinary sense of the word, differed from other charities simply in the fact that the purposes to which the funds could be applied were contained within the four corners of private Acts of Parliament instead of being written out in a deed. They were clearly cases for the application of the cy près doctrine, but the difficulty suggested was that if we tried to apply the cy près doctrine, we touched an Act of Parliament. If it is desirable to alter the mode of the application of a charity which is 300 years old, given by a will, why should it not be possible to apply the same principle to an Act of Parliament of the same age? I hope hon. Members will not think it in any way disrespectful of me if I do not deal with some of the other points raised. I cannot but think that the Debate has ranged over a wider field than it should have done, because hon. Members have not considered what are the real limitations of the Bill. Perhaps it will be possible in Committee to insert Amendments which will practically meet all objections which constitute anything like a serious opposition to this Bill, and I hope and trust it will not be said that, in supporting the Second Reading, we are desirous that a single penny should be diverted from the poor people for whose benefit it has been left.

MR. RATHBONE: We should be quite willing in Committee to accept Amendments giving County Councils and Town Councils statutory powers.

*SIR A. ROLLIT: The Debate has had the practical advantage of causing suggestions to be made by the Attorney General, especially in relation to my point as to Municipal initiative in pursuance of the Report of 1884, which will have the result we all have in view. Under these circumstances, I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday next.

ACCESS 'TO MOUNTAINS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 20.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(5.21.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): As the Party opposite have shown such an unexpected interest in Charitable Trusts, I will not trouble the House now with this Bill. I will, however, take an opportunity of bringing the question before the House in some other manner this Session, when it will not be possible to use tactics like those which have been adopted to-day.

Second Reading deferred till Tuesday, 20th May.

CROFTERS' HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 109.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Farquharson.)

(5.24.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): It is most extraordinary that the hon. Member should propose the Second Reading of a Bill of this importance without one single word of explanation. The nature of the Bill may be gathered from the fact that there have been proposals, from time to time, to extend the Crofters' Act to this county and to that county; but now hon. Gentlemen propose that the Act should not merely be extended in its terms to certain specified parts of Scotland, but that it should, as a whole, be remodelled, and then be made the statute law of the whole of Scotland. One result of that would be that a Land Court would be established in Scotland, and would have the determination of every question that might arise between landlord and tenant over every acre in Scotland at present administered by the Crofters' Commission. I ask hon. Members, as practical men, whether such a proposal would not constitute one of the greatest changes which could be proposed affecting the Land Laws of any country? The next question is—Is it decent that the House should be asked at twenty-five minutes past five on a Wednesday to read such a Bill a second time, when, as I believe, not one in ten has the slightest idea of its contents? One curious result of the Bill, which hon. Gentlemen opposite ought to consider, is this. If fixity of tenure is given, as the Bill proposes, for the whole of Scotland, the result would be that no man would have a chance of getting a farm in Scotland except the descendants and successors in title of the present occupants. One of the standing grievances at present of agriculturists is, that people get hold of farms who are not agriculturists, and that they raise the rents by their competition. Now, that class would be stereotyped by the proposal of the Bill. Anyone who is cognisant of the various conditions of agriculture in Scotland must conceive that a plan, which I must assume in the meantime to be well adapted to the crofting parts of Scotland, could never be expected to work well in the agricultural parts of Roxburghshire or the plains of the Lothians. I ask any hon. Gentleman who may follow me in the Debate, how he would propose to work out a system which would apply to the hungry peasants on the stormy shores of the Lews, and also to the persons paying high rents, the leaders of agricultural improvements in the wealthy plains of Mid Lothian and Haddingtonshire? Have hon. Members considered how the Land Court is going to work, whether the country generally is prepared to submit the affairs of landlord and tenant to the investigation and scrutiny of lawyers and their associates? Have hon. Members the consent and mandate of their own constituents to a proposal of this kind? I have read the Bill from beginning to end, and cannot discover that even the intelligent hand of the Crofter Members has been directed to the improvement of the system under the existing Act, of which they have been the persistent critics; and when I turn to the names of the Lowland Members on the back of the Bill, I am still more at a loss to understand whether they share the evil opinion of hon. Members below the Gangway on the working of the Crofters' Act.

Mr. J. P. B. Robertson

It being half past Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Wednesday, 25th June.

HARES (CLOSE TIME) BILL.—(No. 34.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

NEW LICENCES (IRELAND) BILL.

(No. 249.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Seeing the First Lord of the Treasury in his place, I would ask him, seeing that this Bill is backed by a Conservative Member as well as Gentlemen on this side who, to some extent, represent the interests of the licensed traders in Ireland, and as the Government Bill entirely fails to carry out the pledge given by the Government in relation to the suspension of licences in Ireland being on the same footing as in England—though I am making no complaint about it now—I ask the right hon. Gentleman to allow this Bill to be read a second time, leaving the Government to introduce Amendments in such a way as will carry out their intention. I cannot conceive there will be any objection to the Second Reading in any part of the House. The hon. Member for S. Belfast is a strong Conservative, and his name is on the back of the Bill. I am happy to have his assistance, together with that of hon. Gentlemen who, more or less, represent the views of licensed victuallers.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have only myself seen the outside of the Bill, and have no knowledge of its contents. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary is not now in his place, and I think, therefore, I can hardly assent to the Second Reading in his absence. But I recognise the assistance which the hon. and learned Gentleman is anxious to give towards a settlement of this question, and I do not mean to say we shall not be very glad to avail ourselves of that assistance. If the hon. and learned Gentleman will consent to postpone the Motion for Second Reading for a day or two, we will meantime make ourselves acquainted with the method he and his friends prefer, and endeavour, if possible, to reconcile it with the view we entertain as to how the matter should be dealt with.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Accepting the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman, I will postpone the Order to Friday.

Second Reading deferred till Friday.

MINES (HOURS OF LABOUR).

Address for—

"Return showing the average number of hours and days, daily and weekly, worked by Men and Boys from bank to bank, and otherwise, in and about Mines in the United Kingdom, under the Coal Mines and Metalliferous Mines Acts, stated by Counties, or groups of Counties, or Inspectorates, as follows:—

1. Men and Boys engaged in getting Mineral;
2. Men and Boys engaged in carrying Mineral from the face to the pit bottom;
3. All other underground workers not included in the above;
4. Persons employed on the surface;
5. Usual number of hours per day during which Minerals are drawn to the surface."—(Mr. Provand.)

INCIDENCE OF TAXATION (ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND).

Motion made for copy of

"Statement showing the Incidence in England, Scotland, and Ireland of (a) general Taxes applicable to local purposes as estimated for 1890-91, and (b) of Imperial Taxation as collected in 1888-9."—(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): This is the Return, I presume, which was promised on Tuesday. I should like to know whether it will show, in regard to the proposed new Spirit Duty, the probable amount from the three countries?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Yes, it will show the total amount of the Spirit Tax and the allocation to the three countries as regards consumption, giving, I think, what hon. Gentlemen require.

MR. SEXTON: Shall we have it to-morrow?

MR. JACKSON: Yes.

*MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I think it was mentioned before that the Return might give, with the results for each part of the Kingdom, the proportion in regard to the additional taxation proposed. If the Secretary to the Treasury will undertake to add that, it is information it is very desirable to have.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it intended to take the Budget as first Order to-morrow?

MR. JACKSON: Yes.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I hope we shall have the Return before resuming the Debate.

MR. JACKSON: It was promised to-morrow afternoon, and although it has been extremely short notice every effort will be made to keep that engagement. As to the question of the right hon. Gentleman, the Return will give the amount of the Spirit Duty, and, of course, it will be allocated on the basis of the proportions 80 per cent., 11 per cent., and 9 per cent. It will show the amount consumed in each country.

*MR. CHILDERS: My suggestion is that a note should be given showing the special allocation of the additional duty imposed by the Budget. It will be only four lines, and be a great convenience.

MR. JACKSON: Yes; I think it will be an advantage.

Motion agreed to.

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 163.]

ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS.

On the Motion for adjournment,

*MR. CHILDERS: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will now tell us what will be the business on Friday?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Customs and Inland Revenue Bill in Committee will be taken to-morrow, and, if not concluded then, on Friday. If it is concluded to-morrow we shall ask the House to take the Third Reading on Friday, and probably Supply.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): Will the Allotments Bill not be taken on Friday?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot say positively.

MR. S. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): When the Allotments is finished will the Tithes Bill be taken?

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is quite impossible to make such prospective arrangements; it is sufficient to say what will be taken to-morrow and Friday, and I cannot go beyond.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to make a complaint of the non-distribution of an important Blue-Book this morning. I allude to the Report and evidence of the inquiry into the treatment of treason-felony prisoners, John Daly and others in Chatham prison. I think Irish Members have reason to complain of having to sign a formal document to obtain copies of every Irish paper, including Land Commission Reports, and this causes great inconvenience. I should have thought that, seeing the attention that has been drawn to this particular Report, it would naturally have been distributed to all Members. It is well, I think, that English Members should have no impediment put in the way of their obtaining information upon Irish matters. We have pressed for this Report, time after time, and yet when it is ready we do not receive it unless we sign a special demand for it. It is a "penny wise and pound foolish" course to follow, and will only lead to Members making a general demand for all papers.

MR. JACKSON: There is no different treatment for papers relating to Ireland. The matter does not rest with me, but I may say it is open to all Members to have papers sent to them by simply giving instructions. Papers of general interest are distributed, but, as to others, it is impossible to make a selection to meet the wishes of individual Members.

MR. J. SINCLAIR (Ayr): There are many papers which are not distributed, but which we ought to receive. The complaint does not attach to Irish papers only. The Education Codes for England and Scotland are not distributed unless a demand is made, but I think that it is obvious such papers as these are required. I think that a better selection should be made, and that papers relating to a particular part of the country should be sent to Members who represent that part.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E): I think the Secretary to the Treasury is wrong in saying a selection cannot be made. Until the last two years we had the "long" and the "short" list. It was a convenient arrangement, and I am sorry it was departed from. I was always opposed to this "red paper" system. We simply do not get the information we ought to have because we do not happen to have signed a demand, and an official takes such an estimate of his duty as excludes the sending of particular papers. The present practice is inconvenient, and does not in reality secure any economy, for the expense is in the setting up of the Blue Books, and not in the number, a few more or less, that happen to be used. I served on the Committee appointed by the Treasury in reference to the Stationery Department, and I came to the conclusion that the extravagance in this Department is not in connection with Parliamentary papers, but elsewhere. I only wish the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord would take the matter in hand, and I am sure there would be much less ground for complaint.

MR. SANDES.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has any information he can give the House as to the decision of the Lord Chancellor in reference to the conduct of Mr. Sandes, the Magistrate, which has been the subject of questions in the House? I understand that some decision has been arrived at.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry to say I have no information at all on the subject.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Thursday, 8th May, 1890.*LORD LOUTH'S CLAIM TO VOTE FOR REPRESENTATIVE PEERS FOR IRELAND.

Ordered and Directed, That a Certificate be sent by the Clerk of the Parliaments to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, stating that the Lord Chancellor of the United Kingdom has reported to the House of Lords that the right of the Lord Louth to vote at the elections of Representative Peers for Ireland has been established to the satisfaction of him the said Lord Chancellor; and that the House of Lords has ordered such report to be sent to the said Clerk of the Crown in Ireland. And it is hereby also Ordered, That the said Report of the said Lord Chancellor be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland.

The Lord Kilmaine—Took the Oath.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE LUNACY ACTS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BARRINGTON: I beg to ask the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack whether the Justices appointed under the Lunacy Act, 1889, have jurisdiction to make orders under the Lunacy Act, 1890, or whether it is necessary that they should be appointed under the later Act?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The Justices appointed under the Lunacy Act, 1889, have jurisdiction to make orders under the Lunacy Act, 1890. The jurisdiction established under the Act of 1889 was expressly preserved by Section 342 of the Consolidation Act. The Justices are, therefore, precisely in the same position with regard to their jurisdiction. I am glad the noble Lord has asked the question, because I understand that some doubts have been raised, and I think it very important that it should be clearly understood that they have the same jurisdiction under the existing Act as they had under the statute by which they were appointed.

VOL. CCCXLIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN BILL.
(No. 68.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I would ask the noble Earl to postpone his Motion for the present. I only received the print of the Bill to-day. I do not know when it is to be issued, but certainly it is not in the House at present. I have received an intimation from the Home Office that the authorities there are desirous of having an opportunity to say something on the matter. I may tell the noble Earl that after what passed the other day in this House I thought it my duty to give directions that a Bill should be prepared on the subject on behalf of the Government. I do not invite the noble Earl to withdraw his Bill, but only to postpone it for the present. There is much in the Bill of the noble Earl of which I entirely approve; but to some of the clauses I think I shall have to object. It seems to me to be most undesirable that there should be a sort of race between the two Bills, and I, therefore, ask the noble Earl to postpone at present the consideration of his measure. When they both come before your Lordships' House I shall ask that they be referred to the same Committee.

THE EARL OF MEATH: I will certainly not move the Second Reading after what the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has stated, and I at once assent to his suggestion.

Order discharged.

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 63.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HERSHELL: My Lords, this Bill is to remedy a result which I believe was unintentional from the terms used in the County Court Consolidation Bill, the effect of which has been that the Commissioners for taking oaths in the County Palatine of Lancaster are not now able, as they were previously, to take oaths in cases in the County Courts. The Bankruptcy Act expressly enables them to take oaths in bankruptcy cases in County Courts, so that the effect is now that they can take oaths in bankruptcy cases in the County Courts but not in other cases. This Bill is simply for the purpose of restoring to them in that respect the powers which they have been exercising in another for many years. I understand there is no objection on the part of my noble and learned Friend.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I have not the least objection. The noble and learned Lord has been good enough to postpone it upon my expression of doubt upon the question whether rights have been preserved. I find there is not the least doubt about it.

LORD HERSCHELL: The Bill consists of only four lines, and as it is so short your Lordships may be of opinion that there is probably no necessity for sending it to the Standing Committee, but that it should be dealt with by a Committee of the whole House.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

THE TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION ACT.

QUESTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether, under the Technical Instruction Act, 1889, Local Authorities are permitted to grant scholarships to be held in technical schools or colleges, and to pay the fees of scholars in such institutions; and, if so, whether such scholarships granted to persons residing within the district of the Local Authority are tenable at institutions outside that district, said: My Lords, the Act of Parliament upon one point in connection with which I am desirous for a few moments of directing your Lordships' attention with the view of obtaining some information from Her Majesty's Government is, I am bound to say, one of the most ill-constructed and difficult Acts to administer which I have ever known in the course of a somewhat long public life. But I do not propose to trouble your Lordships with any general observations upon that matter, especially as my noble Friend, Lord Norton, has had upon the Paper now for a considerable length of time a notice relating to this Act, and I do not at all wish to trespass upon ground in reference to which he might desire on a subsequent occasion to address your Lordships. I wish to address myself to-night to a single question, namely, whether it be or be not open to Local Authorities, that is to say to County and Municipal Councils under this Act, to promote its objects by granting scholarships to individual students to be held by them in technical schools or colleges, or by paying the fees of those individual students in those institutions. In some parts of the country, and particularly in that with which I am myself directly connected, the West Riding of Yorkshire, many of those who have most experience in these matters, and who have given great attention to the question of technical education, are of opinion that there is no better way in which, under the difficulties of this Act and its hampering restrictions, County Councils could aid in promoting technical education than by granting scholarships to students in public elementary schools or similar institutions be held by them in connection with technical schools and colleges; and, entertaining that view, the West Riding County Council addressed communications both to the Science and Art Department, presided over by the noble Viscount opposite, and also to the Local Government Board upon this and various other questions connected with the working of the Act. Upon this particular question of the granting of scholarships, we received, I regret to say, different answers from the two Departments. The Department presided over by the noble Viscount treated us with the utmost possible consideration and courtesy, and answered our questions in the fullest manner; the Local Government Board were somewhat more brief, telling us that we could not do what the noble Viscount's Department led us to hope we might do. Therefore it is that I address myself now to Her Majesty's Government to endeavour to elicit from them, if I can, a clear expression of opinion upon this subject; and I may say that I do so, not in my own name alone, but by direction of the Technical Instruction Committee of the County Council, with which I am connected. The Department told us that if we had any doubt upon this question we might take counsel's opinion. Of course, it is quite open to us to take counsel's opinion, but it is an expensive process, and one which will only give advice to the single County Council which may take the opinion. And, after all, my Lords, if the Local Government Board holds the view that these scholarships cannot be granted by the County Councils under the powers of the Technical Instruction Act it is no use our taking counsel's opinion, because the Local Government Board's Auditor will have to consider whether such expenditure is legitimate, and whether in regard to any such expenditure he ought not to surcharge us, and we may find ourselves perhaps in a very awkward position. Therefore, I hope Her Majesty's Government will give us such an expression of opinion or will intimate their intention of taking such advice upon the matter as will enable us to feel secure as to the course the Local Government Board will take in respect of it. I need not occupy your Lordships' time by pointing out the advantages which, at all events in populous districts near large town-centres, would result from a system of this kind. In populous manufacturing towns there are good technical schools and colleges, and it is only in such centres of population that they can be satisfactorily established, that is to say, only where they have a nucleus of population attached to or surrounding them upon which they can rely for the chief part of their students. I think it would be a very good way of extending the value of those institutions if the Local Authorities were able under the Act to make grants for scholarships to students at a certain distance from the towns where the schools are situate, in order that they might attend those schools and classes. That, of course, is not applicable to a county which is mainly rural, and perhaps but little supplied with railway accommodation; but where railway accommodation is good, and trains are cheap and frequent, I believe a system of that kind would be found to work extremely well, and that a numerous body of very competent students might be drawn into the colleges and schools from the surrounding districts. It is therefore very important, if the Act is to be carried out and made generally useful, that a power of that kind should exist. But, my Lords, besides the first question, whether it is open to us under the Act to grant scholarships at all, there arises, unfortunately, a second question upon which I regret to say the two Departments of which I have spoken are agreed. They both tell us that if we could give scholarships at all, we could not make those grants to be held in institutions which are situate outside our own administrative county. Now, in large counties like Lancashire and Yorkshire, which have several county boroughs within them, it is in those county boroughs generally that most of these institutions are situate; and if we are debarred from granting scholarships to be held in those institutions, the concession if it could be made to us of granting scholarships at all would be very seriously impeded in its utility. I know very well, my Lords, that under the Act, Section 1, Sub-section D, we are not empowered to make grants for the maintenance or in aid of any institutions outside our own districts. But the question which I am anxious to submit for the consideration of the Government is, whether that restriction in regard to making grants to institutions within our own districts would preclude us from making grants to individuals who reside within our own districts, although they might make use of those grants to attend institutions which are outside those districts. I am advised by those whom I have consulted upon the matter that that point is not at all clear; but they think that such grants might be made to the individuals, provided they reside within the administrative county, although they might make use of them outside that county. Now, my Lords, the only fair principle upon which I think the scholarships should be granted is, that they should be given to the individuals, to be held by them and used by them in any institution at their choice in which suitable technical instruction is given. Of course, County Councils giving the grants must preserve the right to say that they shall be employed in institutions of a satisfactory and efficient character; but I do not claim at all that they should have the power of choosing the institution to which the scholar shall go, except in so far as requiring that it is fit to give the desired instruction. But if that be the principle, surely the student should be free to take his scholarship with him wherever he likes, it being, of course, always understood that he is bond fide resident within the administrative county. Those are the two questions which I desire to address to Her Majesty's Government. I do not know what answer I may receive; but I hope very much that it may be an answer as favourable as the circumstances of the case and the wording of the Act will permit. I think it is a case in which, especially considering the ill-wording of the Act in question, Her Majesty's Government would do well to give the utmost latitude they possibly can to Local Bodies. I believe that to be the principle and object of the Act, and I hope that in their interpretation of the Act they will take that view. But if the noble Lord who may reply to me is not prepared at this moment to give any satisfactory answer to the suggestion I have made, I will still continue to hope that Her Majesty's Government will re-consider the subject. I know the difficulty of amending an Act of this kind. Of course, I am not ignorant of the existence of outside considerations distinct altogether from the question of technical instruction which have entered into the discussion and consideration of measures of this kind, and therefore I do not ask Her Majesty's Government to amend the Act; but I do hope that if they have not made up their minds finally upon it, they will take steps to ascertain from their legal advisers the actual bearing of the Act and give to the Local Bodies concerned the amplest latitude permitted by it.

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, I desire to say a few words before the noble Viscount replies on behalf of the Department he represents, as I have a notice on your Lordships' Paper to bring the whole subject before the attention of the House. The noble Marquess has put two very important questions relating to this general subject, but I am afraid if we deal with only one or two details of it we shall shut our eyes to the character of the whole Technical Instruction Act, which is not only unintelligible, but absolutely mischievous from the attempts to act upon it which have been made in several towns throughout the country. The noble Marquess has only moderately described the looseness with which this Act was passed last year. It was passed during the last week of the Session in the other House, the principal Amendments introduced by Mr. Mather being passed in his absence; and in your Lordships' House the Act passed through all its stages in 25 minutes. Now, it is rather an important subject to be dealt with in that sort of cursory manner, and the mischief of dealing in that way with a subject of this great importance is, that it leads people to attempt to deal with it in an imperfect manner. It is extremely difficult to remedy afterwards such experiment. The noble Marquess states that, in his County Council, difficulties have been experienced which he asks the noble Viscount to explain. I can tell him that in Birmingham, which is the largest town in my neighbourhood, and I believe the most active in attempts to establish institutions of this sort, they have found it so impossible to understand the Act that they had to come to the Department in London to ask how they could, by almost a process of evasion, escape its difficulties and do something in a side manner to carry out its objects. Questions arose between the County Council and the School Board, the School Board wanting to have the control, and the County Council saying that the Act had placed the subject in their hands. They wanted to know whether they might not make a sort of Joint Committee between the two which would enable them to carry out the object of the Act. But how does the Act propose to define technical instruction? Probably the framers of the Act, not knowing exactly what they meant or intended, have said that technical instruction shall mean anything which the Department at South Kensington may give grants to. That is rather a dangerous latitude for an unlimited command of public rates. The meaning which has been given to it has been seen in the technical instruction given in some of our large towns. In some places little children are seen planing or sawing pieces of wood, by way of technical instruction; in others there are workshops for the construction of engines of considerable size, which are sold in the market in competition with the trade itself. Technical instruction may really mean anything. All the industrial and reformatory schools of the country are giving technical instruction. The noble Marquess asked two questions in regard to scholarships. Giving scholarships to existing institutions is, I quite agree with him, the best mode in which the object of this Act could be carried out. It is the greatest mistake for us to suppose that in all parts of the country technical schools, whatever that term may mean, should be instituted. It is impossible that Government institutions of that sort shall teach all trades, or even prepare for them. How are they to provide for students to be made Jacks-of-all-trades? The way in which Parliament could best authorise public expenditure for giving technical instruction to our operatives, would be by enabling the Local Bodies to pay for scholarships to existing institutions. The fact is that Parliament, by pretending to provide for such instruction, is doing the great mischief of checking those who are interested in providing it, and who are doing so in more liberal, and in much better ways. Our manufacturers, one and another, are providing for technical instruction, each in their own way, many of them most magnificently; and if Parliament would enable the Local Authorities, out of the rates at their command to give to clever poor children the means of profiting by such provisions, they would be doing great practical good. I believe that at this moment there is a Bill before the other House attempting to amend the unintelligible Act of last Session, and I am afraid the noble Marquess is only dealing with a very small part of a most important subject, for the Act will require to be reconstructed upon an entirely different principle, namely, not attempting to provide, out of public money, institutions for giving technical instruction throughout the country, but to encourage the increase of existing institutions, and to enable them to be taken advantage of by capable youths whose parents cannot afford the education which it is the object of the Act to secure.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, my noble Friend has given so very large an expansion of the questions which the noble Marquess has put to me, that he almost calls upon me to defend the Act which now exists. I was not present during the 25 minutes which, the noble Lord says, constituted all the time that was devoted in this House to the measure, but I cannot help thinking that the argument which has been addressed to your Lordships would have been much better employed in endeavouring to prevent the Act passing at all. My noble Friend seems to think that this Act was passed against the wishes of the manufacturers and those interested in technical education. So far from that being the case, it was on account of the extraordinary pressure exerted on the part of those interested in technical education, and the manufacturers throughout the country, that, at the last moment, when all hope had been given up of the Bill being passed, that it was forced through Parliament. That was on account of the pressure brought to bear by those who were interested in the subject. I think my noble Friend will find he is considerably mistaken as to the operation of this Act. I have reason to suppose that advantage is being taken of its provisions. In consequence of the notice he has given I have endeavoured to ascertain what is really being done, and I shall be very happy, when I have got the full Returns, to satisfy my noble Friend on that subject. Some towns have adopted, and others are preparing to adopt, it, and I have no doubt it will be found to be easily worked. To come to the questions which have been put by the noble Marquess, they are questions which no Department—certainly not the Department under my control—can possibly answer. The Act of Parliament which has been passed empowers the Local Authority, if it thinks fit, to supply, or aid the supply, of technical or manual instruction to such extent and upon such terms as the authority may think expedient. That, no doubt, enables them to negotiate with the managers of institutions, or themselves, to supply such institutions if they think proper, that is to say, within the bounds which my noble Friend has spoken of as an unlimited pressure upon the rates. The Act of Parliament provides that the whole pressure upon the rates shall not exceed 1d. in the £1, and, therefore, there is no unlimited expansion at all, but only a limited effort permitted to Local Authorities to encourage technical education. My noble Friend has invited me to give an opinion upon this matter, but I am afraid my opinion is not of any great value, nor could it be taken on behalf of the Department, because I have no jurisdiction in the matter. The only jurisdiction given to the Science and Art Department is upon three points. That is to say, if the Local Authority divides the money appropriated to technical instruction, it is the duty of the Department to see that the provisions made for the purpose under the section are sufficient. It has to decide whether the schools are qualified to receive such grants, or to participate in them, and as to the amount to be allotted to each of the schools in proportion to what they are doing; but not at all to interfere upon either of the points to which the noble Marquess has called attention. He will see, by reading Section 1, Sub-section D., that it is made clear that outside the District no grant can be made by a Local Authority, nor is there any provision in the Act, whether for giving money to individuals to carry them either into the district or out of it. It must be a grant to a society. Even though the Local Authority may not be qualified to establish a scholarship, or to take the steps with regard to instruction suggested by the noble Marquess, yet by agreement with the local institutions as to the money they will grant, it seems to me these things might be easily done. It is quite obvious that the Local Authority can assign the money in whatever way it pleases, so long as it does not infringe upon the proper use of those funds, as laid down in the Act of Parliament, but if it chooses to employ the money in scholarships, I presume it could do so. As to the two Departments, which my noble Friend seems to think gave different opinions, it seems to me they gave the same opinion, that they were in no position to give an opinion at all upon the questions put to them. Whatever opinion I may have formed myself upon the matter is of little value, because the point lies outside the purview of the Department over which I have the honour to preside. The Departments could give no opinion, inasmuch as the legality of the application of local funds in that way is open to argument, and as the point, when raised, must go before the Local Government Board auditor, it would be better for the Local Authorities to take legal advice before giving grants for the purpose of such instruction. If I were to give an opinion upon this subject, I do not hesitate to say that it would not be of any real value, and that it would not help the noble Marquess at all. I think all noble Lords who have held office in the public Departments of this country, will agree that it is not the duty of the officials of Departments to take opinions for those outside, where the Department itself has no authority to intervene. If I had authority to decide these questions, it would be my duty to take the opinion of the law officers, and to do the best I could to form a judgment upon the matter. But the duty lies outside, upon the Local Authority. The Local Authority runs the risk of having to come before the auditor of a Government Department, and, without the least wish to interfere with the Local Authorities, we must call upon them to protect themselves, from a legal point of view, in any course they may think proper to take. I say that the more confidently because the carrying out of this Act is not put under the Department over which I preside, but belongs rather to the Local Boards who are called upon to administer them.

COMPANIES (MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION) BILL.—(No. 67.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I shall not occupy many minutes, because the Bill itself, though of considerable importance, is not of great length, and will not require very much explanation. Its object is to allow a Limited Company, incorporated under the Limited Liability Acts, to alter its Memorandum of Association within certain limits. The necessity for such a measure arises from the difficulty which is experienced in getting the most necessary alterations made in a Memorandum of Association of a Limited Company, even when the shareholders are unanimous. Requests for permission to make such alterations come, from time to time, before both Houses of Parliament in the form of Private Bills, because it is only by the authority of Parliament that alterations in the Memorandum of a Limited Company can be made, with some slight exceptions. It is, of course, within your Lordships' knowledge, that to get an alteration, a very simple alteration, perhaps, made in a Memorandum in this way is both expensive and troublesome. I am far from saying there should not be some trouble, if not some expense, necessary before an alteration should be permitted to be made in the Memorandum of Association of a company, which is an important document and one to be treated with great respect. It is not to be lightly altered, or altered to the prejudice of those who, upon the faith of it, have taken shares in a company. But the point I wish to put before your Lordships is that the present state of matters imposes undue and unnecessary difficulty and undue and unnecessary expense in getting even the simplest alteration made in a Memorandum of Association. Now, no alteration in a Memorandum of Association of a company can be made except as provided in the 12th section of the Companies' Act, 1862. The provisions of that section are to the following effect:—

"That if any Company limited by shares desires to modify the conditions contained in its Memorandum of Association it can do so if authorised by its regulations as originally framed or so altered by special resolution; but the purposes of the alterations which is proposed to be made in the Memorandum of Association are limited to the following matters:—'The capital may be increased either by the issue of new shares, or, if desired, fully paid-up shares may be converted into stock;'"

But with that exception, and save as therein provided, in the case of change of name no alteration can be made by any company in the conditions contained in its Memorandum of Association. It is, therefore, the law at the present time that the objects of a company, as first stated in its Memorandum of Association, cannot be departed from, except as I have mentioned. In other words, the Memorandum of Association is the charter of the company, and no alteration can be made in it, however much it may be for the good of the company, or however anxious or unanimous the shareholders may be in their desire to effect the alteration. My Lords, I may be allowed, perhaps, to quote two sentences, one from the judgment of the late Lord Cairns in giving a decision in this House in the case which is the leading authority in these matters, where he uses these words—

"A Memorandum cannot be so qualified by the articles as to give power to extend or change the business or objects of the company by a special resolution;"

and the noble Earl opposite (Lord Selborne), in giving judgment in the same case, said—

"The Memorandum of Association is, in fact, the fundamental and, except in certain specified particulars, the unalterable law of the company which is incorporated by it."

Now, as I have said, if it is necessary for a company to make even the simplest alteration in its Memorandum of Association it often happens that the expense and trouble are out of all proportion to the value of the alteration itself or the benefit to be obtained by it. This, my Lords, is not a new matter. It has been before Parliament on a previous occasion, and last year Parliament appointed a Joint Committee of both Houses to consider it. That Joint Committee was composed of Members of your Lordships' House and of the House of Commons, whose names will, I am sure, command the confidence of all. From this House there were appointed the Lord President Earl Morley, Lord Herschell, Earl Crawford, and Lord Hillingdon; and from the other House Mr. Courtney, Mr. Bristowe, Mr. Haldane, Mr. Raikes, and Sir Horace Davey. That Committee deliberated upon the matters referred to it and reported unanimously that it was expedient power should be given to companies to alter their Memoranda of Association or Articles of Association within certain limits, which they described, and always subject to the approval of the High Court in England and Ireland, and, if in Scotland, to the consent of the Court of Session. My Lords, the limits which the Select Committee recommended should be imposed upon alterations are that every Member of a company, who by himself or by his authorised agent, has expressed dissent from such resolution, at any meeting held for passing the same, and every holder of debentures or debenture stock, or any class of persons whose interests will, in the opinion of the Court, be directly affected by such power to alter may appear before the Court, and be heard in regard to sanction being given to the Resolution.

which has been passed. The Committee recommended that those two conditions should be imposed in cases of alterations being made. The first is that where the alteration has reference to the object of the Memorandum of Association, the new object shall be "cognate" or "ancillary" to the present objects of the company; and the second recommendation is that the application for the proposed alteration shall be based upon circumstances which have arisen since the registration of the company. In the main, this Bill carries out the recommendations of the Committee. You will find in the 1st clause a power given to the company to pass a special Resolution for altering the provisions of its Memorandum of Association. Before that alteration can take effect, the consent of the High Court in England and Ireland, and in Scotland of the Court of Session must be obtained; and before that consent can be given it is necessary that the Court shall be satisfied, in the words of the clause, that the new or extended objects are cognate or ancillary to the objects, or some of the objects, of the company as expressed in its Memorandum of Association. I think the provision will commend itself to your Lordships that the alteration shall be for kindred objects only; and so careful have the framers of the Bill been to accept the recommendations of the Committee that they have taken them exactly in the words in which the Committee gave them. My Lords, I should be perfectly willing that the words of this section should be carefully scrutinised in Committee, and I should hope that the noble Lord opposite, who was Chairman of that Committee (Lord Herschell), will be able to guide us as to whether the proviso as to the extension of powers being for "cognate" or "ancillary" objects is sufficiently legal phraseology to be adopted in the Bill and passed into an Act without some words of limitation or explanation ensuing upon them. But as the Committee was a joint one of both Houses of Parliament, the object has been to adhere as strictly as possible to the language of the recommendations of that Committee; and in the form in which I now present it to your Lordships it has passed the other House of Parliament after careful scrutiny in the Grand Committee. Then, my Lords, the other provisions in the Bill are that sufficient notice shall be given to every holder of Debentures and to every creditor that changes are proposed, and that they shall have the right to appear and object before the Court. The recommendation of the Committee that the application shall be based on circumstances which have arisen since the registration of the company was placed in the Bill when it was before the other House of Parliament, but was deleted in its passage through that House because it was thought that the expression was too vague to be a real safeguard, and that, on the whole, it was better that it should not be made permanently the law. There is one other clause in the Bill upon which I think it necessary to say a few words, and that is the 2nd clause as to giving certain powers. That is a clause which was introduced into the Bill in the other House of Parliament, and the object, as I understand it, is to supply power to make new alterations in a Memorandum of Association, which would remain impossible after the passing of this Bill if that power were not given. I venture to think it is right that the power which is given in this clause should be given, though not perhaps exactly in the words in which it now stands. The clause has not been framed by the Board of Trade; it was inserted, as I have said, in the other House of Parliament, and I think the wording of it will require to be somewhat carefully examined in Grand Committee of this House if your Lordships are willing to give the Bill a Second Reading and to refer it to the Committee. I think one change which may be required in it may be that the alterations dealt with in the 2nd schedule should, like the other alterations, be made only with the sanction of the Court, and after full opportunity has been given to those interested of being heard. I think in that or in some other way that section may be amended so as to bring it into harmony with the other provisions of the Bill. I do not know that any other point requires discussion at this stage. If your Lordships will give the Bill a Second Reading, I propose to refer it in the usual way to one of the Committees for consideration. As there are many Members of the House who are better qualified to judge of the legal aspects of the measure than I can hope to be, I trust they will give it their attention. My Lords, I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, with regard to the main object of this Bill, I have only to add a few words upon one point with regard to what the noble Lord who has moved the Second Reading has said, that it carries out the recommendations of the Joint Committee of last Session with an exception which I have no objection to. It has, indeed, been suggested by many of those who are in favour of the objects of this Bill that it might be desirable to give an alternative for the procedure under the Bill, and that there are many cases in which the Board of Trade might very well deal with the matter instead of its being left to the Court; that the application to the Court involves considerable expense and delay, and, therefore, that you might give an alternative power of applying to the Board of Trade unless they thought it was a case which ought to be referred to the Court. I think that is a suggestion worthy of consideration; but, of course, it would be an important change which, as it has only been recently suggested, I am not at present prepared to advocate. Still, I think it worthy of consideration. The only other clause to which I need refer is that which the noble Lord opposite has mentioned. I do not think those who framed the Bill can fully have foreseen all the results which will flow from it, because, as it is worded, it would give an interested majority of the shareholders power to prefer themselves by a special resolution, because they might be able to carry the requisite number with them, both as regards the payment of dividends and the repayment of capital. For example, as far as I can see, supposing you had Preference shares and Ordinary shares in a company, and the Ordinary shareholders could obtain a majority of three-fourths, which would not be an impossible case, they might give themselves a preference over the Preferred shareholders, because the Bill provides that any company may, by special resolution, affix preference in payment of dividends to any of its shares. Of course, that could not have been intended, and it is obvious that that clause will need some limitation. I am not sure that I quite understand the exact class of cases which it is intended to provide for. Perhaps, if I understood that more fully, it would be easier to suggest the necessary qualification; but as the clause at present stands, its scope, I think, is wider than can have been intended by those who introduced it into the measure.

*THE EARL OF MORLEY: I am extremely glad that Her Majesty's Government have been able to introduce this Bill. I think the object in view is a very desirable one, and the Bill will relieve Parliament from the necessity of passing extremely anomalous and inconvenient Bills. As the noble Lord who moved the Bill has informed your Lordships under the present law with regard to companies, their memoranda are unalterable, except in certain defined cases, and the only way in which a Limited Company, not a Parliamentary Company, has of doing so, is by a private Bill introduced into Parliament. The inconvenience of that has been felt for many years, and I think the House will agree that it is extremely undesirable that Parliament should interfere, except where absolutely necessary, with regard to Public Companies, which are not Parliamentary Companies. The whole jurisdiction over Joint Stock Companies is with the Courts of Law, and not with Parliament; and I am extremely glad that Her Majesty's Government have introduced a Bill which will extend that jurisdiction under certain well-defined conditions to the alteration of Memoranda of Association of such companies. I am also glad to find that the noble Lord who moved the Second Reading of the Bill and the noble and learned Lord behind me have called attention to Clause 2 of the Bill. I think the clause as it at present stands would be extremely dangerous, to say the least of it; and I hope it will be thoroughly considered in Committee before any such power is given to companies. At any rate, I would suggest that such power should not be given as to capital or shares at present issued. It might be possible, as in railway legislation, that power should be given to divide capital into Preferential and Deferred when a certain amount of it has been paid up; but that is a matter for the consideration of the House in Committee. I would also suggest, for the noble Lord's consideration, whether it might not be possible to, in some directions, extend the scope of this Bill, and under the same restrictions as are imposed where a Memorandum of Association is to be altered; whether it would not be well to give power to amalgamate companies. Occasionally Private Bills are introduced for this purpose, and I think it might be well here to give powers to do that in the High Court. There are one or two other small matters for comment, but they are rather for Committee than for the House; but the Bill itself, as the noble Lord has stated, is in strict accordance with the recommendations of the Joint Committee of last year, and I sincerely hope it will become law during the present Session.

*LORD BRAMWELL: I am not going to say a word against the intention of this Bill, but I desire to make one or two remarks upon it. It is a strong measure that when a man enters into a particular business he should be made a partner in another. A man enters into partnership with a number of people, the form of the partnership being a Limited Liability Company. That partnership is for the purpose of carrying on a particular business, and the proposal of this Bill is that power shall be given to make him a partner in a different concern, that is to say, in the old business that he had agreed to join, with such addition to it as the majority of the shareholders may desire, and which the Court may think reasonable. Now I cannot help thinking that is really rather a strong measure. A man is to be made against his consent a partner in a business which he may dislike very much, which may be opposed to his own particular interests, and which may possibly go against his conscience, for it may be that the additional business is the sale of intoxicating liquors, or what not, which he may object to. Now I do think, whatever may be his reason for objecting, that a man should be enabled to get out of the new partnership; he should not be compelled to be a partner in a business which he had rather have nothing to do with. It is true that the Court has power to grant it in such terms as may be thought fit; but the Court, for anything I know, might not accede to this sort of objection which I am now taking: that would be wrong, and we should not give the Court the power of doing wrong. Your Lordships may think it a reasonable thing that a man should be at liberty to get out of the new business, and perhaps the noble Lord who has charge of this Bill will take that into his consideration. It may be said he can get out because he can sell his shares. But perhaps he cannot sell, because there may be no market for them, or they may be worth less than nothing, I think there should be some provision made by which a dissentient partner should be at liberty to retire from the firm. That is one matter which I wish to suggest for the noble Lord's consideration. The other matter is this: I do not find any procedure laid down in the Bill for making application to the Court. I do not see what step is to be taken for that purpose, whether any summons is to be issued, whether any notices are to be served, or whether there is to be any advertisement. Perhaps the noble Lord will think it right that there should be some arrangement made about that matter also. I have only one word more to say, my Lords, and that is that I entirely concur in the criticism which has been passed by everybody upon Clause 2. It is impossible in reason that it can stand as it does.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order).

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: In moving that the Bill be referred to the Committee on General Bills I should like to explain, with the view of endeavouring to meet what has been suggested at this stage, that I have entered into communications with the noble Lords who are Chairmen of Committees, and it has been explained to me that the Committee on Law has four or five Bills before it, while the Committee on General Bills has scarcely any, and that, after all, this matter is in great part of a general nature, as well as partaking of the nature of a legal measure. If it is thought that the Committee on General Bills is not strong enough in legal talent, I would venture to suggest that one or two of the legal Members of the House should be added to that Committee, rather than that all the Bills of a legal nature should be concentrated in the Committee on Law, which would cause an amount of delay and the inconvenience which the other course would prevent.

LORD HERSCHELL: I quite agree with the noble Lord as to this Bill being one upon which legal opinion may well be brought to bear; but the fact is, that that may be said of so many Bills that it is difficult to discriminate between those that must go to the Law Committee and those that may go to the Committee on General Bills. We should endeavour, as far as possible, I think, to distribute the work of the House between the two Committees, and to avoid throwing it all upon one. This, after all, is really a matter of trade, and the legal opinion is only wanted to assist in putting it in proper form. I think the difficulty might be got over by adding some of the legal Members of the House to the Committee on General Bills for the purpose of this Bill being considered there, the General Committee having certainly more leisure at present than the Law Committee.

Bill committed to the Standing Committee for General Bills.

SALE OF PICTURES BY LANDSEER.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Before your Lordships adjourn, I desire to mention an urgent matter of which I was unable to give notice. I wish to draw the attention of the noble Marquess the Prime Minister to a sale of pictures and objects of art which commences on Saturday next. Among those works of art are some pictures or studies of game, live and dead, and of other animals by Sir Edwin Landseer. They were done when he was at his best, some 40 years ago, when he was a great friend of, and lived so much with, Mr. Wells of that period. I venture to say, my Lords, that these works are unequalled in their beauty; there has been nothing like them at any former time, and I do not think there will be anything superior to them at any time to come. They have all the minuteness and accuracy of photographs, but having infused into the photography the living genius of that great artist. The coloring is seen as through his poetical eye—the coloring of nature. My Lords, I do not propose to discourse on the merits of Sir Edwin Landseer;

but I will only say that in 1885, when I had the honour of being sent to the Paris International Exhibition as one of the British Jurors, the gold medal was on that occasion unanimously given to Sir Edwin Landseer as representing the highest form, as the judges considered, of British art. I think it would be a thousand pities if these pictures should not be purchased for the British nation. They are 18 in number, and it might not be thought necessary to buy them all perhaps. The pictures in the National Gallery consist, at present, of what are called the "Old Masters." It is, perhaps, rash of me to give an opinion; but having seen many of the great Picture Galleries of Europe, I believe that the collection of Old Masters in the National Gallery of Great Britain is already the finest anywhere. I think we might now very well stop purchasing Old Masters, and that when the occasion arises we might endeavour to add what is so much wanting in our National Collection, examples of the British School of past art. I venture to think this is so favourable an opportunity for doing so that I would call the attention of the Prime Minister to that matter; and I am perfectly certain, from what I have heard stated of these pictures, that their purchase would give immense satisfaction to all who are interested in art in this country. I would urge any of your Lordships who may be able to take the opportunity presented to you before the sale to go and see these beautiful works of Landseer, which are now being exhibited with other objects of art.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: This is rather an unusual subject of deliberation for your Lordships. My noble Friend only gave me an intimation of his intention to bring forward this matter as I entered the House. I have not, therefore, been able to obtain from the Chancellor of the Exchequer any statement as to those considerations of a more vulgar and prosaic character which, unfortunately, must be taken into account in deciding upon this question. I will, however, bring the matter before my right hon. Friend, and the Government will form such decision as the circumstances seem to direct. But I hope the effect of my noble Friend's passionate and striking eulogy, uttered in the presence of several people who are quite competent to buy these pictures themselves, will be to ensure a large attendance at the sale for the purchase of all the pictures for the purpose of being presented to the nation.

BILLS OF SALES BILL.—(No. 51.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order); Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3<sup>a</sup> To-morrow.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 8th May, 1890.

BANKRUPTCY RECEIVING ORDERS.

Return ordered—

"Showing the number of Receiving Orders in the High Court during the three months ended the 31st day of December, 1889, and in 12 County Courts during the six months ended the 31st day of December, 1889, the total number of Creditors appearing in the Debtors' statements of Affairs at various amounts, and the Amount of Liabilities."—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

MERCHANT SHIPPING (TONNAGE.)

Return ordered—

"Showing in detail how the present gross measurements of the Steamships Anglesey and Duchess of Sutherland have been arrived at, and the deductions and allowances by which these gross measurements have been brought down to net registers of 143 tons and 180 tons respectively, under the provisions of 'The Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act, 1889.'"—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

PUBLIC INCOME AND EXPENDITURE.

Return ordered—

"Of Public Income and Expenditure for the year ending the 31st day of March, 1890, in continuation of Parliamentary Paper No. 305, of Session 1889."—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

INCOME TAX ASSESSMENTS.

Return ordered—

"Of the number of Assessments to the Income Tax for the year ending the 5th day of April, 1889 (in the same Classes and up the same Amounts as stated in, and in continuation of, Parliamentary Paper, No. 234, of Session 1885)."—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

The Marquess of Salisbury

QUESTIONS.

THE MACCLESFIELD SAVINGS BANK.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what decision has been arrived at by the Lord Chancellor as to the retention in the Commission of the Peace of the names of Mr. P. J. Eaton and Mr. Thomas Stringer, after the remarks of the Commissioner appointed to inquire into the affairs of the Macclesfield Trustee Savings Bank, in his Report to the Treasury, pages xxxv. and xxxviii.?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Lord Chancellor has had the evidence taken by the Commissioners under his consideration. In neither instance does it disclose any misconduct in the office of Justice of the Peace; and the Lord Chancellor is not satisfied that it establishes such a case as would justify the extreme measure of removing the names of these gentlemen from the Commission of the Peace.

POSTAGE RATES TO INDIA AND THE COLONIES.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what would be the estimated additional loss to the Revenue of the reduction of the postage rates to India and the British Colonies from 5d. and 6d. to 1d. instead of 2½d., as proposed by him?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): The loss to the Imperial Revenue by reducing the postage of letters to India and the Colonies to 1d. instead of 2½d., as proposed, is estimated at £180,000 a year; and that loss, I may add, would be in addition to the loss which is at present sustained by the expenditure on Ocean Mail Services being very largely in excess of the postage rates charged to the public.

*MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): Does the right hon. Gentleman include in that £180,000 a year the loss on carrying letters to Canada?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes; the Estimate covers the whole of the colonies.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Does the right hon. Gentleman take into account any possible extension of the number of letters?

*MR. RAIKES: I cannot answer that question.

*MR. CHILDERS: Can the right hon. Gentleman give a Return showing how the reduction to 1d. would affect the different colonies and dependencies?

*MR. RAIKES: All I can say is that the sum I have given would cover the estimated loss, including all the colonies.

MR. SUMMERS: Is the £180,000 in addition to the loss now sustained in connection with the Postal Service?

*MR. RAIKES: It is estimated that the present loss upon the Colonial Postal Service amounts to £254,000 a year, or rather more than £250,000, and the reduction to 1d. would increase that loss by £180,000 a year more.

THE MAHARANI OF REWAH.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State has yet received the Memorial of H.H. the Barhi Chandalin, Maharani of Rewah, and if he can state its prayer; whether any reply has been sent thereto, and to what effect; and whether he will lay the Papers relating thereto upon the Table of this House?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): No, Sir; no Memorial from the Maharani of Rewah has been transmitted from the Government of India to the Secretary of State.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a Memorial, dated 23rd January, 1890, has been reported by the Government of India as having been received by them?

*SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; I told the hon. Gentleman that about two months ago.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to give notice that, in consequence of the answer of the Under Secretary of State, unless this Memorial, a copy of which I hold in my hand, comes very soon to the Secretary of State, I shall avail myself of the opportunity of bringing the matter before the House.

LORD REAY.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Secretary of State has been called to the following statement which appeared in the Times of the 21st April:—

"On Lord Reay's departure from Bombay, at the moment of embarkation, the Municipal Council presented a farewell address. His Lordship, in replying, said that during his five years period of office his object had been to carry out strictly the principle of Her Majesty's Proclamation, which was the Magna Charta of the humblest labourer no less than the noblest Chief in the land, and that when what he considered a grave departure from those principles was ordered from England he at once tendered his resignation;"

and whether Lord Reay did, in fact, tender his resignation; and, if so, why such resignation was not accepted?

*SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State has seen the statement in the Times, but cannot believe that Lord Reay's speech has been accurately reported, as Lord Reay, whatever may have been his intentions, did not, in fact, tender his resignation.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Has not a Despatch reached the Secretary of State in connection with Lord Reay's action concerning the Mamlatdars; and, if so, why has it not been included in the Papers laid before the House?

*SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; no Despatch which could be construed into a tender of resignation on the part of Lord Reay has reached the Secretary of State.

DUTY ON AERATED WATERS.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will consider the advisability of imposing a duty of 6d. per dozen upon lemonade, soda, and other aerated waters containing a per-centage of alcohol, which it is estimated would produce a return of not less than £1,000,000 sterling per annum?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think the hon. Member, since he originally put this question, has added the words "containing a per-centage of alcohol." Very few of these beverages, if any, contain a per-centage of alcohol, and I am at a loss to discover any calculation by which they could reach the sum of £1,000,000 sterling. I do not see my way to impose a tax on aerated waters.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the graduated increase of pay formerly enjoyed by the men employed on the Ordnance Survey was suddenly stopped about three years ago by a new scheme of the Director General; whether this scheme has never been made known to those primarily interested; whether the scheme has been sanctioned by the Treasury; and whether he will lay a Copy upon the Table of the House?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The pay of civil assistants and temporary civil assistants on the Ordnance Survey is regulated by the Minute affecting the pay and promotion of the civil members of the establishment of the Topographical Survey, which was presented to Parliament on July 2, 1872, and by subsequent Treasury Orders. The graduated increase of pay formerly enjoyed by the men employed on the Ordnance Survey, I am informed, was not suddenly stopped about three years ago by a new scheme. No new scheme of pay has been introduced. The system of the Ordnance Survey Department is, and always has been, to give increased pay for increased efficiency combined with length of service. The question apparently alludes to a confidential Circular which was issued in 1888, with a view to securing greater uniformity in the practice of division officers in the field and at headquarters with regard to recommendations for increases of pay. As this Circular made no alteration in the system of pay approved by the Treasury and the Office of Works it was not necessary to submit it for the sanction of the Treasury. I am afraid that I cannot lay a copy of a confidential Departmental Circular on the Table of the House. It would be quite unusual to do so.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is the Irish Department of the Ordnance Survey also under the control of the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Goschen

RAILWAY ACCIDENT AT CARLISLE.

MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the train which met with the accident at Carlisle on the 3rd March last, was worked on the trip or contract system of working passengers and goods trains; and whether he will grant facilities to inquire into that system of working trains on those railways where it has been adopted?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have been informed by the Company that the train which met with the accident was worked on the trip system, and they explain that under this system 150 miles travelled with an express train entitles both driver and fireman to a day's pay. This distance was covered by the train in question in about 3½ hours. I am informed that the system has been in use for 25 years and found to work well. I do not see any sufficient reason for directing any inquiry.

DOCK AT GIBRALTAR AND BOMBAY.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state what progress is being made in the arrangements for the construction of the dry docks at Gibraltar and Bombay?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): A small Committee are now considering various questions in connection with the construction of a dock at Gibraltar, and I hope that before the close of the financial year the work may be in hand. The question of the construction of a dock at Bombay out of Imperial funds has been postponed for the present, owing to the extraordinary demands upon the Exchequer in respect of other works of urgent importance. I am, however, glad to add that a dock is in course of construction by the Port Trust, which will be 500ft. in length and capable of accommodating any but the largest ironclads.

ADMIRAL MAYNE: I beg to give notice that when the Admiralty Vote comes on I will raise the question whether or not the Admiralty is responsible for providing adequate dock accommodation.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. WILLIAM M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the revision of the Upper Grade, throughout the whole of the Civil Service, in accordance with the recommendation of the Royal Commission is under the consideration of the Government ; whether four vacancies in the War Office, two arising from death, one from retirement, and one from the recent promotion of Mr. Englebach to a Commissionership of Customs, have lately been filled up ; whether, previous to the transfer of Mr. Englebach to the Customs, a decision had been arrived at that his post at the War Office should be abolished, and whether in fact it has been abolished ; whether four vacancies in the Statistical Department of the Customs have occurred since January 1888, two arising from deaths and two from retirement, and are not yet filled up, whereby all promotion in the Office has been stopped for over two years ; and what reason there is that the clerks in one Department should receive different treatment from those in another Department of the Service, before a definite decision on the question of revision has been arrived at ?

*MR. GOSCHEN : The Treasury, in their Minute of August 10 last, laid down the principles upon which they proposed to apply the recommendations of the Royal Commission with regard to the upper establishment of the Civil Service, and they are acting on those principles now. The establishment of the War Office is under the Secretary of State, and the question of the hon. Gentleman should be addressed to the Secretary of State. Four vacancies have taken place in the Statistical Department of the Customs since January, 1888. A Departmental Committee reported in favour of reduction of the number of clerks on the upper establishment in that Department, and that recommendation tallied with the general recommendation of the Royal Commission in favour of reduction in the numbers of the upper establishment in the Service. The constitution of the Statistical Department is under the consideration of the Treasury and the Board of Customs ; but if reductions of establishment are to be carried out there must undoubtedly be some stoppage in promotions. I am not aware that there is any difference in the treatment of clerks in different Departments ; neither should I be able to accept the natural deduction from the hon. Member's question, namely, that clerks in a Public Office have a vested right to promotion, although reductions in that Office may be under consideration.

COURT MARTIALS.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I had intended to ask the Judge Advocate General whether it is legal and in accordance with the Army Regulations and Rules of Procedure for a non-commissioned officer to be tried by a district court martial, without having been remanded, but I will postpone the question until tomorrow.

EGYPT.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true that Her Majesty's Government have made proposals involving the committal of this country to a permanent Protectorate of Egypt in the shape of a Convention, giving the British Government the exclusive right to interfere in the event of internal or external danger ; and, if so, whether Parliament will be consulted before such a duty is undertaken ?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.) : Her Majesty's Government have made no proposals for a Convention.

SARAWAK.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has any information that Rajah Brooke, of Sarawak, has on his own authority annexed a large new territory ; whether Her Majesty's Government were cognisant of such annexation, or have approved of it ; and whether British subjects are allowed to make such annexations when they can ?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : Her Majesty's Government have as yet only imperfect information with respect to the transaction in question ; but they have good ground for believing that the annexation of Limbang to Sarawak is in entire accordance with the wishes of the people of the country. British subjects generally cannot seize and hold territory. The sovereignty of Rajah Brooke in Sarawak has long been recognised.

In reply to a further question by Sir G. CAMPBELL, *SIR J. FERGUSSON said: The annexation has been made subject to the approval of Her Majesty's Government.

THE GUARDS BIRTHDAY PARADE.

MR. BARTLEY: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary for War what arrangements, if any, have been made to enable Members of the House to witness the Birthday Parade of the Brigade of Guards on the 21st inst.?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): By the courtesy of the Officer in Brigade Waiting Mr. Speaker has received 500 tickets for the use of Members of this House to witness the trooping of the colours by the Brigade of Guards on the 21st inst., and arrangements will be made for allotting them according to the number of Members who express a wish to be present.

THE SCOTCH CENSUS.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherlandshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the attention of the Secretary for Scotland has been called to the desirability, in taking the Census of the Gaelic-speaking population, of having two columns on the subject in the Schedule issued to householders; (1) for the enumeration of such as can speak Gaelic only; and (2) for the enumeration of such as can speak both English and Gaelic; and whether this will be kept in view in drawing up the Schedule referred to?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The attention of the Secretary for Scotland has already been called to the subject of the hon. Member's question, and the matter is under consideration.

PEMBROKE DOCK.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is the case that till June, 1888, the hired men under the Works Department at Pembroke Dock used to work the same hours as the hired men in the Chief Constructor's Department, but that, since that date, the men employed in the Works Department have been forced to work six hours a week longer than the others; and whether any extra pay has been given for the extra time so worked?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Yes, Sir. Prior to 1888 the hired men employed under the Works Department at the other Dockyards and Naval Establishments worked for longer hours than at Pembroke, and it was considered right that the hours of the Works Department should be made the same at all the yards. No extra pay was allowed in consequence of this change, men of the Works Department being supposed to work not according to dockyard hours, but the hours usually required by contractors employing the same class of labour.

ON-LICENCES.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government will furnish the House with particulars of the amounts received by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in the last financial year in the various counties and boroughs in respect of on-licences in such counties and boroughs, or an approximate estimate of such amounts?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am told that the information cannot be supplied before the end of the month.

TELEGRAPHIC CONVENTION WITH CHINA.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (University of London): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that a Telegraphic Convention between the Chinese Government and certain British and Foreign Telegraph Companies has lately been signed, and whether the ratification by the British Government is sought by the interested parties; whether this Convention would fix the charge for telegraphic communication to China for a long period of years, so as to preclude competition with existing cables and land lines during that time; and whether Her Majesty's Government will lay the proposed Convention (terms of which are known in this country, but which have so far been kept secret) upon the Table of the House before its ratification?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The arrangement between the Chinese Government, the Northern Telegraph Company, which uses the Russian overland line, and the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company was signed on August 10, 1887, and purposed to provide for a fixed rate on through messages from Europe to China, by whatever route transmitted, until 1903. The Convention leaves it open to the parties concerned to reduce the rates, and does not preclude the laying of additional cables by other persons. It was, however, made subject to approval by the British and Russian Governments, and Her Majesty's Government have not given their consent to it. Negotiations were lately in progress for its modification, but these have now been suspended, and the whole matter is for the present in abeyance. The consent of Her Majesty's Government will not be given to any such agreement without full consideration of all the interests involved and consultation with the Representatives of British commerce, but no pledge can be given as to preliminary presentation of the agreement to Parliament.

THE EASTERN SOUDAN.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what is the present position of affairs in the Eastern Soudan, and in particular whether the famine is still raging there; and whether Her Majesty's Government see any hopes of effecting a pacification of the country which may prevent the recurrence of hostilities near Suakin, and lead to the re-opening of the trade route from Suakin to Berber?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The latest Reports show that there is still much insecurity in the Eastern Soudan. The scarcity at the principal places has weakened the Dervish forces. Extreme distress is said to exist at Kassala. There are Dervish detachments still at Tokar and Handoub who control the districts adjoining and make occasional raids. Measures of relief will probably be necessary for the destitute people about Suakin for several months longer, but not to the same extent as at first. Work is given to those able to do it; the sick are treated in hospital; there have been many deaths. The Soudan Trading Company have made preliminary agreements with Native Chiefs for the cultivation of cotton and with a view to open the trade route to Berber; but it is too early yet to judge what the result is likely to be.

THE EGYPTIAN CONVERSION SCHEME.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Despatches from the French and Egyptian Governments relating to the Conversion Scheme; and whether any financial house will be employed to issue the new bonds, and at what rate of commission?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It would be premature to lay Papers while the negotiations are still proceeding. The conversion, if effected, will be carried out by the Egyptian Government, and not by Her Majesty's Government, who are not responsible for the details of the measure. Her Majesty's Government have no information as to the arrangement for the issue of new bonds which the Egyptian Government may propose to make.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the Representatives of Newfoundland have come to discuss the Fishery Question; if he has observed that Delegates have gone to Ottawa to try to enlist the aid of the Canadian Government; and if delay is occurring in consequence of Newfoundland appealing to Canada before sending Representatives to this country?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Representatives of the Newfoundland Government have not yet started for this country, and will probably not do so until after the close of the Colonial Legislature, some time in the course of this month. No delay is occurring in consequence of other Delegates having gone to Ottawa.

SCOTCH LICENCES.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he is aware that, in Scotland, the authorities in granting licences do not confer any vested interest either in the property or in the individual upon whom the privilege of a licence is bestowed; and whether, under these circumstances, he will consider the advisability of excluding Scotland from the operation of the Compensation Clauses of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: In Scotland a vested right to trade in Exciseable liquor is conferred on the licensee; and that right may be renewed unless the Magistrates see cause to the contrary. There is nothing in the Scotch Licensing Laws which renders inapplicable to Scotland proposals for effecting on pecuniary terms the surrender of licences which are current and may be renewed; and it is manifest that these proposals are mis-described in the question as Compensation Clauses.

MR. J. WILSON: Does not the right hon. Gentleman know that the licence is for one year only, and that each year there must be a new application and a new grant by the Magistrates?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I stated that a vested right to trade is conferred on the licensee, and I added that it might be renewed unless the Magistrates saw cause to the contrary.

NON-PAUPER SCHOOL FEES.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to give facilities for the passing of the Non-Pauper School Fees Bill, or whether, considering their recent declarations with regard to assisted education, they are willing to give an assurance that some change in the present system of paying these fees shall be made at an early date?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Her Majesty's Government are in complete sympathy with the objects of the Bill to which my hon. Friend refers; but looking to the fact that any measure of assisted education must include all such cases as would come within the scope of his Bill, I hope that my hon. Friend will be satisfied with the knowledge that the Government are pledged to deal with the whole subject next year.

PRESS TELEGRAMS—CROYDON POST OFFICE.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the regulation permitting a district post office to refuse to accept a Press telegram, unless, 24 hours' previous notice of the intention to telegraph has been given, is habitually enforced at the Croydon Post Office, and notably on last Wednesday week, although there is generally a full force of operators there; and whether he will give directions that such telegrams shall, whenever it is possible, be sent, as it is frequently impossible to give the notice?

*MR. RAIKES: The Rule of the Department requires that—

"Postmasters must not, under exceptional circumstances which preclude the possibility of previous notice being given, refuse to accept messages exceeding 200 words, provided that there is a probability of their being transmitted without delay."

This Rule has, I fear, been misinterpreted at the Post Office in Croydon, and I have now caused suitable instructions to be issued to the officials employed there.

POST OFFICE AT BOOTLE.

COLONEL SANDYS (Lancashire, S.W., Bootle): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there would be any objection to grant a separate General Post Office, distinct from the Liverpool Post Office, to the Borough County of Bootle, in Lancashire, which has 54,000 inhabitants at the present time and is increasing; such change of postal arrangements being desired by many persons residing there?

*MR. RAIKES: A similar application for the establishment of a Head Post Office at Bootle was very carefully considered some years ago, and it was found that no advantage to the public in the way of postal or telegraph facilities would be afforded by the change, while it would involve additional expense, and would also be inconvenient as a Departmental arrangement. I will, however, inquire if there is any change in the circumstances since that time which would render it desirable to establish a Head Post Office at Bootle.

THE NEW CODE.

MR. LEWIS FRY (Bristol, N.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, under the New Code, there will be two species of instruction in drawing in elementary schools; (1) to satisfy Article

85 (b) of the Code, and not entitling to a special grant for drawing; and (2) the usual drawing course under the Science and Art Department; or whether it is the intention of the Department that the compulsory drawing under the New Code shall be the last-mentioned course in all cases; and, in either case, whether it is intended that all persons holding the teacher's certificate of the Education Department shall be considered eligible, irrespective of special drawing qualification, to teach and earn grants for drawing if the instruction in that subject be satisfactory?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The drawing course prescribed by the Minutes of the Science and Art Department will be the only one recognised as satisfying Article 85 (b) of the Code, but, as that Article will not come into operation until September, 1891, the Department will have time to consider what modification of the existing Minute may be necessary. So long as the instruction is satisfactory I am not disposed to insist, at any rate for some time to come, upon the possession of the (D) certificate as an essential qualification in a teacher of drawing.

WAR OFFICE CONTRACTS— EQUIPMENTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary for War why various firms have been allowed to tender for the supply of the Slade-Wallace equipment to the Army, but are not allowed to tender for its supply to the Volunteers except on payment of a royalty; whether it is the fact that large quantities of this equipment have been made for the Volunteers by Messrs. Ross; whether, in view of the intended employment of public funds for the equipment of the Volunteers, contractors who have been struck off the list of contractors to the War Office for bad work will still continue to be allowed to supply the Volunteers; and what are the terms as to royalty or other remuneration for the alleged invention on which the Slade-Wallace equipment is supplied to Her Majesty's Forces whether Regular or Volunteer?

MR. BRODRICK: Supplies for the Volunteers are purchased by the commanding officers and the War Office does not interfere, so that I do not know to what extent the Volunteers may have employed Messrs. Ross. It has been publicly and frequently announced that Messrs. Ross are off our list, and they will not be accepted by the War Office as contractors for any supplies to be obtained for the Volunteers out of public funds. A patent is claimed for the Slade-Wallace equipment, and if such patent is valid, the Volunteers demanding it are, under the opinion of the Law Officers, not entitled to avail themselves of the Crown Clauses of the Patent Act. The question of royalties is at present under consideration, and I hope that the Volunteers will be included in any arrangement made.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this subject on the Volunteer Vote.

THE EMIN PASHA RELIEF EXPEDITION.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Despatches from the French and German Governments which caused the Foreign Office to desire the Emin Relief Expedition to adopt the Congo route instead of that from the East Coast; and whether objections similar to those successfully raised by the German Government in that instance were raised by the Foreign Office before the expeditions of Major Wissman and Emin Pasha started for the interior?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There are no such Despatches; but apprehensions were verbally expressed to Lord Iddesleigh that the approach of the Expedition might endanger the safety of the French and other Europeans at Uganda. The English missionary, Mr. Mackay, pointed out that the Report of the Thompson Expedition has caused the death of Bishop Hannington. No objections were raised by the German Government. No similar objections were raised in the cases referred to in the second paragraph, seeing that assurances were spontaneously given that the British sphere of influence would not be disturbed.

BRITISH EAST AFRICAN COMPANY.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what information, if any, has reached the Foreign Office as to a Proclamation which the British East African Company is reported to have issued on 3rd May, refusing to recognise slavery within the sphere of that Company's influence?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have received as yet no information on this point.

CHATHAM CONVICT PRISON.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to Section 13 of the Report of the Visitors of Chatham Convict Prison, where it is stated—

"It does seem to be a hardship that prisoners convicted of offences committed in the neighbourhood of their homes should, as is the case with some of the prisoners detained at Chatham for offences committed in Scotland, practically be deprived of visits which they would otherwise be entitled to receive;"

and whether, as it is also stated in the Report that he will order the removal of such treason-felony prisoners as are now detained in Chatham Prison to some Scotch prison where they can receive their visits due?

"The practice of sending prisoners convicted in Scotland to prisons in England has been discontinued,"

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have seen the paragraph in question. I shall be very glad to transmit to Scotch prisons any prisoners convicted in Scotland and sent here under the old practice; and I will communicate with the Scotch Office on the subject.

PRACTICE FIRING ON THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

MR. ROE (Derby): I beg to postpone until to-morrow a question in my name, to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware of the dangerous character of the practice firing on the Isle of Wight, a shot from Totland Bay having passed immediately over the tops of the funnels of the steamship Brodrick Castle (filled with passengers on her way from Bournemouth to Ventnor) and dropped into the sea within 300 yards of the boat whilst rounding, and within two miles of, the Needles, at about noon in bright and clear weather on Tuesday the 6th of May; and if he will give orders to prevent such firing in future as may be dangerous to passing ships?

Mr. Hanbury

THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. STOREY: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Government have determined on any alteration of the policy regarding licences embodied in the Local Taxation Bill, with regard to which he stated that "the word compensation was inappropriately applied," since the President of the Board of Trade is reported to have announced at Bristol, that

"The compensation was to come either from the pockets of those who made and sold intoxicating liquors, or from the pockets of those who consumed them"?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Government have made no alteration in their policy.

MR. STOREY: Is that the policy of compensation?

*MR. RITCHIE: There is a sense in which the word "compensation" may be used with regard to payment for value received, but the ordinary sense in which "compensation" is used is in respect of compulsory acquisition, and the proposals of the Government are purely voluntary and of no other character.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in the event of any County Council not desiring to expend the funds granted to them by the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill in compensating the owners of licences, by paying money under the provisions of the measure for the extinction of licences, such County Council may use such funds for other public purposes?

*MR. RITCHIE: It is not proposed that the funds to be placed at the disposal of County Councils for the purpose of the extinction of licences should be used for any other purpose.

MR. S. EVANS: Will the county lose the benefit of the fund entirely?

*MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir, the money will stand to the credit of the county.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will lay upon the Table a Statement showing the local taxation licences collected in each administrative county and county burgh for the year ending 31st March, 1890?

*MR. RITCHIE: I hope to be in a position to lay such a Statement upon the Table early in June.

THE POSTAL SERVICES.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can inform the House what is the net profit to the country of the Postal Services, and what proportion of this profit is due to the Home Postal Service and what to the Foreign and Colonial?

*MR. RAIKES: The net profit to the country upon the Post Office for the year 1888-89 was £3,039,874, as given in the Appendix Q, page 61, of the Postmaster General's Report, 1889. It cannot be stated precisely what proportion of this profit is due to the Home Postal Service and what to the Foreign and Colonial Services; but from a Return which I have before me I find that the estimated present Imperial loss on the Colonial Sea Services amounts to about £254,000 a year, and this loss is independent and apart from the loss on Foreign Mail Services, on which I have no precise information.

JOHN DALY.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when an opportunity will be afforded of discussing the Report as to the treatment of John Daly and the other treason-felony prisoners in Chatham Prison; when will the English Prisons Vote be taken; can he now give his promised answer as to removing these prisoners from Chatham; what recommendations made by the Report have been acted on; and will the Scotch prisoners be re-transferred to a Scotch prison, so that their relatives may be able to visit them?

MR. MATTHEWS: A full opportunity for discussing this Report will arise on the English Prisons Vote, which will be taken in its order on the Estimates. The Visitors have not recommended the removal of the treason-felony prisoners, and I know of no reason why they should be removed. Chatham is the prison reserved for the class to which these prisoners belong, namely, those who are serving a first sentence. The recommendations of the Report have all been attended to; some were already the practice of the prison. I have already stated that I will communicate with the Scotch Office, with a view to the transfer, not of Scotch prisoners, but of prisoners convicted in Scotland.

THE LUNACY ACT.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether the Justices appointed under "The Lunacy Act, 1889," have jurisdiction to make orders under "The Lunacy Act, 1890," or whether it is necessary that they should be reappointed under the later Act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The Justices appointed under the Lunacy Act, 1889, have jurisdiction to make orders under the Lunacy Act, 1890; the jurisdiction established under the Act of 1889 was expressly preserved by Section 342 of the Consolidation Act. I understand that some doubts have been raised; and I think it very important that it should be clearly understood that Justices have the same jurisdiction under the existing Act as they had under the previous Statutes.

NATIONAL GALLERY—MR. TATE'S PICTURES.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Trustees of the National Gallery have accepted the fine collection of pictures offered to the Nation by Mr. Tate; whether any special conditions were attached to the offer, and whether increased accommodation will be provided so that this representative series of works by modern English painters shall be properly displayed; and whether there is any objection to laying the correspondence that has taken place on the subject upon the Table of the House?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I asked the hon. Member last week to postpone this question, hoping that I should be in a position to give him a more definite answer, but I regret that hope has not been realised; and as the correspondence on this subject is still going on, all I am able to say is that the Government trust to be able to make arrangements by which it will be possible for the nation to avail themselves of Mr Tate's most generous offer.

HIGH SHERIFFS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can inform the House whether the Government intend to bring in a Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Lords in favour of abolishing the present system of nominating High Sheriffs, and substituting therefor the appointment of a paid officer in each county?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Committee of the House of Lords recommended that the High Sheriffs be appointed as hitherto, but that the necessary expenses of receiving the Judges should be paid by the Treasury and county conjointly. The Government do not expect themselves to be able to introduce a Bill on the subject this Session, but it is not unlikely that one will be introduced.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY COMMISSION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government will advise Her Majesty to appoint to serve on the Royal Commission on Westminster Abbey an architect who is not a member of the Royal Academy of Arts; and whether the Commission will have power to consider the expediency of removing or altering the sites of statues and monuments which have been erected in the Abbey?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are not prepared to act on the suggestion of my right hon. Friend, as they are satisfied that the Royal Commission, as at present constituted, is perfectly competent to advise on the delicate and difficult questions submitted to them, which are by no means limited to architectural considerations. With regard to the second question of my right hon. Friend, I should hold that "the inquiry into the present state of the Abbey" must include the sites of existing statues and monuments, and that the Commissioners would not be precluded from making any suggestions with regard to them which they might deem expedient.

Mr. W. H. Smith

MARKET CORN RETURNS.

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state the annual cost of collecting the Market Corn Returns?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Except a small charge for the salaries of Inspectors at London and Cambridge, and the rents of stalls in markets, the cost of collecting the Corn Returns is included in the salaries of the officers of the Inland Revenue; but the work represents so small a proportion of the duty of each officer that the charge for it cannot be estimated.

WEST AUSTRALIAN CONSTITUTION BILL.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the time during which the West Australian Delegates have already been detained in this country, he will name an early day for the next stage of the West Australian Constitution Bill?

MR. WATT: I also beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government are prepared to accept the Report of the Select Committee on the Western Australian Constitution Bill; and whether he can state when they propose to proceed with the Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to the question of the right hon. Member for Newcastle, and of the hon. Member for Glasgow, I have to say that we are anxious to proceed rapidly with the Western Australia Constitution Bill, but looking to the other business of a pressing character before the House, I am not able to name a day. In reply to the question whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to accept the Report of the Select Committee, I have to state that we will not seek to re-introduce Clause 4, by which the Northern territory was reserved. We undertook that the question should be thoroughly threshed out by a Select Committee. A strong Committee was therefore appointed, and after hearing evidence it was agreed, without a Division, that the Clause should be omitted. As to Clause 8, which provides that any Bill imposing restrictions on emigration of British subjects must be reserved for signification of Her Majesty's pleasure, Her Majesty's Government, looking to the fact that the omission of the clause was only carried in the Committee by a majority of two, think it would be well, in deference to a feeling which has been strongly expressed here, that this clause should be re-introduced. At the same time, they do not believe that the Colonial Legislature will seek to impose any restriction upon emigration from this country.

THE SWEATING SYSTEM.

MR. BAUMANN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords on the Sweating System makes sundry recommendations for the alteration of the Law, which are contained in the Factory and Workshop Act Amendment Bill, now before the House, he will give facilities for the Second Reading of that Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Bill of the hon. Member contains clauses to which the Government could not assent, and which are not covered by the recommendations of the Sweating Committee, and I am not prepared, therefore, to promise facilities for the Bill. The question is one that the Government are quite prepared to deal with, and they hope that time may be found for the consideration of a measure during the present Session.

EDUCATION OF BLIND AND DEAF AND DUMB CHILDREN.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the promised Bills will be introduced on the subject of the Education of Blind and Deaf and Dumb Children?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: A Bill on the subject of the Education of the Blind and Deaf and Dumb has been drafted by the Education Department, and is now under the consideration of other Departments which are concerned in the question. The Bill will shortly be introduced in another place.

MR. BUCHANAN: Will it apply to the United Kingdom?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes.

THE EDUCATION CODE.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): May I ask when the Education Code will come on for discussion?

SIR W. HART DYKE: The Education Code has been laid on the Table for some time, and I hope, in the course of a few days, to be able to name a day for its discussion.

IRISH DISPENSARY MEDICAL OFFICERS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Irish Dispensary Medical Officers are required to reside in their Dispensary Districts, and if so, why Mr. J. M. Ambrose, M.R.C.S.E., Dispensary Medical Officer to the Ardagh District, in the Newcastle West Union, is not compelled to comply with the Rule; and whether any complaints have been made to the Local Government Board with respect to the inconvenience experienced in the Ardagh District in consequence of Mr. Ambrose not residing therein?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I beg to refer the hon. Member to the replies given to questions put by him in this House on the 13th and 20th December, 1888, on the subject-matter of the first paragraph. No complaints appear to have reached the Local Government Board since that time.

POST OFFICE AT CORDUFF.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a Memorial from the inhabitants, numbering about 400 families, of Corduff, County Monaghan, asking for the establishment of a post office; whether he has caused inquiry to be made at the Carrickmacross, Shantonagh, and Corvally Post Offices, all situate several miles distant from Corduff, to ascertain the number of letters and other communications which pass through those offices for the Corduff district; and whether he intends opening an office at Corduff?

*MR. RAIKES: I think I answered on the 17th ultimo a similar question to this put by the hon. Member. Some further inquiry is being made on the subject, but I fear there is no prospect of a post office being opened at Corduff.

MR. P. NALLY.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that Mr. P. Nally was arrested on 23rd May, 1883, and was brought up for trial in July, 1883, but put back for trial at the Winter Assizes, the venue having been changed to a county 100 miles distant from his own; that he was then tried before a special jury under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, and that this jury disagreed; that he was again tried by a special jury under the same Act in 1884, and then sentenced to 10 years' penal servitude; if, between the date of his arrest and final trial, application was made that he should be admitted to bail, and if the presiding Judges of the Queen's Bench, in refusing the bail, remarked that, if he were convicted, the time between his arrest and his committal would be considered in the enforcement of his sentence; if, under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that the then Chief Secretary for Ireland, in answer to a question, declared that all such prisoners kept back from trial, and not admitted to bail, would, if convicted, be allowed a remission of their sentences equivalent to the time of their detention, and considering that the maximum sentence was demanded, the Queen, or his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, will be advised to remit, in the sentence of Mr. P. Nally, a portion of such sentence as may be equivalent to the period that elapsed between his arrest and conviction; and if he is aware that a considerable number of citizens in the Counties of Galway and Mayo, have expressed their opinion that Mr. P. Nally was incapable of committing the crime laid to his charge, and was convicted on more than doubtful evidence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts appear to be substantially as stated in the first paragraph of the question, with the exception that the proceedings with regard to the jury and change of venue were under the Crimes Act of 1882, and not the Statute of more recent date quoted. There is no ground, so far as I am aware, for believing that the presiding Judge, on hearing the bail application on behalf of the prisoner, and the others who were charged on the same occasion, made the remark attributed to him. I have no information that the then Chief Secretary made a declaration bearing on the case as suggested. Memorials have been received on behalf of this convict of the nature mentioned in the last paragraph. These Memorials have been before successive Lords Lieutenant, including the present Viceroy, and the decision come to has been that there is no ground for a remission of any portion of the sentence.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: If the remarks attributed to the Judges are correct, will the right hon. Gentleman reconsider the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should be quite willing to consider any new facts that may be brought forward.

FAIR RENTS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that for the hearing of fair rent cases in County Clare a list was issued for the months of April and May without any date specified on which the Sub-Commissioners would sit, that the lay Commissioners visited the holdings of the tenants whose cases were listed before they were heard in Court, and that the sitting was held without any official intimation to the solicitors either for landlords or tenants; is it the fact that the Chief Commission issued a list of appeal hearing for County Clare for the 13th May, that an official valuer visited the lands of those whose appeals were listed, and that the result of his valuation was communicated from the head office to the tenants with a request that if they wished to proceed or withdraw their appeal to fill up the accompanying form, and notifying to them the fact that the list of the improvements taken by the Sub-Commission, which was the basis of the valuation arrived at by the official valuer, could be procured at the cost of 1s. from the head office, and that at the foot was given the "net valuation" of "holding referred to in this letter;" is he aware that several of the tenants, believing that this valuation was to be their future rent, forwarded the notice filled up, withdrawing their appeals, and others were so confused by the receipt of it that they were obliged to travel long journeys to consult their solicitors as to its bearing on their case; that a revised list of appeals has now been issued for Clare, which was first of all sent to the landlords and then to the professional gentlemen engaged; and will the Land Commissioners take note of the dissatisfaction caused by these practices?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: (1) The Land Commissioners report that a list of fair rent cases for hearing in the Poor Law Union of Ennis was sent to all the parties concerned, with a notice on the first page that the date of commencement would be subsequently notified. That notification was sent some days afterwards to the parties or their solicitors in regard to the first 60 cases on the list which were then fixed for hearing on the 21st April. All the parties noticed appeared on that day. A few of the holdings on the list were inspected before the hearing in Court, a proper course to adopt when the Assistant Commissioners have time at their disposal. (2) The preliminary list of appeals referred to in the second paragraph was issued by the Chief Commission. Their official valuer has not yet reported the result of his valuations on that list, and therefore no communication has been sent to the parties concerned in those cases; but after that list had been issued the official valuer reported the result of his valuations in another portion of the county, and the Chief Commissioners in each of these cases communicated the result of such valuation to the appellant and his solicitor. (3 and 5) The Commissioners have no reason to believe that the contents of the notice were misunderstood, or that the parties themselves are dissatisfied with the course adopted, which has been to place them as early as possible in possession of the results of the valuation. (4) They also report that it is not the case that the revised list was first sent to the landlords as alleged.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is there any objection to the Land Commissioners appending to their Report a notification to the tenants—who are mostly ignorant men—that they are not bound to accept the result of the valuation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will communicate the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member to the Land Commissioners.

LEASEHOLDERS' IMPROVEMENTS IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if the attention of the Government has been called to the state of the law affecting leaseholders' improvements as laid down by the Land Commission in "O'Neill v. Cooper," and the exclusion of tenants from the Land Act where the lettings were by owners under limited powers, as decided by the Appeal Court in "Massey v. Norse"; and whether they will consider the advisability of amending the law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, University of Dublin): The former of the two cases referred to in the question of the hon. and learned Gentleman applied to the particular circumstances of the case a general principle laid down in previous decisions—namely, that the right of exemption from rent in respect of improvements under the Acts of 1881 and 1887 is co-extensive with the right to compensation in respect of improvements under the Act of 1870. In the latter case, "Massey v. Norse," it was held that a lease made by two tenants for life under a settlement, without leasing power, for the term of their lives, expired with their estates, and was not by any provision in the Act of 1881 made to affect the estate of the remainderman under the settlement. It is apparent that these questions could not be dealt with without re-considering principles laid down and adopted in the Acts of 1881 and 1887; and, apart altogether from the merits of his suggestions, the hon. and learned Gentleman will, I trust, recognise that the Government cannot add to their existing engagements by undertaking any legislation in relation to these Acts.

LIGHT RAILWAYS.

MR. STOREY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any projects under "The Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889," have yet been agreed to by the Treasury; if so, which,

and what amount in each case of public money is to be given, and what lent?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The time required to carry out the procedure required by the Light Railways Acts of 1883 and 1889 has rendered it impossible finally to conclude any arrangement. Progress has been made with the detailed examination of plans and other preliminaries concerning a mileage of railway more than sufficient to absorb all the money available; and some schemes are in a very forward state indeed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will any opportunity be afforded for discussion in this House before the money is granted, or will the decision of the Treasury be the first intimation we have of what money is granted, or what schemes have been approved?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that any opportunity will be afforded to this House for discussing schemes. As the hon. and learned Member is aware, every scheme has already been threshed out in an elaborate manner in this House and before the Grand Juries.

MR. STOREY: Is one of the schemes in Galway?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that anything will be gained by dwelling upon particular instances.

THE SHANNON FISHERIES.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick City): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps do the Government propose taking to safeguard the interests of the Shannon Fisheries, which the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries declare, in their recent Report, are being seriously injured by works of excavation and destruction of spawning beds now in progress at Killaloe; and whether the Government propose to take any action with regard to the criticisms of the Board of Works, under the heading, "Observations," on the findings on oath of the Inspectors of Fisheries in their Report?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A further communication has been received from the Limerick Board of Conservators in reference to the conflict of opinion which exists as to the probable effect of the works on the Fisheries, and that communication is now under the consideration of the Irish Government.

Mr. Storey

RATHKEALE DISPENSARY.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, in August last, there was a vacancy for the office of apothecary in Rathkeale Dispensary, County Limerick, and that advertisements were duly published, which stated that candidates were required to have the qualification of "apothecary;" that there were only two applicants, one of whom was not qualified as an apothecary; that the latter, notwithstanding his want of the qualification, was elected by a majority of the Dispensary Committee, but the election was set aside by the Local Government Board; if he can explain why, under the circumstances, Mr. Cahill, the other candidate who, as the only applicant qualified in accordance with the requirement of the advertisement, was refused the appointment, why another election was ordered, and the new advertisement so framed as to render the formerly disqualified candidate eligible for election; whether he was elected; and what precedent there was for so acting under the circumstances?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts are substantially as stated in the first paragraph. Mr. Cahill did not obtain the requisite majority of votes, and his claim to be elected could not be admitted. It was, therefore, necessary to proceed to a new election, and, on the application of the Dispensary Committee, it was declared that the appointment might be filled by either an apothecary or a Pharmaceutical Chemist. Mr. Whelan, who holds the diploma of a Pharmaceutical Chemist, was elected in September. The Local Government Board have sanctioned the appointment of Pharmaceutical Chemists to discharge the duties of apothecaries in several Unions in Ireland.

THE FUNERAL OF MR. HARRIS, M.P.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to postpone for my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) a question which stands in his name, to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he can now make his promised statement as to the conduct of the police at Ballinasloe on the occasion of the funeral of Mr. Harris, M.P.

BAIL PRISONERS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether bail prisoners confined in first-class prisons in Ireland are entitled to be provided with a room, instead of a cell, on their making application; and if it is true that first-class misdemeanants are so provided, and permitted to receive visits from their friends in a room, and not in the visiting room termed "the cage?"

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that bail prisoners are entitled to all the privileges of untried prisoners. The hon. Member will find the information he seeks contained in the Return of Irish Prison Rules and Regulations laid upon the Table of this House during the Session of 1888.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Do the Prisons Board deny that bail prisoners are entitled to all the privileges of first-class misdemeanants?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: They do not appear to have been asked that question, but I will inquire if the hon. Member wishes.

SKIBBEREEN CUSTOM HOUSE.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that owing to the transference of the Custom House from Skibbereen to Bantry very great inconvenience and injury are caused to the Baltimore fishing industry; whether, according to existing Customs arrangements in Skibbereen, the Deputy Officer of Customs in that town is unable to give permission for the discharge of cargoes of ice absolutely essential for the preservation of the fish caught by the Baltimore fishermen, and also that it is impossible for him to obtain permission by telegraph from Bantry to do so, and whether, in consequence, steamers for conveying the fish have to wait at Baltimore the arrival from Bantry, 24 miles distant, of the Superintendent of Customs; and whether he will take steps to have abated the inconvenience complained of, by restoring the Custom House to the Skibbereen district?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am informed that it is not the fact that very great inconvenience and injury have been caused to the Baltimore fishing industry through the transference of the principal Customs Offices for the Port of Skibbereen from Skibbereen to Bantry. The Board of Customs have ascertained that no delay has been caused by this change in the discharge of any vessels, nor need any delay or inconvenience be occasioned thereby, as the Officer of Customs still stationed at Skibbereen is now empowered to deal with any Customs business, there or at Baltimore, that may require attention, under exactly the same conditions as were in force previous to the change referred to. No occasion has, therefore, arisen for making any alterations in the present arrangements.

LIEUTENANT WILCOX, R.N.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he is aware that Mr. Wilcox, Lieutenant R.N. and Coastguard Officer at Spanish Point, Miltown Malbay, County Clare, acts as local agent for the Army and Navy Co-operative Stores, and has a shop fitted up and stocked in the locality, selling, amongst other things, wine, spirits, and tobacco; and if such conduct is in accordance with the regulations of the Admiralty; and, if not, whether instructions will be issued to Lieutenant Wilcox to desist from his present practices?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone the question. I have not yet received the information.

POLICE WATCHING.

MR. FLYNN (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the newspaper reports of the manner in which Messrs. E. O'Brien, P.L.G. and James O'Brien were constantly followed by police constables at the last Midleton and Killeagh (County Cork) fairs; and whether this system of watching by the police at fairs and markets in Ireland will be allowed to continue; and, if so, will instructions be given to the Constabulary Authorities not to permit it to be exercised against individuals when engaged on their own private business transactions at fairs or elsewhere?

MR. GILL (Louth, S.): I also beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that great inconvenience is caused to persons visiting the markets in Drogheda by the shadowing of the police, who interfere with people in the transaction of their lawful business, and whether he will state the reason for such action by the police, and cause it to be discontinued?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the persons referred to were known to be actively engaged in endeavouring to boycott the sale of cattle by persons who had rendered themselves obnoxious by taking evicted farms, &c., or by having dealings with so-called obnoxious persons. The police have instructions to watch all persons engaged in this illegal practice, and to make them amenable to the law when possible. So long as the illegal system is pursued the police will continue to discharge this duty.

MR. FLYNN: Will the right hon. Gentleman direct the constabulary to issue instructions that when a man is transacting his own business in ordinary buying and selling, he shall not be interfered with?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no desire on the part of the Constabulary Authorities to interfere with any man engaged in the ordinary transaction of his business.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that, on the 7th instant, in the town of Tipperary, Mr. Robert Paul Gill, engineer, of New Tipperary, was accompanied by two policemen named Maddock and Gurry, who walked alongside of, and keeping step with him; whether Mr. Gill asked the policemen had they any business with him, and again would they persist in accompanying him in the same manner; whether Gurry said to Maddock, "Answer no more questions, we will do what we like," and continued to accompany Mr. Gill; and whether this procedure of the policemen is according to any special instructions to the police of Tipperary?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry that I am not able to answer the question of the hon. Member at present.

THE BELFAST MAGISTRATES.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, as there are two Stipendiary Magistrates for the city of Belfast, he could state on what ground those gentlemen leave the Court in charge of a Local Justice on Fridays, one of the most important days for hearing cases; and, as the business of the Court on that day is disposed of in a way eminently unsatisfactory to the general public and the members of the legal profession at present, would he give directions that in future the Resident Magistrates must not leave the dispensing of justice exclusively in the hands of Local Justices on Friday or any other day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: According to the Report I have received the Resident Magistrates referred to appear to attend the Court regularly on all the days of the week, Friday included, and they have only been absent on exceptional occasions which were unavoidable; so that there seems to be some misapprehension on the part of my hon. Friend in regard to the case.

PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN.

MR. MURPHY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what steps are being taken about the band stand in Phoenix Park, Dublin, which it was promised would be erected by the Board of Works; and when will it be commenced and completed?

MR. JACKSON: Tenders have been called for, and the work can be put in hand as soon as the money is voted by Parliament.

MR. G. SANDES, J.P.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland what has been the result of the inquiry on the part of the Lord Chancellor into the conduct of Mr. G. Sandes, J.P., for the County of Kerry, and whether he has been superseded in the Commission of the Peace?

MR. MADDEN: The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, having carefully inquired into and considered all the circumstances of the case, came to the conclusion that the repute and usefulness of the gentleman referred to were so affected that in the public interest he ought no longer to be retained in the Magistracy, and the Lord Chancellor has accordingly directed that his name be omitted from the Commission of the Peace.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): When was the decision arrived at?

MR. MADDEN: Sometime last month.

MR. CLANCY: Yet last week the Chief Secretary said that he knew nothing about it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was not my business to know anything about it. It rested entirely with the Lord Chancellor, who told me last Saturday the decision he had come to. That, however, was subsequently to the question to which the hon. Member refers.

THE CONVICT M'CAFFREY.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now state for what periods the convict prisoner M'Caffrey has been punished by solitary confinement, or otherwise, since his return to Downpatrick Gaol from London, where he had been brought as a witness?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report five cases of punishment. Perhaps it would be more convenient if I show the Return to the hon. Member. He can then ask a further question if he wishes to do so. I am, however, quite willing to read out the reply in the House if the hon. Member wishes it.

THE CROWN SOLICITOR FOR DONEGAL.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any decision has yet been come to regarding Mr. John Mackey, Sessional Crown Solicitor for Donegal, who, at Ramelton, on 29th March, admitted on oath having struck and wounded Mr. Hugh Hegarty with a naked sword, upon the suspicion that he had broken a pane of glass?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand legal proceedings are pending against this gentleman. The Government must await the result of those proceedings.

TREATMENT OF IRISH PRISONERS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the treatment of Mr. Daly, of Carrickmacross, on his way to Belfast Gaol, whether he is aware that Mr. Robert Dunlop, T.C., Belfast, who was convicted of forgery and of insurance frauds, was transferred from Belfast to Derry Gaol in his own clothes and that no attempt was made to handcuff him; and why such different treatment was given to Mr. Daly and his friends, who were convicted of boycotting only, and who were obliged to wear prison clothes and handcuffs on their way to Belfast Gaol from Derry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: These gentlemen had the option of wearing their own clothes on their original reception in the prison, but they elected to wear the prison dress. Mr. Dunlop was not handcuffed, because no difficulty was expected in regard to him.

THE LAND COMMISSION—RETURNS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the Return of Sittings of the Irish Land Commission, ordered 24th April, may be expected to be distributed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Return was laid on the Table of the House to-day.

THE IRISH ESTATES' SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now give the reply promised before Easter as to the re-appointment of the Select Committee on the sale and management of the Irish Estates of the City Companies in County Derry?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The names of the proposed Select Committee on the Irish Estates of the City Companies in County Derry will be placed on the Paper to-night.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER'S SPEECH AT RAWTENSTALL.

MR. STOREY: I desire to put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of which I have given him private notice. The right hon. Gentleman was down in Lancashire last evening with a noble Lord who sits upon the Opposition side of the House, and he is reported to have said in the course of his speech—

“Then we have been endeavouring to pass the Allotments Bill, a small Bill which ought to have been passed in three or four hours.”

“They,” meaning the Liberal Party,

“Have endeavoured to smother the Bill with Amendments.”

And further on—

“Keep your eyes on these murderous intentions. We know this—that our opponents do not care to prove that which is dear to our hearts—namely, the competence of the Imperial Parliament for the work which it has to do. They do not care about losing the reputation, about imperilling the reputation of that House.”

—the House of Commons. The question I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman is whether, when he made that speech, he was aware that there were only 32 Amendments on the Allotments Bill, and that only 12 of those were moved by hon. Members belonging to the right hon. Gentleman's opponents, while no less than 20 were moved by his own political friends? Is the right hon. Gentleman also aware that after the Bill had been discussed upon parts of two days only, there now remain upon the Notice Paper only 12 Amendments, six of which proceed from the Liberal Party, and six from the right hon. Gentleman's own supporters? If the right hon. Gentleman is referring not to Amendments but to Instructions, does he not think that it would have been fair to have told his hearers, when denouncing the opponents of the measure for endeavouring to smother the Bill, that a working arrangement had been made by which only one Instruction was left upon the Paper, and, finally, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman what reparation and what compensation he intends to make to the Liberal Party for what I cannot help characterising as a political libel upon them?

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I should like to ask another question, which the right hon. Gentleman will be able to answer without notice, and it is whether he is aware that practically the whole time devoted to this Bill at the Morning Sitting on Tuesday was taken up by two Amendments, of which one was accepted by the Government, and the other was moved by an hon. Member on the Ministerial side of the House?

Mr. Storey

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): No passage of the kind which the hon. Member has read can be fairly interpreted without the context. What I stated was this, that there was practically a new form of obstruction, and that was that, instead of attacking Bills in front, it was now endeavoured to delay and defeat them by smothering them, and that I called a murderous process, because it was equivalent to the killing of a Bill. The hon. Member himself has seen what was in my mind. This simple Allotments Bill was to be met by nine Instructions, and if ever there was evidence of an intolerable attempt to smother a Bill, I think it was supplied by the case of a Bill of that kind to which nine Instructions were put on the Paper. Presumably they were not bogus Instructions, and it was intended to move them. If they had been moved they would have smothered the Bill; without any doubt whatever, it would have been impossible to carry the Bill if these Instructions had been moved, because they would have absorbed infinitely more time than possibly could have been given to the Bill. That was obvious to the right hon. Member for Derby, and it was obvious to Mr. Speaker. The hon. Gentleman asks me whether I am aware they were removed. I am aware they were removed, under, I will not say the reprimand of the Speaker, but under words which fell from the Speaker, and which were to the effect that if this new system were pursued, it would be utterly impossible to proceed with legislation. I repeat, I think it is a simple Bill, which might have been passed in a very much shorter time. It is not a question of the number of Amendments, and of the time devoted to the discussion of each; but I am sorry to say—and if hon. Members think I misrepresented them with regard to this Bill in any way, I express my regret—I do consider the placing of these Instructions on the Paper fully justified the spirit of what I said, if not the actual words I used.

MR. STOREY: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman, and I should be glad if he would supplement his reply on one point only, and tell us plainly whether he believes that the Liberal Party—"our opponents" as he calls us—do not care about imperilling the reputation of this House?

*MR. GOSCHEN: This is not a usual form of cross examination, but I will answer straightly and frankly, I say there is a Party in this House opposed to us, who are not anxious for the quick discharge of the business of the House, and who wish to prove the inefficiency of this House for the discharge of the general duties that devolve upon it. It has been avowed more than once in this House, and I say, again, that whenever any allusion is made to the fact that we cannot get through the business, it is met with loud cheers in various parts of the House opposite, as if to prove that the House is incompetent to discharge its duties.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is not aware that the Chairman of Ways and Means, at Easter, informed his constituents and the public that the House of Commons had done its business very well?

*MR. SPEAKER: There is no Question before the House.

THE LAND PURCHASE BILL.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: May I ask whether the Government propose to take the advice given last night by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, and to drop certain portions of the Land Purchase Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman will be surprised to hear that I have not been able in the course of the day to read that advice.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): Will the Army Estimates be taken before the Whitsuntide recess, and will the Barracks Bill be proceeded with to-night?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid it will not be possible to bring on the Barracks Bill this evening, nor can the Army Estimates be taken before Whitsuntide.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.—(No. 231.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

(440.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The question raised by the Instruction I am about to move is one of considerable gravity to the Division which I have the honour to represent. I trust that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not be prejudiced against the subject because it is brought forward in the shape of an Instruction, and I hope it will be considered in a non-contentious spirit. A Bill embodying a similar provision was read a second time in 1879, with the approval of a Conservative Government, and the then Secretary to the Treasury, the hon. Baronet the Member for the Epping Division of Essex, said he saw no objection to the proposal. The Bill was also supported by Mr. Wheelhouse, a staunch advocate of the Licensed Victuallers interest, by the Member for Carlisle, and by Irish Members, Conservative and Liberal. Seeing that the Government are now imposing a heavy duty on spirits, what objection can there be to breaking the blow inflicted on Ireland and Scotland by adopting this proposal? If consumers are to pay more for their whisky, they ought, at any rate, to be sure of getting a better article for the money. I do not ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to at once express a definite opinion on this subject. I shall be content if he says his mind is open to consider it when the Bill is in Committee. There is, of course, the question of rectifying. It is true rectifiers may have some objection to the proposal. A rectifier wants new whisky for his purposes, but I think this difficulty would be met if he were allowed to rectify in bond. Now, we import millions of gallons of German spirits at the present time, and the whisky distillers of Scotland and Ireland have no protection against this spirit, which is sold at 1s. 6d. This is a crying evil, which is going on under the eyes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself. The Chancellor of the Exchequer comes down to the House to propose an addition of 6d. per gallon to the tax on spirits, and I may say comes here reeking with German spirits—in this sense, that there being a drawback now allowed of 2d. per gallon on all spirits sent abroad, in order that German spirits should not get the benefit of that Jubilee drawback, Excise officers are appointed not only to watch the blending of spirits, and to see the blending of the German spirits with the English, Irish, and Scotch spirits, but to see that our whisky, which is sent abroad, plus the German spirits, does not enjoy the benefit of the drawback. That, I say, is in reality a fraud, or rather a recognition of fraud, because these German spirits are sent abroad as English, Irish, and Scotch spirits, while all the time the Chancellor of the Exchequer has men who are watching the fraud, and whose duty it is to protect the Revenue, and see that these German spirits do not get the benefit of the drawback. How, I ask, does the Merchandise Marks Act work for home protection in other matters? I read the other day that a revolver was being sent from Birmingham to Mexico, and finding that although it was made in Birmingham or Sheffield, or in some other part of this country, it was marked as an American revolver, Her Majesty's Government would not allow the Mexicans to be defrauded by having that revolver marked as of American manufacture, whereas it was of English origin. I ask why do you not treat the whisky in the same way as you treat other articles, especially when you are so alarmed at the idea that the Mexicans should be allowed to shoot each other with fraudulent revolvers? I do not think it would matter very much to a Mexican whether he was killed by an American or English revolver; but if you are going to be so careful in regard to a matter of this sort, I say you ought to exhibit the same amount of caution with regard to spirits. The protection of the Merchandise Marks Act is not given to these manufactures because they happen to be liquids, and the Government allow the system of blending to go on for the benefit of the Germans, and to the detriment of the native taxpayer. I think you would, to a large extent, check this fraud if my proposal were adopted; but the result would be that the

Germans would have to bring their spirits over here to cool for a whole twelvemonth in bond, the 1s. 6d. stuff thus greatly benefiting by the air in which it would remain for that period. One consequence of this would be that the Germans would not be likely to send over here spirits that would have to be retained in bond for so long a time. Doubtless there might be some loss to the Revenue, but the pocket of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is one thing, while the stomachs of the lieges are another, and the right hon. Gentleman ought to do all he can to prevent needless adulteration. But there is another point. I have not argued the merits of the question, because everybody admits the merits. The Reports that have been presented amply show the great benefits that would accrue from the adoption of a proposal of this sort. Well, let me ask what are the objections? First, however, I should say on behalf of the Irish distillers, who have a high reputation, I believe they would all gladly welcome this proposal. Take a man like John Jamieson. His spirit is never drunk until it is seven years old, although it would, undoubtedly, be far better when only 24 hours of age than some of the German stuff would be if kept for 24 years. However, the German spirit is never allowed to attain its majority. I say the respectable distillers would welcome a proposal of this kind, because they already carry out its principle in their own practice; and the objections that may be urged on the ground of storage will not lie on their account. With regard to the less reputable distillers—though I ought hardly to say that, and should more appropriately term them the distillers of less capital—it is possible that some of them might object to Government storage. I was lately reading a Return obtained by Mr. Board in 1877, and, as far as I could gather from that, there is annually stored in bond no less than 40,000,000 of gallons of spirits. I do not know how the Scotch distillers view my proposal, but I know that some of the Scotch Members are in favour of it. Looking at the matter as a whole, it can only be a question of a very few additional officers of Excise, and perhaps a small additional cost to the Treasury. I put it to the Government that, without adopting the motto of Mr.

Disraeli, "Health before everything," they ought to do something for the consumer, especially as he is now having an additional tax imposed upon him. Nobody recommends the drinking of whisky, and I am not putting the matter in that sense, because I think it would be much better for everybody to do without it, but, at the same time, we know that there are oceans of stuff sold under the name of whisky which would not be available if this Instruction were adopted, and I am convinced that its acceptance would do a great deal towards promoting the interests of law and order. Many of the crimes now committed are perpetrated under the maddening influences, not of ordinary drink, but of the adulterated liquids that are allowed to be sold. I hope I have said nothing of a controversial nature, and I trust the Government will see their way to do something towards protecting the people on whom the tax they are imposing will fall. I do not say that some distillers may not have objections to my proposal; but, in my opinion, if the distilling interests of Scotland are opposed to the Bill their views ought not to prevail; because we have the consumer to consider more than the manufacturer. I think the Government might regard favourably a proposal like this, which had the assent of a Conservative Government in 1879. I do not know whether the hon. Member for South Tyrone is opposed to spirits in bond or out of bond; but I think anybody who has considered the question must deplore the kind of whisky which everybody must agree the poorer people have to consume. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will, in the interest of the consumer, give attention to this proposal.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert a provision that spirits be kept in bond for a year after manufacture."—(Mr T. M. Healy.)

(7.57.) MR. SEAGER HUNT (Marylebone, W.): Mr. Speaker, with a great many of the remarks of the hon. Member I cordially agree, but his proposal would be calculated to cause very great inconvenience to the rectifier. It is by the very process of rectification that impurities of this kind are removed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The rectification could be carried on in bond.

MR. SEAGER HUNT: But that would necessitate an alteration in the present system of working. I would go further than the hon. and learned Gentleman goes, because if keeping the whisky in bond improves it, I think it should be kept in bond for at least seven years.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should be delighted.

MR. SEAGER HUNT: But the spirit bonded by the malt distillers would have to be distinguished from that of the whisky distillers, and the former should certainly be sent out of bond as soon as possible. If the hon. Member will agree to that, I am prepared to support his Motion. Before I sit down I should like to call attention to the quantity of impure spirits imported into this country—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not permitted to travel outside the actual discussion on spirits in bond for one year.

*(5.0.) MR. GOSCHEN: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly disposed to view the proposal of the hon. Member for Longford in a favourable manner. The question has been brought before me before, and I take a great interest in it. There is a great desire that spirits should be kept longer in bond, but a distinction must be made between the various forms of spirits. The hon. Member has based his arguments upon the distillation of whisky. I am informed that the Instruction would apply not only to whisky but to gin and other spirits, and I do not know how far the hon. Member wishes to go in that direction. I am told that there is not the same objection to the mingling of foreign spirits in these cases as in the case of whisky. The matter is already under my consideration. I have directed my attention to the bearing of the Merchandise Marks Act, and if there is any fraud or deceit going on with regard to the mingling of foreign spirits with Scotch or Irish spirits it ought to be dealt with in a similar manner, if it can be done, to that adopted with regard to the Merchandise Marks Act. I am looking at the matter from really the same point of view as the hon. Member has put before the House, but it is very complicated and could not be dealt with in one or two clauses. If we were to lay down a rule that spirits are to be kept in bond for a considerable time the result would be to keep the whole business in the hands of those who have capital, which would enable them to wait. Some could keep their spirits in bond for six or seven years, but there are others who, if they kept their spirits long, would suffer considerable inconvenience. I cannot consent to accept clauses which might be proposed to effect the object in view; but if the hon. Member will be satisfied with my assurance that I will endeavour, in the next few weeks, to arrive at a conclusion and to introduce a short Bill, if I see that there is any chance of passing it, I will see that the whole matter is examined and put it in a practical form before the House. It will be most inconvenient to spring the matter on the trade. I suggest these considerations in order to show that it will be unwise to deal with the matter in such haste as would be involved in accepting clauses without consideration where there are so many interests concerned. In many ways I sympathise with the object of the hon. Member, and will endeavour to meet it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

Mr. PICTON (Leicester): I rise to move the Amendment of which I have given notice, and I have to say a word in explanation of the form it takes. The Division which I propose to take will necessarily be on this formal Amendment, substituting the word "ninety" for "ninety-one;" the effect of which, of course, would be that the Tea Duty would come to an end in the month of August in this year, instead of August of next year. I think that every year a Division should be taken upon the question whether tea is a proper commodity for taxation or not. If hon. Members would only vote as Members of the different Parties have spoken out of doors, I have no doubt whatever I should carry my Amendment. Of course, the question is an old one, and it is associated with some of the most memorable names we have known in this House. I need scarcely refer to the interest taken in the question of a free breakfast table, of which this subject is a part, by the late Mr. John Bright, whose memory is fragrant to every one of us, however much we may have differed with him in some of his opinions. For years he laboured on this question. Recently it has been taken up not by one great Party in the State, but by two great Parties respected on both sides of the House. The Liberal Federation in Manchester unanimously passed a resolution affirming that the duty should be taken off tea. As far as I know there was no opposition whatever. Several leaders of the Liberal Party have taken their places on the platform of this Federation at their meetings, and the resolution has been prepared with great deliberation by the Council of the Federation. Not only was that the case, but in the Conservative meetings at Nottingham, as is very well known, there was a strong desire to have a resolution on this subject brought forward and passed. Why the rank and file of the Party were prevented from bringing it forward by their leader I do not know; at any rate it is certain they were all strongly in favour of it. We are told we ought to be content because the Tea Duty has been reduced. But, as the hon. Member for Oldham said the other day, it is extremely problematical whether the small consumer will ever receive the benefit of the reduction. Certainly we ought to be satisfied upon that point. The right hon. Gentleman has said that already the price of tea is being brought down. Yes, we see advertisements everywhere of enterprising grocers who are advertising their tea at 2d. per lb. less. But that is for the people who buy their tea by the pound; it is certainly not for the poor, who buy their tea in small packets, such as the right hon. Gentleman himself described in his speech. I know from what I have heard from merchants doing a large business that they expect to get a large part of the reduction into their own pockets, and certainly very little of it will reach the poorer classes. The right hon. Gentleman made a correction in his statement as to the small packets the other day.

He told us that, owing to the hurried manner in which the information had been prepared for him, his informants had fallen into an error, and that we ought to reduce by half the prices which he gave. But that makes in my favour. Taking the price that still remains there is a larger percentage of duty on the tea as sold to the poor. In making the correction, he told us that tea which was sold in penny packets to the poor, when properly reckoned out, came to 1s. 4½d. per lb., and that the price would run up from 1s. 4½d. to 1s. 11½d. It is evident, taking the duty at 4d., that the duty on tea to the poor ranges from 20 to 26 per cent., according to the price of tea. The merchants and those concerned must get their profit out of the Customs Duty, and also out of the price they pay for the tea without the duty. Therefore, it is reckoned by some that the duty, instead of being 8d. was 6d., and, if that were true, it may be said the duty instead of being 4d. would be 6d. I believe the 4d. duty will still cost the consumer 4d., 5d., or 6d. The right hon. Gentleman, in reply to some remarks of mine, said my argument would go to this point, that the consumer would gain very little indeed even if the duty were taken off altogether. I do not quite see that. It is so much cheaper to collect 6d. than 3d.; but, besides that, if you make the commodity free of duty altogether, you save a considerable amount in Custom House officers, and bonded warehouses, and interest on money, and a variety of channels of expenditure. Therefore, it is quite clear that if the whole of this reduction will not go to the consumer, he would be more benefited if the whole amount were taken off, than when you merely take off a small amount. An indirect tax costs a great deal more in collection from the people who consume the commodities than it gives to the Government who collects the tax. This may be tolerable, and is tolerable with regard to luxuries, but I say it is utterly intolerable, when we have to do with the necessities of life. However, the more substantial issue which I raise on this occasion is that the tax on tea is a tax on a very large number of people indeed; it is a tax on the narrow income which is absolutely essential to live in peace and comfort. The right hon. Gentleman did not hesitate to describe afresh the duty on tea as a Poll Tax, if it were taken in this sense. It is a tax which nearly every member of the community is called upon to pay. Well, Sir, that is precisely what I object to. The right hon. Gentleman truly said that a very large question is opened up. "I desire to protest" he went on to say,

"Against the view that this tax ought to be swept away, because it rests, to a certain extent, on the working classes and upon those who are in straitened circumstances."

I desire to note these words—"those who are in straitened circumstances." Yes, the sort of straitened circumstances in which a considerable number of our population are found are described in the Report of the Committee of the other House on the subject of sweating. And those who read that Report and the description of misery which it gives of many of the consumers of tea will be able to give an interpretation of the phrase "straitened circumstances." But there is another thing that the Government can do, and that is to take the taxes off all necessities of life. I think the very least the Government can do is to make life easier for the poor. It may be answered that there is not the money to do this. That may be; but a great deal too much is spent. All we ask is that the burden shall be taken off the necessities of life and put on property and the accumulated wealth of the country. I hold that the minimum of income necessary for subsistence in peace and comfort ought to go untaxed altogether. That is the main reason why I urge that this duty on tea should be taken off. If I err in this I err in very good company. The right hon. Gentleman has, I am sure, great respect for the authority of John Stuart Mill, and I call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the second volume of his work on taxation. In that work he refers in no critical spirit to the proposals with reference to a graduated Income Tax, and suggests that the tax should fall on the richer classes more heavily in proportion to the amount of wealth. It is also suggested that incomes not exceeding £50 should not be taxed at all, either directly or by taxes on the necessities of life; and that in the case of the small incomes earned by labouring families, the Government ought not to be a party to making them smaller. I think I have the authority of John Stuart Mill for this argument; but I have also another authority, and a more modern one, for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who last night seems to have bidden a final adieu to the Liberal Party, but who was formerly one of the pioneers of Liberal progress, speaking in Birmingham on the 29th January, 1885, used words, according to the authorised edition of his speech, to the effect that a certain income was necessary for subsistence, and that it ought not to be heavily taxed, but that the burden of taxation ought to fall on incomes above that amount. Now, what did he mean at that time by heavy taxation on a minimum of income? It is evident that he included the Tea Duty in his observations, for a little further on he said that if Parliament would only support the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and would give him leave to equalise the duties on land and on personal property, he would soon impose a higher tax upon incomes exceeding a certain amount, and Mr. Childers would be able at once to remedy the injustice and to give a free breakfast table the next day, as well as enable people to put double and treble the quantity of currants and raisins usually put in the Christmas pudding. I think, therefore, I have the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham on my side. I cannot help thinking that the arguments about taxation and representation are often used in a very fallacious way and in a manner entirely inconsistent with the original circumstances to which they were applied. If I mistake not, the principle was first applied on the occasion of the attempt of the Imperial Parliament to lay a tax on the colonies in America. It was always intended that colonies which had no representation in the Imperial Parliament should not be taxed by the Parliament, and I do not think that the principle was applied in any other way at that time. The question was the relation of communities to the Imperial Parliament, and I do not think the right hon. Gentleman can fairly press arguments in favour of the Tea Tax on that principle. When a child is born into this country his destiny is bound up with it. If the country prospers, he also prospers; and if the country suffers, he is the poorer for it and suffers accordingly; and that is the practical bond of citizenship which unites all classes. It is said that the poor have votes as well as the rich, and that if they have nothing to pay for expensive wars they will be ready to hurry us into war regardless of the consequences; and therefore it is necessary to tax the tea in order to keep them from rushing into war. But who suffers most from the extravagance and follies of war? It is not the rich. The rich man may occasionally have to put down a carriage or a horse, or to spend less on hunting and luxuries of that kind, but he never suffers in his breakfast or dinner table. He always has enough to eat and drink, and the evils of war fall by the natural process of gravitation upon the poor. It is always the poor who have to put up with the ultimate consequences of misgovernment, and they are learning that lesson now. We are told that in times past when they were not properly instructed they howled for war. But they are learning better than that now; and it is to instruction that we may look for them to gain political wisdom. We are told that in the days of the Crimean War large numbers of the working classes were bitterly bent on carrying on the war. The Tea Tax at the time was increased from 1s. 6d. to 1s. 9d. I do not think that the extra 3d. had any effect on the opinion of the working classes. It is not to the increase of taxation, but rather to the extension of schools like the Board Schools, to the exercise of the franchise, and to the advance of public enlightenment on political matters that we may look for the extension of political wisdom. I contend that this Tea Tax is a shameful remnant of the old times. It is a relic of the mischievous and wicked system of taxing the necessities of life—necessaries which ought to go untaxed. I earnestly appeal to my hon. Friends to vote against this Tea Tax, and in so doing I assure them they are carrying out Liberal principles. I also appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite to exhibit for once freedom and independence, and to support principles of which, I am sure, they are in favour.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 23, to leave out the word "ninety-one," and insert the word "ninety."—(Mr. Picton.)

*(5.27.) MR. GOSCHEN: I trust that the hon. Member will not consider me to be discourteous if I refrain from entering at any length into an examination of the arguments which he has adduced. I have already endeavoured to reply to the hon. Member, who seemingly is not satisfied with it. I think that the arguments for and against are well-known on both sides; and as I have not been moved by what the hon. Member has just said, while the hon. Member remains equally unmoved by the arguments I employed the other day, I hold that no useful purpose is to be served by delaying the decision of the House upon the point.

(5.29.) MR. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): We have no right to expect that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will accept the advice tendered him by the hon. Member for Leicester; but I think that nobody knows better than the right hon. Gentleman that if the duty on tea were taken off there would be a much larger consumption, and that it would be to the benefit of the trade of the country. I think that if my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester will only in the future be as persevering in this matter as he has been in the past, he will be successful in securing the end he desires to attain. It would be pleasant to feel that the poor people get their tea without duty, and it would be equally satisfactory to know that, as this country has compelled the people of India to take everything we produce free of duty, we should take their tea free of duty in return. At present we take plenty of tea from India, and the carrying out of this suggestion would tend to stimulate commerce.

(5.30.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I do not rise to contest the question of the Tea Tax. I merely rise to say that, in supporting the Amendment of my hon. Friend, I do it because I regard indirect taxation as unfair upon the poor as against the rich, and I wish to see everybody contribute a fair share towards the burdens of the country. So far as I am concerned, I shall always vote for the abolition of indirect taxation.

(5.30.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 228; Noes 163.—(Div. List, No. 75.)

(5.45.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg leave to move, after "tea," in line 24, to insert "valued over one shilling." Tea is sold at various prices in this City, from 2d. up to 2s. or 3s. per lb., and I have seen samples sold wholesale at as high a price as 6s. per lb. As I understand the proposals of the Government, a rich man who buys tea retail, possibly, at 7s. 6d. per lb., will pay the same amount of taxation on that tea as the poor man who buys his tea at 2d. or 3d. per lb. The Amendment I propose may be regarded as against the interests of Ireland, because in Ireland they drink the best tea. Those who would chiefly benefit from the Amendment would be the people of London, who, I understand, drink the worst tea in the world. If a person buys tea which, but for the tax, would be sold at 2d. per lb., he will have to pay a 4d. tax on that tea. Possibly another year, if not now, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to consider the proposal. I think the people of London ought to take up this question, and get their Members to press it on the attention of the Government. Personally, I am not interested in the question, because I drink no tea; but I think if you are going to make reductions in the Tea Duty, you should make them in such a manner that the poor man will get something out of them. I would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should re-impose the duty of 6d. on highly-priced teas, and reduce it on the cheaper teas.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 24, after the word "tea," to insert the words "valued over one shilling."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(5.50.) MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member raises a very large question, because the principle underlying his Amendment would apply practically to all the Customs Duties quite as much to the duty on tea. It would apply to coffee, fruit, wine, and tobacco. I remember when I sought to reduce the duty on cheap classes of wine, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) opposed my proposal on the ground that the return to an ad valorem system would raise all kinds of difficulties. I would point out that the cases in which tea is sold at 6s. per lb. are very exceptional.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I can give you a sample of the tea now.

MR. GOSCHEN: I think the difficulties in the way of adopting the ad valorem system in regard to tea are too great to be overcome.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I proposed the Amendment in the interests of the poor; and if it does not meet with any support, I have no option but to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(5.53.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name, namely, in line 24 to leave out "pound," and insert "chest of one hundred pounds." My object is not so much to obtain a reduction of the duty on tea as to abolish it altogether.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that we already have had a Division on the abolition of the Tea Duty; and if the hon. Member's motive now is to abolish the Tea Duty, he cannot raise that question again, nor would it do otherwise than by abusing the powers of the Committee to propose to reduce the duty to an infinitesimal amount.

MR. BLANE: My point is that the tax bears unequally on the poor as compared with the rich. In the City of London a poor workwoman in her garret possibly pays as much of this tax as the Duke of Bedford, who draws £250,000 or more from his property in the Metropolis. I contend that the taxation should be placed on those who are best able to bear it. In this instance it is placed on those who are least able to bear it. In many families the 6d. per lb. on tea amounts to 26s. a year, and, in some cases, to 30s. a year.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 24, to leave out the word "pound" and insert the words "chest of one hundred pounds."—(Mr. Blane.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'pound' stand part of the Clause."

Mr. Goschen

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I think we ought to have some answer from the right hon. Gentleman. My hon. Friend, in bringing this question forward, is trying to do his best for the working classes, not only of our country, but of this country; and I think the right hon. Gentleman, as a salaried Minister of the Crown, would do well to make some reply to his proposal.

*(5.59.) MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member proposes to reduce the duty from 4d. per lb. to 4d. per 100 lbs. The proposition is nearly identical with that made by the hon. Member for Leicester, and I certainly thought, under these circumstances, I was not wanting in courtesy in making no reply.

*(6.0.) MR. S. BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I appeal to my hon. Friend not to press his Amendment. I, for one, would vote against it, because the effect of it would be absurd.

MR. BLANE: In consequence of the appeal made to me I will not press the Amendment to a Division. I merely moved it in order to elicit an expression of opinion from the Government.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

*(6.3.) MR. S. BUXTON: By this clause it is proposed to reduce the duty on currants from 7s. to 2s., and therefore to reduce the revenue from currants from £350,000 to £140,000. It seems to me the Chancellor of the Exchequer might go a little further and abolish the whole of the duty. The cost of collecting £140,000 will be the same as that of collecting the existing revenue of £350,000, and the hindrance to trade, which is caused by any Customs Duty, will be just as great with the collection of the smaller as of the larger revenue. If he abolished the duty entirely he would only have to provide £140,000, and that he could easily provide out of the balance he proposes to carry over until next year. The whole taxation on dried fruits is full of anomalies, and this appears to be a good opportunity of getting rid of another small item of taxation. I therefore move the omission of the clause on the understanding that the Amendment must be taken in connection with the clause I propose to move later on.

Amendment proposed, "To leave out Clause 3."—(Mr. S. Buxton.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 3 stand part of the Bill."

*(6.5.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am not prepared to accept the suggestion of the hon. Member. In the first place, I have not got £140,000 to give away; in the second place, I do not wish to totally abolish the duty on this article of consumption; and, in the third place, the difference between the duty on raisins and currants is already made very considerable by the alteration I have made, and I do not wish to make the difference wider. I do not propose to abolish the duty on raisins; but if any additional reduction was made in regard to currants, we should have to deal with raisins.

*(6.6.) MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): The remarks of the right hon. Gentleman really go to support the Amendment. He says that to reduce the duty on currants to 2s. leaves a very remarkable anomaly between the duty on currants and raisins. At present the duty on many qualities of raisins is equal to 30 per cent. on the wholesale value; it adds more than 1d. per lb. to the retail sale price of the article. I feel confident the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be compelled next year to remove the duties from these articles altogether, and he might as well begin now when he has a surplus in hand to wipe away these anomalies. The right hon. Gentleman does not wish to abolish the duty altogether. He desires to retain some duty which he might increase in a time of emergency; but no Chancellor of the Exchequer dare—not even in the case of war—increase the duties on food. The people would argue that they have nothing to do with the making of wars, and would revolt against such a proceeding. But one of the safest ways to prevent anything of the kind is to remove altogether these vexatious imposts.

(6.8.) MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I desire, in a few words, to explain why I intend to vote for this Amendment, and why I went into the Lobby with the hon. Member for Leicester just now. I object to the fiscal policy of this country, a policy which, under the false name of Free Trade, is producing incalculable injury to our trade and agriculture. I am against the duty upon tea and currants. I contend there is not the slightest reason for taxing these articles of universal consumption. I believe that if we followed the example of every other civilised nation and helped our Exchequer by Import Duties upon articles of luxury and articles which compete with our trade, we should have quite sufficient money without taxing necessities of life. For these reasons I shall vote with the hon. Member for Poplar.

*(6.10.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): If the hon. Gentleman makes Protectionist speeches, but gives Free Trade votes, I do not think we shall have much reason to complain. But I regret to be unable to follow him into the Lobby. The hon. Member objected because he said that if we abolish any of these duties it will be perfectly impossible to re-impose them; but surely that is a reason which ought to make us pause before we take the step advocated. My right hon. Friend, in reducing this taxation, has succeeded in inducing another country to reduce taxation which presses on our manufactures, and I hope he may continue to obtain similar advantages to manufactures of the country. I hope, therefore, that my hon. Friend will not press his Amendment to a Division.

(6.12.) MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): While I agree with every word uttered by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham, I cannot see my way to support the Amendment. I agree that the fiscal policy of this country is altogether wrong. I am of opinion that duties ought to be removed from all articles which cannot be produced here, and that duties ought to be placed upon products which can be produced here, thereby obtaining revenue and at the same time promoting our own industries. Hon. Members opposite have spoken of the determination on the part of the working classes of England under no circumstances to have recourse to a Protectionist policy in regard to food. But would hon. Members go so far as to say that the working classes were thoroughly opposed to Protectionist principles when applied to commodities they themselves produce? I think they will find that Protectionist views, so far from being relegated to the limbo they desire to send them to, are rapidly spreading day by day. But I think the entire abolition of a duty like this which produces a very substantial addition to the Revenue, would be an unwise step, and ought not to be taken until the Committee is prepared to substitute for it something which will raise a similar amount to the Revenue. Personally, I would be glad to propose as a substitute a tax upon ready-made goods now imported into this country without paying duty, to the great detriment of the interests of the working classes. With my hon. Friend I protest against our present mischievous fiscal policy, which is utterly repudiated in every part of the entire world, civilised and uncivilised; and I trust that before long it will be in the power of the House of Commons to provide some fair and proper substitute for that which is open to great objection.

(6.14.) MR. LABOUCHERE: The policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in regard to currants is next door to Protectionist—it is based upon commercial reciprocity—and, therefore, I should have thought the right hon. Gentleman would have obtained the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet. [Mr. J. LOWTHER: I am going to support him.] Before we quit the question of currants, I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he really imagines that the consumer in England will gain anything by this reduction. In order to make a good pudding you require currants and raisins. Raisins come from all parts of the world. If you had taken the duty off raisins there would have been a reduction in the price charged to the consumer owing to the competition. But currants come from Greece only; if the vine is taken to any other country it produces a large grape instead of this small grape without stones. The Greeks have the production of currants absolutely in their own hands, and we know they are a very intelligent commercial people; and, if they can, they most undoubtedly will take the whole of the benefit from this reduction without giving us a share in it. The grocers of Northampton asked me to move an Amendment to leave out "May" and insert "August." I do not desire to raise that question now, but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will state whether he has taken into consideration the complaints of a considerable number of grocers in this matter. What they say is, that the stock comes over in September and that they have quantities of currants on hand in the months of May, June, and July. They desire that, as in the case of tea, the reduction in the duty should commence on the 1st August.

(6.20.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I must say, for myself, I feel certain that the consumer will always benefit in the market by the reduction given in taxation. There is, to my mind, a very strong reason why we should not impose small taxes, namely, the large amount they cost to collect. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer should take that into consideration.

*(6.21.) MR. S. BUXTON: This proposed reduction has nothing to do with the question of Fair Trade or Free Trade, for our Custom Duties are imposed for revenue purposes alone. I must say I have been glad to see, in this short discussion, that the Fair Traders are unable to agree on any policy—and that, I hope, is the state of mind in which they will approach every fiscal question. I cannot agree with the hon. Member for Northampton, that if this small duty is abolished the consumer will not get the benefit. He seems to be such an epicure that he requires raisins as well as currants in all his puddings; but I am sure that the great bulk of his fellow citizens do not do that, and that the reduction will be a great boon to them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has moved in the right direction, and all we ask of him is that he should go a little further and abolish the duty altogether, so as to do away with the expense of collection. I hope the hon. Member opposite will tell with me—though I should not like it to be thought that this Division will have anything to do with so-called "Fair Trader."

(6.22.) MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I must say I think it a good thing to levy a reasonable tax on currants. They are largely used in London, but it is a fact that the worst kinds of flour can be blended with currants. Currant bread made of bad flour is sold to the poor, and these people, therefore, get no benefit—rather the reverse.

(6.22.) MR. GOSCHEN: It is an error to suppose that currants are consumed by the poorer classes only, as they are in large general consumption. It is not the opinion of the grocers that the Greeks will raise the price of currants because the duty upon them has been remitted. As to the date at which the reduction should come into operation, I have received a great number of communications, and the large majority of my correspondents are in favour of an immediate reduction of the duty. I have given the closest and most careful consideration to the matter, and the course I have proposed seems to me to be the fairest and best which could be adopted in the interests of all concerned.

(6.23.) DR. TANNER: Every Member of the House knows that currants are more consumed by the juvenile portion of the community at certain seasons of the year than they are by adults. And every medical man inside the House and outside it will corroborate me when I say that a large number of deaths annually occur in consequence of and in connection with this consumption of currants. I do not know whether it is the desire of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to back up the Malthusian theory that the Chief Secretary gave vent to the other day in connection with the congested districts of Ireland, but it certainly seems to me that the course he is taking in cheapening the price of currants is fatal to juveniles. After all, this is a very small matter this tax on currants, and the House at this moment somewhat resembles the mountain in labour bringing forth a mouse. I shall certainly vote for the remission of the clause, inasmuch as I believe that this remission of duty will be of very little benefit to the country, whilst it will prove seriously detrimental to the youthful portion of the community. It will provide them with more currants, and consequently there will be more deaths.

Subsequently, Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS and Mr. PROVAND, the Tellers in the No Lobby in the Division on the Question "That Clause 3 stand part of the Bill," came to the Table and stated that they had, through inadvertence, reported the number of the Noes as 164 instead of 156, which corresponded with the Division List, and was the proper number upon which they were both agreed.

Whereupon, the Chairman directed the Clerk to correct the number of the Noes in that Division accordingly.

Clause 4.

(6.38.) MR. STOREY: Heretofore we have been dealing with clauses which propose remissions of existing duties, and we now come to that part of the Bill which proposes the imposition of new duties. In a very few words I shall urge that this clause be postponed, and I shall give what I hope will be even to the Chancellor of the Exchequer a powerful reason why this course should be adopted. This clause deals with the increase of the duty on spirits. Well, the common practice since I have been a Member of the House has been this: The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in making his Budget Statement, informs the House what the income has been and what his expenditure, and what he proposes to expend in the coming year on the various Services. Then, having told us this, he proceeds to make his suggestions for raising the money to meet this expenditure. But on this occasion the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was entirely different from this. He adopted an unusual and unprecedented course; he gave us his Estimates for the year; he provided for the whole of the money; he left himself with a surplus, and after that he proposed to the House certain additional expenditure, which he was hereafter to ask the House to commit itself to. Now, my objection to this proposal of the Government at this stage is this: that the House has not yet in principle agreed to the expenditure of this money. I believe the Chairman would agree with me if I could appeal to him, which, of course, I cannot, but I do not know that I have need to appeal to any great financial authority. I will ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in the course of his long and varied experience on the one side or the other, he has known of an instance in which a Chancellor of the Exchequer has proposed to the House a new duty which he admitted he did not need for the service of the year, and proposed this without first getting the assent of the House to the object of the new duty? For what purpose does the Chancellor of the Exchequer want this additional Spirit Duty? He wants it for the purpose, as he tells us, not of the Public Services for the year, but to hand over large sums to Local Authorities, to be used by them in a manner not yet determined by Parliament. Now my contention is this: According to all usage, according to all principles—certainly the sound principles—of English finance, the granting of the new duty ought to be postponed until the House has determined the principle upon which this duty should be employed. I do not ask for much. The Bill which allocates this fund is set down for Monday next; it is a Bill for providing for the superannuation of the police, or helping to superannuate the police, for helping to compensate publicans, and for helping County Councils by additional grants for local finance. I do not know how it may be as to the opinion of the House upon giving assistance to County Councils; but for myself I am not willing to contribute towards the superannuation of police in boroughs well able to take care of themselves.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not entitled to discuss the particular arguments for or against the application of the money, although allusion to it is not precluded.

MR. STOREY: I will content myself with saying there is an object to which this money has to be applied, and that object is now under discussion in the country. It has never been discussed in this House; it has not been accepted by this House, nor do I believe it ever will be accepted by this House of Commons. That being so, and putting it as a mere matter of business, I say we should not grant the Executive Government money which we have not ordered the Government to employ. On that, as I think, all sufficient ground, I rest my contention that the clause ought to be postponed. I am not asking for much, because on Monday, according to present arrangement, we shall proceed to the discussion of the Bill which allocates the money. Suppose the House, after discussion, does agree to the application of funds in a particular way, then it will be time for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come to the Committee and ask for this additional Spirit Duty. I am not going into any of the bitter contentions that gather round the imposition of the Spirit Duty on the one hand, or the compensation to publicans on the other. I confine myself to the business-like proposal that this clause shall be postponed (and, of course, this applies to Clauses 5, 6, and 7 also, which deal with the imposition of new taxation) until the House shall come to a determination upon the principle of the application of the new revenue.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be postponed."—(Mr. Storey.)

*(6.51.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am sorry I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman. As I understand him, he rests his contention upon this: that it would be a new principle to vote money, to sanction taxation without sanctioning the principle of the expenditure the taxation is to cover. My reply is that we adopt that course every year. Every year in April, and sometimes earlier, the Budget for the year is voted, while the expenditure has not been voted. There may be large questions of expenditure before the House, but upon which the House has not decided, and yet this has never been used as a reason for not granting the taxation proposed.

*MR. STOREY: I do not wish to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but I think he mistakes my point. This is not money necessary for the Services in the year; it is special taxation outside the ordinary requirements of the year.

*MR. GOSCHEN: We must admit there are often large amounts in the Estimates which many hon. Members think are not necessary for the year's Services.

MR. STOREY: That is not the point.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I deny that this is not a necessity. It is, on the contrary, a necessity to deal with the superannuation of the police; we look on that as quite as necessary as many other Services included in the Estimates. We are, in principle, following the normal practice of the House. Looking to the amount we propose to expend during the year, we propose taxation to cover the Expenditure, and this is exactly what we are doing now. Suppose a Bill had not been necessary, and we had simply a Vote in the Estimates for the superannuation of the police, it would equally be the hon. Member's case that the House had not voted this, but we should be following the usual practice in asking the House to vote the necessary taxation, the foundation for which we had made known to the House.

(6.55.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby) : I am surprised and disappointed that the right hon. Gentleman does not accede to this proposal. Nothing could have been more clear than the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech that there was a Budget for the Service of the year, and then there was a Supplementary Budget. I think he actually used that phrase, but he certainly conveyed that idea. When there was a question of this Bill being brought forward, I remember speaking to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, saying, "I presume the Spirit Duty will be in the Supplementary Bill." As you have a Supplementary Bill, then the taxes to meet it should be included in that Bill. The right hon. Gentleman says that very often the Budget is voted before the financial proposals in the Estimates are accepted, but that is not the question here. The House, before it votes the Budget, is placed in possession of the view of the Government upon the Expenditure of the year, and the Budget is voted upon that basis. But here there is no proposal as to the Expenditure of the year on the Services of the State for which this money is raised ; what is now proposed is that we should impose certain duties on articles of consumption before the House has had an opportunity of considering the purposes to which the money is to be applied. If the Estimates are before us and they affect the imposition of the taxation, of course we can discuss these Estimates in voting the taxation. For instance, if in our view the Army and Navy Estimates are too high, we may discuss this question in voting the taxation required for the purpose. You, by your ruling, Sir, have made it clear, for you have said we may not even allude to the purposes to which this money is to be applied.

THE CHAIRMAN : No ; I expressly said that the hon. Member for Sunderland was not entitled to go into the arguments for or against the proposed appropriation of the money, though he was entitled to allude to it.

SIR W. HARCOURT : That strengthens what I have said. Your ruling is more fatal to the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN : I was referring to that point in the right hon. Gentleman's speech in which he said I had forbidden allusion to the purposes for which the money is intended.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT : But in an ordinary Budget proposal we do a great deal more than allude. It has not been the habit in these financial discussions to make allusions simply ; and I am sure, Sir, when, prior to your accession to your present high office, you were Secretary to the Treasury you would have acknowledged that allusion to the Estimates was not sufficient in a Budget discussion. Upon the Budget, when we vote the taxes we do not allude to the objects for which the taxes are voted—we discuss them. If we are of opinion that the expenditure proposed by the Government is improper or is extravagant we may reject it. But here we are actually asked to vote taxes independently of the regular Budget, and are not to be allowed to discuss the objects for which the taxes are raised. I say there is no precedent, or anything like a precedent, in the financial practice of the House for such a proposition. It is most material, as I conceive, when we are asked to vote these taxes, that we should consider whether the purpose to which the money is proposed to be applied is a proper purpose, and that, according to your ruling, Sir, we shall be precluded from doing. The House of Commons would be stultified in its action if it were to be called upon to discuss the question of voting this money with only allusion to the objects for which it is intended, and which, after all, may not be necessary or approved. What is the position in which we are placed by the Government to-day ? Neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor the First Lord of the Treasury can quote any precedent for such a course in the financial practice of the House. I defy them to produce any precedent for a tax being voted when the House is not at liberty to discuss it. I do not see what advantage the Government will gain by snatching a decision in an important question of this kind, which affects the community at large, and by trying to hoodwink, as it were, hon. Gentlemen by shutting them out from discussing an Imperial question. From the nature of the proposals the two things must proceed pari passu. The tax and the policy must be decided upon together. The proposal of my hon. Friend seems to me so fair a proposal and so entirely in accordance with all the financial habits of the House that I cannot help hoping that the Government on reconsideration will agree to it.

*(7.3.) MR. GOSCHEN: I think the right hon. Gentleman should remember that on Monday, when the Government proposed to put their Bill down for Tuesday, objection was taken, and we were asked to give further time for the consideration of the subject. An agreement was then come to across the Table. My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury then asked whether, if the Government consented to postpone the Bill till Thursday, we might then hope to receive fair treatment. Now, having postponed the Bill, an objection is raised for the first time which might just as well have been raised on Monday, and the non-contentious part of the Bill might have been taken on Tuesday. In these circumstances, I think it is rather hard that the Government should be pressed now. In my judgment the House has before it as complete a statement of the principles of the Government expenditure with reference to the superannuation of the police and the endowment of County Councils as it has in the estimates of the expenditure on other matters.

(7.5.) MR. J. MORLEY: With regard to what took place on Monday night the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to forget that the Budget Bill was read a second time by an operation which I ventured to characterise then and characterise again as unprecedented on the part of the Government. It is quite true that the First Lord of the Treasury assented to the appeal of the Opposition on the assumption that the conduct of the Opposition would be fair. I then said in reply that the conduct of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House was always fair; but I declined altogether to enter into any understanding whatever with the right hon. Gentleman, and declared that the Opposition would reserve to themselves the right of full and complete discussion.

(7.7.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I shall vote for the postponement of the clause on the ground that it requires re-casting. We ought to have the courage to put an extra tax on the drinkers of beer as well as on drinkers of whisky, and I therefore think the present proposal a gross injustice.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is not now discussing the question of the postponement of the clause.

(7.8.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I think the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland was an excellent speech, and set forth the truth of the case; but, the Motion being made from this side of the House, and opposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it more or less bears the aspect of an ordinary Party question. My opinion is that in the regulation of questions of finance Party considerations ought, as a rule, to be laid aside. But it is out of all common-sense that the House should be called upon to vote a specific sum for a specific purpose altogether new and unknown to previous practice, without being accorded the power of discussing the merits of the application. The contention of my hon. Friend is that the House ought to be allowed to sift and discuss and consider the purposes of a tax before they vote it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's reply to that is that when the House passes the Taxation Bill under the Budget of the year hon. Members do not absolutely know whether they themselves or the House of Commons will approve every item of the multifarious and multitudinous expenditure.

*MR. GOSCHEN: That is not my answer. I meant that there might be some large item of expenditure just as important as that before the House, with which the House would have to deal upon the Estimates. I could mention several cases in which money has been raised for a particular purpose before the principle has been decided on by the House.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That is so; but if the House finds it to be its duty to resist a tax it will be in its power to found its resistance upon the nature of the tax to which the money is to be applied; and so we can discuss the merits of the proposals of the Government in dealing with the taxes of the year. That is exactly what we cannot do now. I think the best speech in favour of the Motion of my hon. Friend was that made by the Chairman. I hope I was not misunderstood, but I could not help uttering a cheer when I heard it, because it appeared to me a capital argument against the proposal now made. I voted with the Government on the last Division, and would have voted with them in this Division if I had thought they were acting in conformity with usage and principle. But they are neither acting in conformity with usage and principle nor in conformity with common-sense. I hold this distinct principle with regard to the general taxation of the country, that when money is voted for the general service of the year it is voted under a legal system completely organised. In so far as the money is not disposed of according to the proposals of the Government it is disposed of by the provisions of the law, and goes towards the reduction of the National Debt. But what is the case of the tax under discussion? On Monday next the House will have to discuss the purposes of the tax; and, to judge from the state of feeling in the country, it is possible that the House of Commons may come to the conclusion that those purposes, or the most important of them, are indefensible. What, then, is to become of the money? The House will have actually voted an imposition on the people when there are no means for its legal application. Why should not the clauses be postponed? What can it matter, as there is no disposition to treat the question except with perfect regularity and fairness? The Chancellor of the Exchequer himself must feel that the subject of compensation is one of enormous weight and of enormous consequence — of enormous weight both as to principle and as to amount. Some of the difficulty in which the House is now placed has arisen out of a provision which the House of Commons found it necessary, about 30 years ago, to adopt in self-defence, namely, to combine together all the taxes of the year. It is most necessary that that principle should be maintained; but it has nothing whatever to do with the question of a tax, such as the one under consideration, voted for local purposes. It is analogous to the raising of the local rate, and there is no reason why it should be included in the Tax Bill at all. I sympathise with the difficulty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, together with the Revenue Department, very properly wishes to get the Tax Bill voted as soon as possible. Let him, then, include the Compensation Clauses in a separate Bill, against which course there is no reason of principle or convenience. If the right hon. Gentleman succeeds in carrying a vote of this kind in defiance of all usage, he will not find his subsequent path, on the subject of compensation, one whit smoother, or his progress more rapid. The question should be treated simply as a financial question, on which there ought to be no difference of opinion on the two sides of the House; and that method of procedure should be adopted which is obviously dictated both by principle and the expediency of the case.

*(7.20.) MR. GOSCHEN: I understand the right hon. Gentleman to rest his main contention on the point that the proposals in the clauses cannot be discussed. I confess that I have not been aware that it is not as open to discuss on these clauses the purposes to which the tax is to be applied as it is to discuss any expenditure to be incurred during the course of the year. A new element has been introduced by the ruling to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred; and, under these circumstances, the Government do not wish to force the right hon. Gentleman and his friends to discuss the point. But the Government may appeal to the right hon. Gentleman that, if the purposes to which the tax is to be applied are fully discussed on the Bill to be read a second time on Monday, the same discussion shall not be raised again on the clauses of the Bill before the Committee. If there is some hope that this will be the case, the Government will be disposed to give way to the views of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman, as well as everyone who has filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, must recognise that there is great inconvenience in postponing Budget proposals. It disturbs trade and all the interests concerned, and therefore it is the duty of the Government to bring the matter to a conclusion as rapidly as possible. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will use his great influence to insure that the Budget proposals shall not be indefinitely postponed, as may be the case if the whole discussion is to be raised a second time.

(7.24.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I am glad to hear so conciliatory a statement from the right hon. Gentleman. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will best facilitate the passing of the Bill if he withdraws from it the compensation clauses and puts them in the other Bill, to which they properly belong. The reason for putting all the taxes into one Bill only applies to taxation for Imperial needs. In this instance you are raising a tax for local purposes, and, surely, the more logical and sensible course is to raise your tax in the Bill which appropriates it. If you do that you will get your Budget Bill through without delay, because it will not be tied up with the compensation controversy.

*(7.25.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government will be very glad to meet the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, but they must adhere to the plan they have adopted. The Government are prepared to postpone the consideration of the clauses until after the Second Reading of the Bill which appropriates the money to be raised under the clauses. I hope that this proposal will recommend itself to right hon. Gentlemen opposite, because, after the question has been fully considered on the Second Reading of the Bill, they cannot wish to raise the same discussion immediately afterwards.

(7.27.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am totally at a loss to understand why these clauses should be included in the Tax Bill. I cannot understand why they should not be included in a separate Bill. Still, I thankfully accept the postponement of the clauses. I certainly shall be no party to any merely obstructive dealing in any stage of business. The separation of the clauses would, I think, be the best solution.

(7.28.) MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.): Will the postponement apply to Clauses 4 to 7 inclusive?

Mr. Goschen

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir.

The clause was then postponed, as were also Clauses 5, 6, and 7.

Clauses 8 and 9 agreed to, with some verbal Amendments.

Clause 10.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The duty on tea is a matter in which there is very little interest felt in Ireland, although, I think, the remission is one of which the Irish people will get their full share. I would point out with regard to the remission of duty on gold and silver plate the amount raised is £90,020 in England, while in Scotland it is only £312, and in Ireland £34; consequently the remission will be of no benefit to Ireland, and of very little to Scotland.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I would point to the House that this is one of the few taxes on luxuries, and, as such, I think it might very well have been left to itself; but as the Government propose to remit the tax, and as it will help to further Free Trade between this country and India, I shall not oppose that remission. At the same time, I think the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to tell the House what he proposes to do with regard to hall-marking. We should be glad to know where the standard mark is to be applied, and under what circumstances; whether, having applied it in India, the silver wares of that country are to be imported free into this country without the necessity of any hall-marking when they get here? The junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) has taken great interest in this matter, but I do not see him in his place at the present moment. He has stated that the silver wares of India are of a very fine character and very expensive. With regard to the latter part of that statement I hope the proof will go the other way. For my part, I am inclined to think that, although they are undoubtedly of a very fine character, they are extremely cheap, and if Free Trade can be made to prevail between this country and India a very large trade will result. At the same time, the hon. Member for Northampton is quite right in saying that these articles are of a very delicate character—so delicate, indeed, that in most cases, it would be impossible to impress upon them any hall-mark without injury. The consequence will be that, supposing them to have been marked in India, if they are to be submitted to the tender mercies of the hall-markers of this country it will be impossible to continue their free importation. Therefore, I think that, inasmuch as I can find nothing in this Bill on the subject of hall-marking, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to tell us what are his proposals with regard to hall-marking. I may add that I confine my desire for information principally to the case of India. I should like him to inform the Committee whether, in case these delicate wares are marked by the Indian Authorities, he will arrange that they shall not be interfered with by the Goldsmiths' Company or by any other hall-marking authority in England. What I want to know is why this hall-marking should not be altogether—

THE CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. Member that the Committee is discussing the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, and that there is no mention in it of the hall-marking of silver in its provisions. Therefore, to discuss that question is entirely irregular.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Of course, Sir, I bow to your ruling; and I will conclude by saying I am much against this clause, unless arrangements are made the result of which would be that the operation of the clause would lead to Free Trade in silver.

*MR. GOSCHEN: In reply to the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), and the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell), I have to say it is not the intention of the Government to propose any measure for the abolition of compulsory hall-marking; but I may state that we are in communication with the Government of India, and we hope to be able to make successful arrangements with regard to the hall-marking of Indian plate. We know that it would be unsatisfactory to India if we were simply to abolish the Plate Duties without being able to amend the present law with regard to the admission of goods from India. If assay offices should be established in India, under the auspices of the Indian Government, we should be perfectly satisfied, and should not regard it as necessary that the hall-marking should be repeated here. I am just informed by my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India that the establishment of an assay office in India is under consideration, and that, in fact, it is proposed that an assay office should be established there. That being the case, I trust the hon. Gentleman will be satisfied.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I cannot say that I am entirely satisfied, because I have gathered from what I know of the Government of India that there would be great difficulty in establishing assay offices there. It may be that it is considered the game is not worth the candle.

*MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I am very grateful to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the proposal he has made on this subject, but I should like to ask him a practical question, which is this: We understand that after the present time no duty will be payable on imported silver, but I want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman proposes in any sense to retain imported silver under the charge of the Government?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think that the matter must remain very much as it is as long as compulsory hall-marking is continued; but the matter is under consideration.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11.

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what interpretation is to be put upon the wording of this clause; whether, for instance, it is intended that goods in the care of a traveller should be treated as goods in stock; also whether goods sent for exhibition, or old goods which are taken back unsold, are to be treated in the same manner and are to receive drawback?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Travellers' stock not having passed from the manufacturer to the customer, I should presume, would be still regarded as manufacturers' stock, but in that case it must come back from the custody of the traveller into the manufacturers' hands, when it would be entitled to drawback.

MR. MALLOCK (Torquay): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether a similar drawback to that which is to be allowed in silver will be allowed on silver plated with gold?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Silver has always been put upon a different footing, in some respects, to gold. As I have already explained, wedding rings, which form one of the principal items in the gold trade, have never been entitled to drawback in exportation, as is now proposed with regard to silver plate. There may be some hardship in certain cases, but, as in the case of the Tea Duty and the duty on currants, it is impossible to avoid some hardship being entailed on those engaged in the trade.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I trust the right hon. Gentleman will take this subject into further consideration, and that, if he finds it possible, he will make some arrangement that would give satisfaction to those engaged in the trade, as it is a matter of great importance to a large number of them.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 12.

*MR. H. J. WILSON: Before moving the longer Amendment which stands in my name, I wish to direct attention to the Amendment of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given notice, and to point out that it would occasion serious difficulty by requiring that each article should be weighed. There are some stocks containing as many as 5,000, 6,000, and 7,000 articles, most of them of small weight; and it would be a source of great trouble if the trade were compelled to get the Excise officers to attend at their place of business, and weigh each of those articles before they could be disposed of. I move, therefore, to leave out the word "each," and insert the word "the," in line 7, which would leave it open to them to arrange such a classification of the articles to be dealt with as would be found reasonable.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 7, to leave out the word "each," in order to insert the word "the."—(Mr. H. J. Wilson.)

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I cannot see the necessity of omitting the word referred to in the hon. Gentleman's Amendment. We have already, in concert with those engaged in the trade, endeavoured to arrange a limit which I believe will meet the case.

MR. H. J. WILSON: I would point out that the manufacturers complain that it is chiefly the views of the shopkeepers that have been met, and that the views of the manufacturers have not been dealt with at all. I believe the hon. Gentleman has been in communication with a committee of the trade, but the committee only contain the names of two manufacturers, only one of whom manufactures for sale, the other manufacturing entirely for his own purposes, the rest being shopkeepers. The manufacturers in Birmingham say that this proposal would be exceedingly oppressive.

*MR. GOSCHEN: It is impossible for the Government to accept the hon. Gentleman's Amendment without first knowing the full effect it would have, and, in order to do this, they must consult the officers to whom these matters are entrusted. If the hon. Member will postpone his question to the Report stage, I will, in the meantime, make inquiry with a view of ascertaining whether anything is necessary to be done.

MR. H. J. WILSON: I thank the right hon. Gentleman, and, under the circumstances, will not press my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. H. J. WILSON: I now move my Amendment, in line 8, to leave out the words "and the place where this is deposited." But I would point out that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has also given notice of two Amendments, one of which proposes to leave out the words, "the place," while the other proposes to omit the word "deposited." Those engaged in the trade say it is impossible to know where articles are deposited when they are going about the country.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member accept the words put upon the Paper by the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

MR. H. J. WILSON: Yes.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think the hon. Gentleman will find that they quite meet his objection.

Amendment proposed, in line 8, to leave out the words "the place" and the word "deposited,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)—Agreed to.

(7.48.) MR. H. J. WILSON: The next Amendment on the same clause, of which I have given notice, has reference to exportation. I use the word "selling" instead of "exporting," and I have taken the word from the sub-section as it stands in the Bill. There is a feeling that the clause of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will cause the greatest difficulty to the trade. As I understand the operation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's clause, it is that where the manufacturer or wholesale dealer is desiring to sell he has continually to give notice to the Revenue officers of that desire, and those officers would be continually coming to his place of business. What I aim at is to get over a difficulty of that kind, by providing that it should be arranged for the officers to go to the warehouses of the dealers, or to the works of the manufacturers, and there mark the plate, showing that it had been weighed and passed. That having been done, the plate should be at once liberated. An enormous amount of the time of the manufacturers and of the officers would thus be saved. I have letters from 95 per cent. of the trade urging this matter very strongly indeed. The method I propose would be a great convenience to the traders. It is said that my plan does not provide adequate guarantee against the fraud of sending in old plate. I have not had time to go into that subject, but I should have thought the ingenuity of the trade and of the officers would have been sufficient to devise some means of protection.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, after line 17, to insert the words—

"(2.) Provided that if any such person shall be desirous of selling any article of plate of silver belonging to him in respect of which an allowance might be claimed, without losing the right to the allowance he may give to the proper officer of excise twenty-four hours previous notice in writing, setting forth the particulars of, and the weight of silver in, the article to be sold, and such officer shall cause a distinctive mark to be engraved on such article in his presence; and a certificate from such officer of the correctness of the particulars and weight and of due marking sent to the Commissioners shall have the same effect as if an account of such article as forming part of the stock of the person had been taken for the purpose of the allowance under this Act."—(Mr. Henry J. Wilson.)

VOL. CCCXLIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

*(7.55.) MR. GOSCHEN: There is no limit of weight in the hon. Member's Amendment, and that makes it impossible for me to accept it in the form in which it is put. But the clause has been framed, to a great extent, to meet the views of the hon. Member. It would be quite impossible to apply the method he proposes to numerous small articles in the trade. Of course, the Officers of Inland Revenue will be prepared to consult with representatives of the trade, the only desire being to meet their convenience.

(7.57.) MR. H. J. WILSON: I quite recognise the desire of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to meet the point, but I do not fully understand what is meant by the limit of weight. As I pointed out, the officers, under the clause, would be constantly going to and from the business places.

(7.58.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): The aim of the hon. Gentleman is to prevent giving unnecessary trouble to the manufacturers, and to the officers of the Crown, and my hon. Friend being an eminently practical man in this matter, I should have thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have seen a way to meet the convenience of the manufacturers and the officers.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The officers of Inland Revenue are in favour of the plan I propose, and, as the hon. Gentleman knows, we must, in these matters, be guided to a great extent by the officers of the Department.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the clause, to add the words—

"(3.) Provided also, that if any such person shall sell to a person, not being a licensed dealer in plate, any article of plate, or any combination of articles usually sold in a set, or any number of knives, or forks, or spoons, not less than a dozen at one time, and such article, or combination of articles, or knives, or forks, or spoons contain a weight or aggregate weight of silver not less than five ounces, he may, before delivery of the article or articles sold, give to the proper officer of Inland Revenue, notice in writing, setting forth the particulars of and the weight of silver in such article or articles, and his desire that an account of the same should be taken by such officer, so that delivery may not be unduly delayed, and a certificate from such officer of the correctness of the par-

ticals and weight, and of the fact of sale sent to the Commissioners shall have the same effect as if an account of such article or articles, as forming part of the stock of the person, had been taken for the purpose of the allowance under this Act."—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. H. J. WILSON: I beg to move to omit from the Amendment the words "not being a licensed dealer in plate." I do not understand how, with those words in the amendment, it will be possible for a manufacturer to get rid of his stock.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 1, after the second word "person," to leave out the words not being a licensed dealer in plate."—(Mr. Henry J. Wilson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. MUNDELLA: I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will see his way to accept this Amendment, because the manufacturer sells to licensed dealers and not to private persons who have no licence.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I understand that if the words are omitted it will be possible for the duty to be paid twice over by different persons. The whole of this provision applies to intermediates. The moment the interval is over the business will go on in the ordinary way.

MR. H. J. WILSON: How long is the interval to be? The last day mentioned in the Bill is September. Already trade is nearly paralysed, and people do not know how to get rid of their stock.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The amount is to be paid in September, but practically everything is to be arranged in June. It is evident that in all alterations of duty a certain amount of vexation must be caused in all trades. I think this trade has been extremely fortunate in obtaining a drawback; although, here and there, there may be cases of hardship, I think the hon. Member will see that it is scarcely well to push this matter too far.

MR. H. J. WILSON: The interests of a great number of people are deeply concerned in this matter. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the manufacturers cannot part with their stock to the licensed traders until the end of June.

*MR. GOSCHEN: No; June is the last date. The whole thing must be arranged by June. I may say we have been in communication with a large number of persons in the trade, and have endeavoured to make arrangements which will suit the convenience of the trade. We are certainly under the impression that the arrangements we have made will be satisfactory.

MR. H. J. WILSON: I believe the right hon. Gentleman has not been in communication with a single manufacturer in the town of Sheffield, which is a very important centre of the plate trade.

(8.7.) The Committee divided—Ayes 140; Noes 94.—(Div. List, No. 77.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 13, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 14.

(8.19.) MR. H. J. WILSON: I have given notice of an Amendment to leave out Sub-section I., but if that cannot be accepted I want to move to leave out in line 9, page 6, "payment of the allowances made," for the purpose of substituting the words "certificate is granted." Shall I, Mr. Courtney, move the omission of the sub-section first or the Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member should move the Amendment first.

MR. H. J. WILSON: Then I move the omission of the words I have mentioned. I can hardly believe that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended what the clause says. I do not know why he should desire the power of search after the Excise officer is satisfied and has given a certificate. It seems hard to expose the manufacturers and dealers to this power of search by carrying it over until the payment of the allowances.

Amendment moved, in page 6, line 9, to leave out the words "payment of the allowance is made," in order to insert the words "certificate is granted."—(Mr. Henry J. Wilson.)

*(8.21.) MR. GOSCHEN: I do not see why an officer should waste his time in making the search after payment is made and the whole matter is arranged. It does not seem to me that there need be any fear of these visits being paid. However, I do not think the Amendment can do any harm, and I, therefore, consent to it. Of course if, later on, it should seem to those familiar with these operations that the Amendment is one that should not be retained the matter will have to be re-considered on Report.

(8.21.) MR. MUNDELLA: If the right hon. Gentleman can facilitate the settlement of this matter in any way by introducing an Amendment on Report I hope he will do so.

(8.21.) MR. H. J. WILSON: If the right hon. Gentleman will introduce an Amendment on Report I will withdraw my proposal.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 15 and 16 agreed to.

Clause 17.

(8.25.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: What is the class of the articles which are liable to assay? Jewellery, I understand, is not liable; and what I want to know is whether silver articles are liable to be pulled to pieces and assayed before they can be brought into the country?

MR. JACKSON: This is merely a formal clause.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I know it is formal; but I think I am entitled to ask for an explanation of the point to which I have referred.

*(8.26.) MR. GOSCHEN: What is reserved here is not the power to assay, but freedom from assay. There is no change in the law.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: May we take it that jewellery, as distinguished from plate, is free from assay, and that silver jewellery is as free as gold jewellery?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member must not take for granted anything more than is in the clause. I might only be misleading him if I were to give him a specific answer to his question. The clause cannot do any harm as it is, seeing that it only maintains an existing principle.

(8.27.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I look upon the clause as unfortunate, as we shall not have free trade. We shall sacrifice revenue, but not the interests of the monopolists.

MR. BLANE: The clause will have a wide application, as it will cover any misdemeanour or felony which may have been committed—and we must remember the bearing of this upon anyone aiding or assisting the officers of the Inland Revenue. I think that to ask us to believe in the necessity for this is to make a large demand upon our credulity.

*(8.28.) MR. GOSCHEN: A drawback is going to be given to silversmiths and that may involve a certain cost to them, and what we wish to provide against is the expense incurred in giving the drawback. I see nothing about felony in it.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 18.

(8.29.) MR. BLANE: I feel convinced the Committee will not pass the clause in its present state. It is in this form an impost on thrift and industry, and it will be hard to charge this amount on a large class of poor people who wish to make provision for old age.

*(8.29.) MR. GOSCHEN: This clause is only to clear up a doubt as to the existing law. It does not provide an increase of duty.

MR. BLANE: I do not say it does impose an increase of duty; but I object to the duty to which it refers.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 19, 20, and 21 agreed to.

Clause 22.

(9.0.) MR. BLANE: The Amendment which stands in my name to this clause is to omit the words "profits and gains," and my object is to secure that the tax should fall upon what can rightly be described as property; I mean that we should not impose any taxation upon industry.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 5, to leave out the words "profits and gains."—(Mr. Blane.)

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think the hon. Member scarcely appreciates the practical effect of this. Schedules C, D, and E have no reference to property at all, and I am sure he does not mean to exempt all profits and gains under these Schedules.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. BLANE: I have to propose the substitution of "ownership" for "occupation" in lines 7 and 8 of page 8. My object simply is to make taxation fall upon those persons in the community who are best able to bear it. At the present time it falls upon those least able to bear it, and practically an immense amount of property in land escapes taxation. Landlords in former times held their lands upon condition that they should defend or contribute towards the defence of the land of the country; but in a Parliament composed of landlords the burden was adroitly shifted from this class on to the shoulders of those least able to bear it. Statute 12 of Charles II., cap. 24, was slightly amended by the subsequent Act of 1692, but practically the Land Tax remains as it was in 1660. The predecessors of those who are now owners of land were not "owners" of land but "holders" of land, and in lieu of the obligation of defence, upon which condition they held the lands, they charged themselves 4s. in the £1 towards Imperial taxation; but subsequently, and in successive Parliaments, they have lowered it to what we find it now—6d. It shows that landlords are very modest men when it comes to claiming their share in taxation. By reason of this exemption of land the burden of taxation is upheld by the industry of the country.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. Member is quite aware of the nature of the Amendment he proposes to move to the clause we are dealing with. It is a tax upon farmer's profits under former Acts of Parliament, and only provides the rate of the tax.

MR. BLANE: Quite so, Sir; but I, in moving the insertion of the word "ownership," am entitled to show how then the tax would fall.

*MR. GOSCHEN: If the hon. Member will excuse me for interrupting him, the owner pays under Schedule A; the farmer's profits are assessed under Schedule B. With the hon. Member's Amendment the owner would be required to pay on his land as well as on the profits of the occupier. I do not know whether the hon. Member appreciates this?

MR. BLANE: Quite so; he pays taxes on two separate items if my Amendment is carried. The owner would pay twice, but he would not be handing away his own money; he would only be handing away with his right hand that which he appropriates with his left. There are two ways of acquiring property, either by earning it or appropriating it. But these men do not pay taxes at all on—

*MR. GOSCHEN: Will the hon. Member allow me to point out that if a tenant farmer has not made any profit, he is not called upon to pay the taxes for which he is assessed under Schedule B.

MR. BLANE: If the tax falls on the tenant at all, it is a tax on the industry of the country, and to the taxation of the industry of the country I am opposed, and hence it is, I propose to substitute ownership for occupation. At the present time, the owner does not get the profit; it is the great ground landlord who gets the profit, and so it comes about that people are swept away from the land into large towns, where they have to engage in fierce competition for a bare existence. One of our financial journals has well discussed this question, and shown how this freedom of the land from taxation is a prime cause of the pauperism in the country. As the writer points out, a solution of the difficulty would be found in the acquisition of lands, at nominal value, by authorities empowered to allocate such lands to those able to work and procure a livelihood from them, subjecting these and all other lands to the 4s. tax. Thus would rates and rents both be reduced.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, lines 7 and 8, to leave out "occupation," and insert "ownership."—(Mr. Blane.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'occupation' stand part of the Clause."

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. T. FRY (Darlington): Before we pass from the clause, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question in reference to the rebate allowed for insurance. There are certain American

Insurance Companies carrying on business in this country who make their reports to the Board of Trade, and are in every way amenable to the laws that govern insurance in this country, and yet the Commissioners will not allow these companies to be placed on the list of those for which rebate on Income Tax assessments is allowed. This amounts to a tax of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the premiums of these companies, by whom it is regarded as a great hardship. This question has been raised on several occasions, and when I last heard of it it was under consideration. Has the consideration had any result? What is the ground of the refusal?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I can assure the hon. Gentleman the question is not one of administration, but of legal interpretation. There are statutes which direct the action of the Commissioners, and I am given to understand that the point, which I know has excited much interest, is now being argued in a Court of Law.

MR. T. FRY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, if the decision should be adverse to the claims of these companies, will he be prepared to take steps towards a legislative remedy for the complaint?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am not prepared to undertake that. I can assure the hon. Member there is much to be said on both sides.

*MR. MORTON (Peterborough): May I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why it is that the gross estimate is taken as the annual value? For all local rates there is another assessment, or what is called the rateable value. A good deal of trouble is caused to the taxpayers in consequence of this distinction.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member raises an immense question involving a modification of the produce of the tax and its relation to taxation generally. The hon. Gentleman asks me why it is that the tax is so levied, but I am afraid I can only now refer him to his knowledge of the fact. It is a grievance that is often alleged by the owners of real property, but it is a matter of such very wide scope that I can scarcely do justice to it merely by answering a question. It was calculated, I think, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian that in many cases the difference between the rateable and gross value amounted to as much as 17 or 18 per cent. This grievance, under which owners of real property labour, must be set against the advantage they gain under the Succession Duty. If, as regards Succession Duty, realty should be put on the same basis as personalty, then the time will come when realty should be put on the same footing as personalty as regards Income Tax.

*MR. MORTON: I am aware that the change in the assessment would involve a loss to the Exchequer, but it would be a justice to the taxpayers. Of course, the same remark applies to the Inhabited House Duty, which is charged on the same value. But may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to give the subject his consideration?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I may say that I have often considered it and spoken upon it. It is a matter of great importance. I can promise the hon. Member it shall continue to occupy my consideration, and not without some hope that it may be possible to deal with it some day.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 23.

(9.17.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer may accept the Amendment of which I have given notice, and I need not detain the Committee at any length. It is not often that opinions expressed in this part of the House are regarded as moderate by hon. Gentleman opposite, but when, as between the proposal in the Bill for a period of three months and the opinion among many hon. Members opposite that it should be extended to 12, I suggest six months, I think it is a reasonable compromise. Then I would suggest that there should be an appeal from the Commissioners to some other tribunal. I do not say that the Commissioners are not excellent men, but I am sure that farmers and business men who are entitled to relief from taxation on account of losses incurred will have more confidence in the consideration their claims will receive with the knowledge that an appeal is open to them. As to the period I think we shall all agree that three months is too short. I do not know exactly what is meant by the expression "year of assessment." I am not sure when the year is supposed to commence. But it is impossible for me to say, within three months, how trade transactions may turn out, nor can a farmer say as to his crops, which may be all right one day but spoiled the next. So, also, in the brewing trade, a man cannot tell within a short period whether his whole brew may not turn out an entire loss. Three months is an inadequate period. The Ratepayers' Association want 12 months, but I think the Government are more likely to concede the compromise I suggest of six months.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 23, to leave out the word "three," and insert the word "six."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Clause."

* (9.21.) SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I hope my right hon. Friend will agree to this modification of the clause. What the hon. Member says is perfectly true. I am sure that, within so short a time, it is quite impossible for a large number of persons to obtain the relief they are entitled to, because it will not be possible to get the accounts definitely made up. The hon. Member has proposed six months, but I would go much further. It is impossible for those engaged in agriculture to know within a limited time what their losses are—profits they do not make nowadays. I would strongly urge my right hon. Friend to agree to the proposal.

(9.22.) MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will explain what is meant by the year of assessment.

* (9.22.) MR. GOSCHEN: The year ending March 31st. This is really a case of "looking a gift horse in the mouth." It was a concession often demanded, and, being made, gave great satisfaction at the moment. But then the hon. Member has raised a new question. I do not complain of the proposal for six months, but he has mixed it up with the question of an appeal. That is important, no doubt, but it does not arise here, and I hope he will not ask me to deal with it now. Three months was the time inserted, because it is the usual period for various Departments in respect to Income Tax, but if hon. Members attach importance to it, I have no objection to six months. We are anxious that traders should have the means of relief—it is merely a question of machinery—we only took three months as being the usual time in analogous cases.

Question put, and negatived.

Question "That the word 'six' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That Clause 23, as amended, be added to the Bill."

(9.28.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Of course we take the warning and must not look a gift Chancellor of the Exchequer in the mouth. I refrain from saying anything about an appeal, but perhaps another year, when the right hon. Gentleman has had some experience of how the change works, he will not blame us—should he be in office, which, with all respect to him, I hope he may not be—if we raise this question of appeal.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 24.

* (9.29.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I must apologise for not putting my Amendment on the Paper, but, anticipating we should have a lively night upon the Spirit Duties, I did not think this part of the Bill would have been reached so early. The effect of the clause, so far as I can see, is to make an addition to the Death Duty, because a person is to be assessed for Income Tax after his death. It is to be left over for a period of a year, when he, not living, derives no benefit from the expenditure of the Income Tax. If that is not so, then I should be glad of an explanation. It also imposes an indefinite liability, extending over an indefinite period, upon the executor of the deceased. I propose to limit the period of the assessment to that during which the deceased was living, and, secondly, I shall propose that the claim made shall extend over a period of a year, in order that an executor may have some idea as to the extent of the time of his liability.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 11, after the word "administrators," to insert the words "but for such period only of the financial year as the deceased was living."—(Mr. Sydney Buxton.)

*(9.30.) MR. GOSCHEN: All that is proposed under this clause is, that when a person has died without being assessed such an assessment as might have been made if he had lived may be made upon his executors. The Amendment is quite unnecessary.

(9.32.) MR. CRAIG: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman's explanation advances the question very much. Any one reading the clause and knowing the habits of the Revenue officers might think—I do not say rightly, but might think—that the intention is to make the executors of a man who dies, say, on the 1st of May, pay a whole year's Income Tax. If that be the meaning I hope the Committee will either accept the Amendment or exclude the clause entirely. It is quite a new provision. The Income Tax officers always take advantage of the Act, especially in the case of dead persons. They always try to screw out of the executors more than they are entitled to. I want to know what is the meaning of the clause, and how it will operate.

*(9.34.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am sorry I did not make my meaning clear. The clause is merely intended to rectify omissions. If an assessment has not been made during the life of a man, the clause provides that his estate shall not obtain any advantage from the neglect to make the assessment. I do not think the Committee would wish that the fact of a man not having been assessed should free the estate from the Income Tax.

*(9.35.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I quite concur in the necessity of the course the right hon. Gentleman desires to follow, but I do not think the clause, as worded, will really carry out his intention. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to mean that if a man dies between, say, the 5th of April, 1890, and the 5th April, 1891, and no assessment has been made upon him for the portion of the year during which he may have earned his income, executors shall pay Income Tax in respect of that portion of the year. If that be the meaning, there can be no two opinions about it, because unless that intention be carried out there would be an evasion of the duty. But I would point out that the clause does not carry out that intention, and it seems to me we should be opening the door to great difficulties if the present wording were adopted. If the right hon. Gentleman will submit this question to the draftsman of the Treasury, all mistakes will be avoided. I would also draw attention to the fact that this is retrospective legislation, which might affect a great many estates which have been wound up, and the property of which has been distributed. Some alteration is, therefore, required in this respect also.

(9.38.) MR. GEDGE (Stockport): When I first read this clause the same objections occurred to me as have been stated by Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House; but I took the trouble to obtain an explanation from the Surveyor of Income Tax in my district, and I also looked up the Act. I then came to the conclusion that I had been mistaken, and that the clause properly carries out the intention of the Government. Under the law, as it stands at present, the executors of a man who, if he had lived, would be liable to be surcharged, cannot be surcharged. This clause will remedy that defect of the law. I may say now—to avoid the necessity of rising a second time—that there is an objection to the last four lines of the clause. We are told that the amount is to be paid out of the estate, and that, in default, the executors will have to pay—and that is making the executors liable for an amount which may be beyond the sum in their hands. That ought not to be. Words should be inserted in the clause to make the estate liable, and not the executors.

*(9.42.) MR. GOSCHEN: The question before the Committee will be looked into, so as to see whether the executors should be held liable for anything above the amount which the estate is capable of yielding. The Exchequer has the common interest at heart; it is not the enemy of anyone, and I trust that no one will look upon it as a thing to be opposed, even should it make a mistake. Supposing a mistake to be made, that should not relieve the estate from liability, and the only object of the clause is to enable property to be assessed, which has not been, but which ought to be, assessed. I will undertake that the Solicitor General and other Legal Authorities shall be consulted, and that, so far as legal knowledge can do it, the clause shall not be carried beyond the necessities of the case.

(9.45.) SIR W. HARCOURT: It seems to me that the words in the clause "in case he was living" will make an estate liable to pay Income Tax not only for the portion of the financial year during which the person assessed is living, but for the part after his decease. An ordinary person would suppose that on a man dying, his income would be assessed only for the period during which he had lived, and not for the whole year, regardless of the length of time he had lived during the year.

*(9.46.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has met us very fairly in this proposal; therefore, I will not press my Amendment. If I understand the right hon. Gentleman aright, he will submit the matter to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The proper course would be to withdraw the clause.

(9.46.) MR. FLYNN: No doubt it would be an easy thing to assess, under this clause, the income of a wealthy business man whose books have been accurately kept, and, in the case of default, if the collector is to blame, seeing that he is a Government servant, I think the loss should be borne by the Treasury. There are many people who do not keep books, and in such cases probably the only man who would have been able to give the necessary information would have been the deceased. These cases, which have not been urged on the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, are worthy of consideration. I would support the proposition of my hon. and learned Friend that the clause should be withdrawn, on the understanding that on the Report stage the matter will be put in a clear and intelligible form by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

(9.49.) MR. GROTRIAN (Hull, East): The question of the power of the Income Tax Commissioners or Surveyors of Taxes to assess retrospectively should be looked into. I am not sure that it extends to one year, and if that is the case I know instances in which the law has been overstepped. I know of cases where the assessors have gone back 10 years. I would ask for an assurance as to what the law really is, and if there is a doubt about it I would ask that the clause should be amended so as to make the retrospective power one year.

*(9.50.) MR. JACKSON: The point under discussion is met by what my right hon. Friend has said. There is at present power to proceed against the executor for Income Tax in the event of the person from whom the money is due and who has died having been duly assessed. There is no power in the event of the assessment not having been made to assess for the full amount which may be due, and all that is intended by this clause is to give power to proceed against the executor in such a case—such power as there would have been to proceed against the deceased had he been alive. Any difficulty there may be, so far as justice to the executor is concerned, will, as my right hon. Friend has said, be duly considered.

(9.52.) MR. FLYNN: I would ask the hon. Member to take into view a case that might easily occur. The right hon. Gentleman says the clause is to provide for the assessment of a man who ought to have been assessed, but has not been. Well, supposing a man dies who has not been assessed for a number of years, but is assessed the year of his decease. There may be nobody left behind to give evidence as to the income of the deceased. What should be done in that case? Generally speaking, no difficulty would arise in the case of people having large incomes, and there is no danger in those instances of executors being surcharged. In Ireland, however, there are a danger of a large number of persons being wrongfully assessed, and of executors having to pay large sums which they ought not to be called upon to pay; and I maintain that if there is neglect of duty on the part of Government officials to make a proper assessment, any loss that may result should fall upon the Exchequer.

*(9.55.) MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I think the difficulty in this case might be met by leaving out the last four lines of the clause.

• MR. T. M. HEALY: I protest against this clause. The Secretary to the Treasury has let the cat out of the bag in saying that the power to be conferred by this clause is to have effect when the Income Tax has not been properly assessed.

MR. JACKSON: I said duly assessed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, I say that if you have failed to make arrangements to get the money when the assessment is completed you ought not to have it. If you have the income duly assessed you should get the money, but if the income is not duly assessed you should go without the money. I would ask the Solicitor General, whom I see opposite, what he thinks of the proposal to charge an executor with the Income Tax of a deceased person who has not been duly assessed? Would the charitable gentlemen who conduct these operations on behalf of the Treasury expect the executor to stump up? Supposing the executor is a poor man, if a charge which he deems unjust is made he will object to pay, and will go to an attorney, who will advise him to fight the matter, and, if he does so, he may have to pay £50 or £60 in costs in regard to a claim of £10. Surely nothing more oppressive could be imagined. If all executors were rich men there would not be so much to complain of, but such is not the case, and I hold that by your proposal not only will the life of an administrator be rendered a terror, but death itself will be made a terror to him. You are going a length with this Income Tax which has never yet been suggested. The point raised by my hon. Friend has not yet been answered. An executor who, from charitable conscientious motives, acts on behalf of a defenceless widow and children, may be let in for a large bill of costs—an Attorney General or Solicitor General having, perhaps, been engaged to argue a matter of principle against him. This clause involves gross injustice both to the living and the dead, and, therefore, I think it should be omitted from the Bill.

*(9.59.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, North): It seems to me that the powers contained in this clause might operate oppressively and unfairly. If an executor is to be personally liable, it will, no doubt, be desirable to have an official paid executor, as is proposed in another Bill shortly to come before the House, because if you have a law of this kind it will be found very difficult to get men to act as executors. I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should go further than he has indicated, and put a limit to the time within which a claim can be made, so that an executor may not have a possible claim for unpaid Income Tax hanging over him for an unreasonable time.

*(10.0.) MR. GOSCHEN: I have said that I will deal with this point. The Inland Revenue officers, in doing their duty, think that there is a certain loss of duty which ought not to occur in the distribution of estates. These cases rarely occur, but it is the duty of the Inland Revenue officers to see that they shut the door on all possible evasions. I am, however, prepared to postpone the clause, hoping that when the question is submitted to the House they will support the Exchequer in this matter.

Question, "That the Clause be postponed," put, and agreed to.

Clause 25.

(10.2.) MR. BLANE: I beg to move, in page 9, lines 24 and 25, to leave out "two-pence," and insert "one penny." The object of the Amendment is to relieve the occupier of the tax, which, properly, ought to be paid by the landlords, for the homesteads do not belong to the occupier, but the Duke of Norfolk, the Duke of Bedford, the Duke of Westminster, and others. That the occupiers and not these men should be charged with the duty is, to my mind, an iniquity.

Amendment proposed, page 9, line 24-25, to leave out the word "two-pence" and insert the words "one penny."—(Mr. Blane.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'two-pence' stand part of the Clause."

*(10.4.) SIR STAFFORD NORTH-COTE (Exeter): I should like to say a few words as regards the Inhabited House Duty. I presume that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not accept this Amendment, but I wish to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to a Memorial which I presented from my own constituents on behalf of a class of men who may be said to have got beyond their first black coat, namely, those traders who are rated for premises which are to all intents and purposes unoccupied. In that constituency there is a leading firm who have three buildings—one shop and two warehouses. The two rooms above the shop are occupied by assistants, and the two warehouses have separate party walls and separate entrances. They are totally and absolutely disconnected from the shop. The shop is rented at £300, and the warehouses at £270 and £180. Now, the owners are already paying duty for their own private residences, and they claim that the accommodation of their assistants, for which they are taxed, is a business expense, and part of the assistant's salary. That they are taxed for the warehouses is a matter which they feel very keenly. There are a number of similar cases with which I will not trouble the Committee, but I think I have stated a fair case for my right hon. Friend to entertain. I am very grateful to him for the relief he has given the small owners of inhabited houses, but I do hope he will be able to consider cases such as I have brought before him. I trust that during the discussion of this clause he will be able to give us some satisfactory assurance that he will consider the subject next year.

*(10.8.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am afraid that I cannot pledge myself to any dealing with the House Tax next year. I quite understand the difficulty which the hon. Member's constituents feel, but it is impossible to see where the reform will stop, short of that total abolition of the House Duty to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby referred the other day. [Cheers.] I am glad to hear from that cheer that the abolition of the House Duty is not held as a boon to the landlords, as some hon. Gentlemen opposite maintain it would be. With regard to the Amendment to reduce the duty on houses under £40 to 1d., I cannot go beyond the concession which I have proposed to the House. It is an important concession, which I hope the House will appreciate.

Question put, and agreed to.

(10.11.) MR. DILLON: Sir, before the clause is passed I wish to make some observations as to the manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer disposes of his surplus. Naturally, the Bill is not unpopular with English Members, but the more the Irish Members study it the more they dislike it. The surplus is raised from the one particular class of tax to which the Irish people contribute more than their fair proportion, and it is used for the reduction of a class of taxation from which the Irish people got no benefit whatever. I protest against the nature of these remissions, as being little short of an outrage and a robbery of the Irish people. We have come to the last of the remissions, and, according to a Return issued yesterday, Ireland obtains absolutely no benefit whatever. There is an enormous consumption of currants in England, and Ireland does not eat one-sixtieth part of what is consumed here. Ireland gets no benefit from that remission, nor does she benefit by the remission on silver plate. Then, again, as to the Inhabited House Duty, the remission is to be given to England. Is it reasonable to expect the Representatives for Ireland to accept a Budget of this kind in silence? Ireland contributes considerably more than her fair proportion of the surplus, and she only gets one-thirteenth part of the relief, whereas, according to Mr. Giffen's statement, her proper proportion would be one-tenth. The surplus has come from the increased consumption of various kinds of wines and spirits. On all kinds of drink, including beer and foreign and home spirits, the amount contributed by Great Britain is less than £22,000,000, while the contribution of Ireland was over £4,000,000, so that Ireland contributes between one-sixth and one-fifth, while they do not get 1-20th of the remission. I will say no more at present. I have only thought it my duty to make this protest against the Inhabited House Duty, not because I regard it as unfair to the people of England, but that I consider it unjust to the people of Ireland; and I warn the Chancellor of the Exchequer that we shall feel it our duty at a further stage of the Bill to raise the whole question of the way in which Ireland is being treated by this measure.

*(10.16.) MR. GOSCHEN: I think if the hon. Member opposite were to examine the grievances he alleges he will find that they come to this, namely, that we have not reduced the duty on spirits in Ireland, because I do not know that there is any other way in which we could meet the complaints he makes.

MR. DILLON: Yes, by reducing the duty on tobacco.

*MR. GOSCHEN: But if we had done that, the same arguments would have been used against the proposal as have been used with regard to the reduction of the Tea Duty.

MR. DILLON: Not at all; the right hon. gentleman will find that the Irish people pay a much larger proportion of the Tobacco Duty than any other portion of the community.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman forgets that a large proportion of the tobacco consumed in Ireland is consumed and paid for by English people.

MR. DILLON: I am speaking from tables which have been corrected by allowance being made for that.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman is the first person who has suggested the reduction of the Tobacco Duty, and apart from that, or a reduction of the Spirit Duty, there is no way in which we could have met the right hon. Gentleman's views. If we had reduced the Income Tax, the hon. Member would have made a similar complaint, and that was one of the alternative proposals which I have been censured for not adopting. Had I proposed a reduction of the Income Tax, the hon. Gentleman would have had the same grievance as now. It is impossible, in dealing with the whole fiscal situation of the Kingdom, to look simply at the condition of Ireland. If Ireland has not had full advantage in the reduction of taxation, we are making it up to her in other ways. With regard to the Tobacco Duty I would remind the hon. Gentleman that I did reduce that some time ago, and it is too much to expect that we should go back to that duty again. I venture to think, whatever hon. Members may say, that I have not been chary in affording such relief to Ireland as might be reasonably expected at our hands. In all the fiscal changes we have made we have abstained from any remissions of which Ireland could not have full share. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has an exceedingly difficult task to perform, and I hope hon. Members will not think I have selected the reduction of House Duty because that is a relief in which Ireland would not share, although the hon. Member has almost suggested that I have done so. Fortunately for Ireland, she is relieved from this tax, but as I shall have to meet the Irish Members on the question of the general taxation of Ireland on another occasion, I will not now further continue the observations, and I trust hon. Members opposite will not think it desirable to plunge into that discussion at the present moment.

(10.20.) MR. DILLON: I do not wish to go into the whole question, but I would refer the right hon. Gentleman to the Return obtained by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, showing the proportions of the several items of Revenue contributed by England and Ireland. On that Return it will be found that while England contributed £6,500,000 of Tobacco Duty, Ireland's contribution was £1,300,000, that is to say, that the Irish contributed one-fifth of the amount paid by the people of England, which is a far larger proportion than they ought to pay. The right hon. Gentleman has said, if he had reduced the Income Tax the Irish people would have had a similar grievance. So we should, because the Income Tax contributed by Ireland is only one-twentieth part of that paid by England, which shows that the Irish people are only one-twentieth part as rich as the people of Great Britain. What I complain of is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer derives an enormous surplus from a tax to which the Irish people contribute more than their share; and he has not given them back their fair proportion in the shape of a corresponding reduction of the duty on tobacco, which is pre-eminently a tax on the poor of Ireland.

(10.23.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer boasts that he has generously given to Ireland a large sum. What are the facts? He has given one sum of £4,000, which he has carefully tied up, and £70,000 for National Education.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I would point out that in those cases there could be no generosity at all, because Ireland is entitled to those allowances. But the hon. Member does not refer to the light railways.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: We shall have something to say about the light railways hereafter, and the manner in which it is intended to expend the money. As to the Tea Duty, it is calculated that Ireland will benefit to the extent of £105,000 a year; but what the right hon. Gentleman gives with one hand he takes away with the other, because the increased Spirit Duty will increase the taxation of Ireland by upwards of £106,000. As to the Tea Duty, that is given out of the surplus extracted from our staple manufacture, namely, Irish whisky. Therefore, there is no ground for the boast of the right hon. Gentleman. If he will refer to the Tables which have just been published, he will see that the money raised by the Excise and Customs on licences amounts to £28,000,000 for Great Britain, while—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Question under discussion is Clause 25, which makes provision for the Inhabited House Duty, and the hon. Member is wandering from that Question.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I am aware of that; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has boasted of his generosity to Ireland, and I thought I was entitled to answer him by reference to these facts. I only desire to say that while the licences produce £28,000,000 in Great Britain, or £1 per head of the population, the taxation raised from the same sources in Ireland amounts to about £5,000,000, which is also about £1 per head, which is contrary to the maxim of finance, that the incidence of taxation should fall with greater weight on those who are best able to pay.

(10.26.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I only wish to say a few words. My hon. Friend contends that the Irish people are being robbed, and if that be the case they are being robbed by the Imperial Government, who say, "We belong to the bigger country and we do as we please." We are told that we enjoy the benefits of the Army and Navy and Volunteers, and we are also aware that we enjoy the great privilege of having the Union Jack floating over us, and of being ruled by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

Clause 26.

(10.28.) MR. STOREY: In moving, as an Amendment, to substitute the word "used" for the word "constructed," I would remind the Committee that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said we ought not to look a gift horse in the mouth. I shall at once disclaim any such intention by saying that I thank the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of myself and constituents for the reduction he has made in the House Duty. It is a reduction that has been long looked for, and at length it is in part obtained. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not think I am acting wrongfully if, like Oliver Twist, I ask for more. I am not asking, as Oliver did, for what was not his, but for what is not only ours, but what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has already promised to give. I say it is ours, because the owners of houses and tenements never ought to have had to pay House Duty. It was never intended by the original Act that they should, and it has been levied upon them improperly during a long series of years in utter defiance of the law. The right hon. Gentleman the present leader of this House, when on the Opposition side, said—

"That it was contrary to the spirit of the Act of Parliament by which it was intended that separate tenements of below £20 annual value should be exempted from the tax."

And I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer did intend to exempt those houses; but the 2nd sub-section of the clause does not carry this intention out, and therefore does not touch the case of hundreds of thousands of houses in this country. We in the North have ways of our own, and one of our ways is that we have large numbers of houses in our towns which used to be occupied in single tenements, but which are now let out in flats. The tenants all use one front door, and as a consequence the landlord has to pay the Inhabited House Duty. Yet on the other side of the street may be found a row of cottages which are each let at under £20 per annum, and which consequently are exempted from payment of the Inhabited House Duty. Now I think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should grant some relief in these cases. I beg, without further remarks, to move the Amendment in my name, to insert after the word "House," the word "used." I think the adoption of this Amendment would assist in providing dwellings for the working-classes. I do not think that there is any danger we should be encouraging rookeries, because a duty is imposed on the Medical Officer of Health to certify that the houses are fit for human habitation. I beg to move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 13, after the word "house," to insert the word "used."—(Mr. Storey.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'used' be there inserted."

(10.38.) SIR C. RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I wish to remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer that a large number of Metropolitan Members are interested in this matter.

(10.39.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): May I point out that the wording of the clause as it stands is neither sense nor grammar? It reads—

"The assessment to Inhabited House Duty of any house constructed (whether as originally built or by subsequent alteration)," &c.

I do not know who is the draughtsman of the Bill; but unless we want to put a conundrum to the Judges we must alter the words.

*(10.41.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am quite clear as to the policy which ought to be adopted. The concession ought only to be given to those houses which, by original construction or by subsequent alteration, are adapted to the housing of the working classes. The deputation which has waited on me was largely composed of owners of very inferior property, who frankly admit that they wish to get the benefit of the exemption for themselves. The Government do not wish to grant relief to cases where the house, designed for single occupation, has been so patched up as to supply inferior and inadequate accommodation for the working-classes. In the North of England a large number of private houses have been changed into dwellings for artisans, and there can be in them no proper sanitary accommodation. The only effect of the concession asked for would be to put the remission into the pockets of the landlords. The Government wish to encourage the building of suitable artisans' dwellings, by exempting only such from the duty.

(10.45.) MR. STOREY: I also desire to see the working-classes properly housed; and I am as anxious as the right hon. Gentleman that rookeries should be rooted out, and if I had thought the Amendment would have a contrary effect I would not have suggested it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says these people want to put money into their pockets; but the right hon. Gentleman has been taking money out of their pockets unfairly and against the spirit of the Act of Parliament. There are hundreds of decent houses in the North, fit for the habitation of the working-classes, which will not be relieved by this clause. I must press this matter, because it amounts to a very serious grievance in my own town. The burden, in fact, runs up to hundreds and thousands of pounds; and if the Secretary to the Treasury will only visit Sunderland—I can promise him he will be courteously received and courteously sent away—we shall be able to convince him of the real nature of this hardship. I make this appeal in the interests of the working classes. If the owner of three cottages is not called upon to pay Inhabited House Duty, why, I should like to know, must the duty be paid by the owner of a house which is let out to three working class families?

**MR. GOSCHEN*: Because one lives in a house and the other does not.

MR. STOREY: Oh, yes, he does; he lives in a house according to Act of Parliament. I press this matter, because it is a case of serious hardship.

(10.52.) MR. CRAIG: The arguments which apply to Sunderland apply with equal force to Newcastle; and I therefore join heartily in the appeal made by my hon. Friend to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the interests of the working classes.

(10.53.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): The Corporation of Birmingham have tried hard to discourage the state of things which my hon. Friend seems to want to continue. If an owner has a large house into which he wishes to put half a dozen families, that Corporation has not objected, provided each dwelling is made suitable in respect of water supply, and so forth, for each of those families. But in many of those tenement houses there is only one supply of water, and—

DR. TANNER: Where do you put the cow?

MR. COLLINGS: I do not propose to take notice of the insolence of the hon. Member, whose conduct is apparently approved by some hon. Members sitting around him. It does not affect me personally, but it does affect me as a Member of this Assembly.

DR. TANNER: Why do you not sit on the other side?

MR. COLLINGS: It reflects disgrace—

DR. TANNER: Sit with your friends.

MR. COLLINGS: I will tell my hon. Friend that I sit in my place.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member for Mid Cork will be good enough to restrain himself, and the hon. Member for Bordesley will proceed.

DR. TANNER: I only spoke—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member's conduct is really passing Parliamentary tolerance.

DR. TANNER: Of course, I bow to your ruling, knowing you side with the hon. Member. [An hon. MEMBER: "Name."]

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Mr. Collings.

MR. COLLINGS: I trust that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the interests of the working classes, will remain firm. Our object in Birmingham has been to induce owners of property in the large towns to make suitable provision for the working classes, and I think the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman will prove an incentive to owners in other large towns.

(10.59.) MR. ESSLEMONT: While I have great sympathy with the object which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has in view, I must say I do not think he will fulfil his purpose by this clause, and I deprecate most strongly his dealing with questions of sanitation in a clause of this kind. By merely altering the amount of duty the right hon. Gentleman is not likely to ensure proper measures of sanitation. The Government ought to see that the Medical Officers of Health and Sanitary Inspectors do their duty by these tenements. Knowing very well the habits of those who live in flats in the North of Scotland and other towns in Scotland, I maintain that the object the Chancellor of the Exchequer has in view will not be accomplished by this clause. On the contrary, by this clause a system of oppression will be practised upon a class of individuals who are not well able to bear it.

(11.2.) Question put:—The Committee divided:—Ayes 148; Noes 207.—(Div. List, No. 78.)

*MR. GOSCHEN: Perhaps it will meet the views of hon. Gentlemen if we leave out the words "constructed (whether as originally built or by subsequent alterations)," and insert "originally built or adapted by subsequent alterations and used."

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 13, to leave out the words "constructed (whether as originally built or by subsequent alteration)," and insert "originally built or adapted by subsequent alterations and used."—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

*MR. MORTON: Are we to understand that there is to be a separate entrance?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman will see that no such words are in the clause.

*MR. MORTON: Will there have to be a separate entrance?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Why should the hon. Gentleman wish to have the words? I believe, as I propose to amend it, the clause will meet the views of the Committee. It will be for the Sanitary Officers to decide whether the houses are properly adapted.

MR. STOREY: The proposed alteration is a substantial one, but let me point out that it is not necessary there should be a subsequent alteration. I suggest that the clause should be altered so as to read "originally constructed or adapted and used for the sole purpose." Additional sanitary arrangements in the yard might be required, and that would not be an alteration but an addition.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will agree to add the word "addition;" but I am not prepared to omit the word "alteration."

MR. STOREY: How will it read then

THE CHAIRMAN:

"The assessment to Inhabited House Duty of any house originally built or adapted by addition or alteration and used for the sole purpose."

MR. STOREY: I have to express my obligation to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'originally built or adapted by addition or alteration and used,' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 20, to leave out from "of" to "authority," in line 21 inclusive, and insert "other medical practitioner appointed as hereinafter provided."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. STOREY: No notice has been given of this Amendment, and I should be glad to know what is meant by it.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It is to carry out more fully what is in the Bill itself.

MR. STOREY: What is in the Bill?

*MR. RITCHIE: This Amendment is for the purpose of explaining more fully what will be the duty of the medical officer.

MR. STOREY: May we hear how the clause will read, if amended as proposed?

*MR. RITCHIE: It is considered that the words of the clause are too narrow and do not sufficiently explain what is intended. We merely amplify the powers we propose to insert in the Bill.

MR. STOREY: I doubt very much whether there is any necessity to go beyond the recognised Medical Officer of Health, who is a public officer. We have had some experience in this matter, and we know it is never very well to have private practitioners giving these certificates. Cannot the right hon. Gentleman see he is holding out a premium to private practitioners to give certificates to their clients? I think certificates should only be given by public officials, who are directly responsible to the authorities.

*MR. RITCHIE: The object of the Government is to provide that there shall be no delay. It is quite obvious that in a very large district the Medical Officer of Health may not be able to cover the ground as quickly as it is desirable he should. If the hon. Gentleman objects I do not know we need stick out for the appointment of additional Medical Officers. I think the hon. Member desires to omit the words "or of some other medical practitioner," &c. We agree to that.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in lines 20 and 21, to leave out the words "or some other medical practitioner appointed by him, with the consent of the Sanitary Authority."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause, put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 25, to leave out from "fee" to "Board," in line 27 inclusive, and insert "Medical Officer of Health of a district on request by the person who would be liable to pay the house duty were not discharged as aforesaid, shall examine the house for the purpose of ascertaining whether such a certificate can properly be given, and if the house be constructed so as to afford such accommodation and due provision be made as aforesaid, shall certify the same accordingly and for such examination he shall be entitled to receive from the person so requiring him a fee of five shillings together with an additional fee of one shilling for each dwelling if the number of separate dwellings in the house exceeds five, provided that the total fee shall not in any case exceed two pounds. The Medical Officer of Health may with the consent of the authority by whom he was appointed, nominate some medical practitioner having the same qualification as that required for the office of Medical Officer of Health to make such examination and give such certificates in his stead."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. STOREY: I beg to move to omit from the proposed Amendment all the words after "accordingly," for the purpose of preventing Medical Officers charging any fees. I never knew a more extraordinary proposal than that which is made by the Government. They propose to remit the Inhabited House Duty. Take a case to see how it will work. If a house be rated at £20, under the new scale there will be 20 times 3d., or 5s., to pay. Duty amounting to 5s. will be remitted, but 5s. will be charged for the certificate upon which it is remitted. The Government, therefore, take off the tax with one hand and put it on with the other. In our town we pay our Medical Officer of Health £500 a year. Would you have a man in that position, when he goes to make this examination, charge the occupier a fee of 5s.? In my view, it is improper to charge a fee at all; and, therefore, I move the omission of the words after "accordingly," so that it will yet remain the duty of the Medical Officer to examine, report, and certify, but he will be expected to include this in the duties for which his salary is paid.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out all the words after the word "accordingly."

*(11.30.) MR. RITCHIE: The only reason why a fee should be paid to the Medical Officer is that at present this forms no part whatever of the Medical Officer's duty. If you impose on an officer entirely new duties, which in many cases will take up considerable time, it is hardly fair to do so without offering him a fee, and a very moderate fee this is for the service performed. I hardly think the Committee will be disposed to grudge such a fee for these new duties, a fee which will relieve the occupier of the house at once from the payment of an annual duty.

(11.31.) MR. STOREY: For a £20 house the duty would be 5s., and the occupier gets no relief if you charge him a 5s. fee.

*MR. RITCHIE: He pays it once for all, that is my answer; and for that payment becomes relieved of an annual payment.

MR. STOREY: The right hon. Gentleman cannot have much anxiety to establish sanitary conditions in houses if that is his view. Though a house may not be fit one year it does not follow that the state of things will continue. Clearly the examination must be annual, if at all genuine.

*(11.32.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: There is another point to consider. The proposal is that a fee of 5s. should be paid when ever a certificate is granted; but it must be remembered the examination is the same whether a certificate is or is not granted. If the fee is only to be charged when a certificate is granted, that may act as an inducement to grant certificates. I think the fee, if charged, should attach to the examination, not to the granting of the certificate of exemption.

(11.33.) MR. HUNTER: I assume it is the intention of the Government that a certificate should last more than one year; but I would draw attention to the fact that there is nothing in the clause to that effect. The assessment is annual; but there is nothing in the clause to justify the view that the Commissioners would accept the previous years' certificate as an exemption. It will be necessary to introduce some words to make the intention clear.

(11.34.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman says the reason for this fee is that it is no part of the duty of a medical officer to make these inspections, but why should it not be? I cannot conceive anything more essentially part of a medical officer's duty than the investigation of the sanitary condition of houses in his district. If the salary of the medical officer does not admit of this additional duty, then let the salary be raised. I quite agree with my hon. Friend that the fee attached to the granting of a certificate might be considered an inducement to a medical officer to grant a certificate in doubtful cases where otherwise he might not grant a certificate. Clearly these examinations fall naturally within the duty of a medical officer and should be covered by the salary.

*(11.35.) MR. RITCHIE: I hope the Committee has noted the opinion the right hon. Gentleman has expressed that medical practitioners might be induced for the sake of a fee of 5s. to grant certificates when they ought not to do so. What we say is that by this Bill we are imposing a new duty on Medical Officers of Health, and that, therefore, the fee—which is a very small one—should be paid them. Surely it is not too much to ask the person who secures this exemption to pay a fee when he receives his certificate? I do not believe that any officer would be induced by this consideration to give a certificate he was not justified in giving.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Nobody said so.

*MR. RITCHIE: We do not think the fee is by any means too large for these new duties of the medical officer.

VOL. CCCXLIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

*(11.36.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: The right hon. Gentleman completely misapprehends the objection. It is not the amount of the fee that is in question, and my right hon. Friend's remarks were not open to the construction the right hon. Gentleman put upon them. But certainly, as the clause stands, the fee is only given when a certificate of exemption is granted. But let me point out this as affecting not only medical officers, but legal officers, and all officers in the Public Service, that we hold the doctrine that when you pay a man a salary you are paying him for the whole of his time.

*MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken. Nine-tenths of the medical officers do not devote their whole time to the service.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I understood the hon. Member (Mr. Storey) to say that at Sunderland the Medical Officer of Health is paid £500, and devotes the whole of his time to the discharge of his duties.

*MR. RITCHIE: I have no knowledge of what salary the Medical Officer at Sunderland gets; my memory does not enable me to say; but I do know that in a very large number of cases a Medical Officer does not get more than £50.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Let there be a distinction made. Surely in the cases where, for the whole of his time, an officer received a salary you would not have him exact a fee. It is part of the duty of a Medical Officer to examine the sanitary condition of houses, and our contention is that, instead of paying by fees, the salaries should be sufficient to cover duties like these.

(11.40.) MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I think it will be found that the places where Medical Officers are paid for the whole of their time are the places where 99 per cent. of these insanitary tenements will be found. In regard to these examinations, I certainly think we should encourage the appointment of medical officers who will devote the whole of their time to the service, and discourage the system of paying a man a small salary for part of his time. I am sure in the latter case you get a bad bargain.

U

(11.42.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I did not understand that any reflection was cast upon Officers of Health by my right hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler); but, on the contrary, I thought his remarks went to strengthen the opinion of those who hold that the proposal of the Government would be dangerous in the interest of public health. It is necessary that these examinations should be made by an expert, and it is desirable that an occupier should not be deterred by the fee charged. In large centres of population the Medical Officer is usually paid a good salary for the whole of his time; but Rural Sanitary Authorities often pay very low sums indeed for the services of their Medical Officer. It is, nevertheless, desirable that medical officers should discharge this duty of inspection both in rural districts and in boroughs; and it must lead to Rural Sanitary Authorities increasing the salaries paid to their medical officers. But the money will be repaid by the improvement in the health of the population.

(11.45.) MR. ESSLEMONT: In districts where such tenements exist the Medical Officer of Health should be required to place the whole of his time at the disposal of the authorities, and be paid a sufficient salary without charging fees. The contention which often exists between the medical officers and the persons whose houses are inspected will be much aggravated if the officers are allowed to collect fees. The Medical Officer should have an independent position and have a fixed salary. The clause, doubtless, was introduced with good intentions, but with imperfect acquaintance with the condition of things.

(11.46.) MR. RITCHIE: I am perfectly prepared to admit that there is a distinction between Medical Officers who devote the whole of their time and those who devote only a portion of their time to this work. If the House will allow the words to be inserted I will undertake to introduce on the Report stage some words with reference to Medical Officers who give up the whole of their time to the performance of those duties.

MR. STOREY: And the amount of the fee?

*MR. RITCHIE: I give no undertaking as to that.

MR. STOREY: I will not press the matter further now. Let matters stand as they are until Report stage. We must not be considered open to the charge of obstruction if we then raise the question of payment of fees, the amount of the fees, and the question of payment whether a certificate is granted or not.

(11.50.) MR. J. G. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I regret the Government should have given way in this matter. New duties are imposed upon professional men, and yet you object to an extra fee for extra work, such a small fee that no other professional man would accept it. I certainly shall resist any proposal to impose new duties upon a body of men beyond their conditions of service without extra payment.

Amendment to Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed.

(11.51.) MR. MORTON: I object altogether to the payment of Medical Officers by fees; it is a bad system, and in all intelligent communities it has been abolished. [Interruptions.] I do not know why I should be interrupted in this way by hon. Gentlemen who have returned to the House after passing the evening elsewhere. [Interruptions.] I have found, from experience, that if you give increased duties to a Medical Officer you are sure to have an application for increased pay. [Interruptions.] If these officers have a fair claim for increased payment, let it be granted, but not by way of fees.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.
Clauses 27 to 31 agreed to without amendment.

Clause 32.

(11.55.) Amendment proposed, in line 37, to leave out the words "must not sell methylated spirits in a less quantity than a reputed quart and."—(Mr. Jackson.)

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Will not the last two lines of the clause also have to be omitted? It appears to me if these are retained, notwithstanding the concession made, the clause will be incongruous.

*MR. BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford): May I ask what is the specific object of this Amendment? Is it with the object of doing away with the drinking of this class of spirit? Might not some arrangement be made by which double the amount of methyl in methylated spirit might be sold under the 10s. licence as compared with the indulgence licence?

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: If the earlier portion of the sub-section is omitted why retain the subsequent part?

MR. JACKSON: There are very good reasons. It is necessary to have such a provision, and that Revenue officers should have such powers of investigation so that other spirits may not be sold.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: Are there not many chemists who hold licences to sell spirits, and will they not come under this restriction, so that a chemist who does not hold a licence to sell spirits will be able to sell methylated spirits in smaller quantities than the chemist who does hold a licence?

*MR. BIGWOOD: It is an important question I raised just now. The amount of spirits purchased in London in very small quantities exceeds the knowledge of the Secretary to the Treasury.

*MR. CREMER: I would suggest that we omit the clause altogether. I have tried to understand it and cannot, but I think it will inflict considerable inconvenience and hardship upon a numerous class of furniture makers and workmen, such as French polishers, who largely use methylated spirits.

(12.0) MR. JACKSON: It has been pointed out to me that some alteration of the words may be necessary, and I will undertake between this and the Report stage to consider the matter.

*MR. CREMER: Does the hon. Gentleman consent to withdraw or postpone the clause? If not, I shall move its rejection.

(12.1.) MR. JACKSON: No; my suggestion is that the Amendment should be withdrawn, that the clause should be passed over as it stands, and I will consider the matter before Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(12.2.) Question, "That Clause 32 stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Committee do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again on Thursday next."

*(12.6.) MR. CHILDERS: I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what course he intends to take in the matter of the postponed clauses? Two years ago, in 1888, when for the first time certain revenues were appropriated for local purposes, Resolutions for additional taxation in the nature of Excise Duties were taken in the ordinary way, and, after being taken, were not included in the Budget Bill, but were put into another Bill. Will the Government now adopt that course, and discharge the postponed clauses from the present Bill, and incorporate them in a new Bill, following the precedent of 1888? In that year the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

"I ought to add that I propose to introduce the Horse Tax and the Wheel Tax in a separate Bill, as they do not affect the Imperial Budget at all."

Now, these postponed clauses do not affect the Imperial Budget of this year; and, therefore, the same reason that induced the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1888 to put those two taxes into a separate Bill is in full force at the present time. I, therefore, would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will not follow that course?

*(12.9.) MR. GOSCHEN: The result of not putting the Horse Tax and the Wheel Tax in the Budget Bill in 1888 was that those taxes were not carried at all. I think that that is not a very encouraging precedent to quote, as we desire to see these taxes carried. To follow the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman would necessitate the introduction of a fresh Resolution, a First and Second Reading, and Committee; and, wishing to do business as shortly as possible, we think the course we are pursuing is the best.

(12.11.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I agree that the precedent quoted by my right hon. Friend is not encouraging. The right hon. Gentleman has appealed to us on this side of the House not to delay the Budget Bill, and I would suggest to him that if the Government take the course which my right hon. Friend suggests they may pass their Budget Bill to-morrow. On the other hand, if these matters of compensation, which are hotly contested, are introduced, the Government cannot complain if the wheels drag heavily. Now, I have pointed out a course which will enable the Government to get the Budget Bill through without delay. It is impossible, if they keep the postponed clauses in the Bill, to avoid delay, because the proposals are regarded with great anxiety in the country, and must necessarily lead to prolonged discussions.

*(12.15.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government, of course, desire to get the Budget Bill passed without delay. I must refer the right hon. Gentleman to the course taken this afternoon in deference to the wishes of hon. Members opposite. There was an understanding come to that after full and ample Debate on the proposals embodied in these clauses they should be incorporated in the Bill, and further progress should not be delayed by obstruction.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday next.

ELECTIONS (SCOTLAND) (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.—
(No. 243.)

Bill read a second time, and committed to the Standing Committee on Law, &c.

MOTION.

TENANTS' COMPENSATION BILL.

On Motion of Colonel Cotton, Bill to amend the Law with respect to Compensation due to tenants on Land under Mortgage, ordered to be brought in by Colonel Cotton, Mr. Gray, Mr. Brunner, and Mr. Tollemache.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 259.]

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 9th May, 1890.

SOCIALISTIC LEGISLATION.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I regret very much to have to postpone the Motion which stands on the Paper in my name. I hope it will not be inconvenient to any noble Lord who is anxious to take part in this discussion; but as I am very anxious that the Prime Minister should be present to state the views of the Government upon this very important subject, a subject which is daily becoming of greater importance, and as the Prime Minister is unavoidably detained at present elsewhere, I feel that I have no other course—though I adopt it with great reluctance—than to ask leave to postpone this notice to the only free day on the Notice Paper—that is, next Monday week. I am very sorry to be compelled to do this.

JOURNAL COMMITTEE.

Report from, that the one hundred and twenty-first volume of the Journals (52nd and 53 Vict., 1889), with an Index, was ready for delivery; read, and ordered to lie on the Table; and the said volume ordered to be delivered in the same manner as the preceding volumes of the Journals have been delivered.

BILLS OF SALE BILL.—(No. 51.)

Read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 9th May, 1890.

The House met at Two of the clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

WALLASEY LOCAL BOARD BILL
(By Order.)

Order for consideration of Bill, as amended, read.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask, Sir, why I was not called upon to move the Amendment which stands in my name upon the Paper?

*MR. SPEAKER: I was told that the hon. Gentleman did not intend to move it.

MR. SEXTON: Although I did not intend to move it I desired to make a statement.

*MR. SPEAKER: Under those circumstances, the hon. Gentleman is entitled to make a statement now.

MR. SEXTON: I am much obliged to you, Sir, for affording me the opportunity. The object which I sought in giving notice of the Amendment was the protection of certain owners and occupiers who believe they have the right of enclosure and of user in regard to certain portions of the foreshore; but their wishes have, to a certain extent, been met by the Amendments which have been introduced into the Bill at the instance of the promoters. My intention was to move that—

“Nothing in this Act shall restrict or interfere with the rights of an owner and occupier of unfenced ground adjoining or abutting upon the foreshore from using the same for the purpose of his trade or business in connection with his premises now existing.”

I understand from the promoters that any action taken to-day will not prejudice the rights of the owners and occupiers in the future.

COLONEL SANDYS (Lancashire, S.W., Bootle): I may say on behalf of the promoters that the statement which has been made by the hon. Member is correct.

Bill, as amended, considered; a clause added; Amendments made; Bill to be read a third time.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—EXTRA POLICE IN CLARE.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is it true that the Government have caused the County Clare to be assessed for half cost of extra police in the last eight years, as follows:—1881, £169 13s.; 1882, £2,973 7s. 1d.; 1883, £6,608 3s. 8d.; 1884, £6,896 2s. 3d.; 1885, £6,153 1s. 8d.; 1886, £3,807 1s. 4d.; 1887, £4,164 7s. 5d.; 1888, £5,735 9s. 1d.; 1889, £6,915 5s. 7d.; total, £43,422 11s. 1d.; can he explain that since 1886, when Colonel Turner was sent there, the cost has nearly doubled; and will anything be done to relieve the people of this heavy impost?

• THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The amounts presented at Assizes in each of the years mentioned in respect of extra constabulary for the County Clare are as stated in the question. The increased charge referred to was owing to the appointment of an additional extra force, whose presence was rendered necessary for the purposes of affording increased personal protection and patrolling. A reduction in the number was a short time ago made, which I understand reduces the annual charge to about £5,600, as compared with about £6,900 last year. It was found that the improvement in the state of the county admitted of this reduction of the extra force, and, when a further improvement takes place, further reductions can be made.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If, as the right hon. Gentleman has stated, the condition of the county is improving, why should these extra police be necessary?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No doubt there has been an improvement, but I am afraid that it is due to the employment of these extra police. The hon. Gentleman will see, however, that there has been a reduction of £1,300 in the cost of the force this year.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that I will move that the Licensing Tax be devoted to the reduction of the contribution of the county to the maintenance of extra police.

JUDICIAL RENTS.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state when a Return will be given of the judicial rents fixed in Ireland since 1st December last; whether he is aware that for the three months ending on 30th November last, only 502 judicial rents were fixed by the Land Commission in respect of present tenancies in Ulster; and whether, considering that there are upwards of 9,000 fair rent applications served and still undisposed of from Ulster, and that it would at this rate take upwards of four years to hear the applications already made, he will either make some provision to protect applicants from the enforcement of the old rents pending the fixing of the fair rents, or appoint such a number of additional Sub-Commissioners as will dispose of the arrears in reasonable time?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Return of judicial rents fixed in Ireland during December was laid upon the Table on the 2nd inst., and the Land Commissioners report that the Return for January will be presented in a few days. They state that the number of rents fixed in Ulster in the three months ending November 30 was 629, not 502, as mentioned in the question; but they point out that these figures do not afford a true test by taking them as for three months, the Assistant Commissioners having been on vacation throughout September and up to October 8. The total number of fair rents fixed in Ulster during the four months to March 31 was 2,509. Every effort is being made to facilitate the hearing of applications.

MR. M'CARTAN: How many of the applications have been decided?

LIGHT RAILWAYS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, before the light railway line sanctioned by Mr. Price on the recommendation of Mr. Barton, and the line of Mr. Barton sanctioned by Mr. Price are approved by the Treasury, he will give his personal supervision to the proposed advances of public money involved in these schemes?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I think that I shall satisfy the hon. Member by saying that the necessary indispensable supervision of this question will rest mainly in the hands of my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, than whom there is no man more competent to deal with it. If, however, the hon. Member has any information which ought to be in the possession of the Treasury regarding this subject, I shall be glad if the hon. Member will communicate with us either personally or in writing.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The whole point is in a nutshell, namely, that one gentleman was appointed to supervise one line at the recommendation of one Government Inspector, and that the second gentleman was appointed to supervise another on the recommendation of the other Government Inspector—that the two, in point of fact, recommended each other. Is it the fact that in one of the cases the Grand Jury of the County of Galway were bullied into accepting the line? Surely this is a serious matter, and the hon. Gentleman ought to be able to give an explanation.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The statement of the case made by the hon. and learned Gentleman is hardly a fair one. No single member of a Court of five could decide the case any more than another member. I have previously stated that the utmost care was taken in arriving at a proper decision. The hon. Member is probably aware that in the case of Galway the scheme adopted was one which had been previously adopted by the Grand Jury.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The hon. Member is mistaken. It was the scheme of Mr. Whitby, an English gentleman, which was adopted.

MR. JACKSON: The scheme followed practically the same route.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No.

MR. JACKSON: I shall be glad to give the hon. Member any information in the possession of the Treasury in order to convince him that at all events, as far as the Government are concerned, they have only had one object in view, namely, to secure the best scheme.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the hon. Gentleman refer to Sir R. C. Cusack, the Chairman of the Midland and Great Western Railway, and ask him whether the line approved by the Grand Jury was Mr. Whitby's line or the Government's line?

MR. JACKSON: I have no objection to refer to the Chairman of the Midland and Great Western Railway; but I understand that the arrangement was refused unless the ordinary principle adopted in the construction of railways was recognised.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I shall be perfectly satisfied if the hon. Gentleman will refer to Sir R. Cusack.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): Was the threat made, that unless Mr. Price's line was adopted there would be no line at all; and is it not the fact that Mr. Price is the engineer of two or three works which are regarded as disgraceful swindles?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware of that fact.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): At the outset did not the Grand Jury refuse to make the line unless it was to be made on the old Irish railway gauge of 5 ft. 3 in.?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; there was no refusal, because it was never proposed.

IRISH JURORS.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a man of the name of Hegan, who is a well-known emergency man, and whose income is increased by the number of convictions, served on the jury at the last Londonderry Assizes; and whether, under the circumstances, he is qualified to be on the list of jurors?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have had no intimation either one way or the other on the subject of the hon. Member's question.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the jury in the first instance disagreed, and that it was then that Hegan, who is in the pay of the Government, was put upon the jury, after the counsel for the prisoners had exhausted all their challenges?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer that question off-hand.

POOR REMOVAL—CASE OF JAMES FLOOD.

MR. O'HANLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the removal of James Flood from the Union, Paisley, Scotland, to the Cootehill Union; whether the said James Flood served for many years in the Army, and was for a long time on the Staff of the 4th Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders, and had a pension of 17s. 6d. a week; whether his removal is legal; whether it is fair to the man Flood or to the Union that, after the best of his days in the Army, he should, at a time when his health failed him, receive such ill-treatment at the hands of the law; and whether the right hon. Gentleman will bring in a Bill to amend the present state of the law?

MR. SPEAKER: The last part of the question is irregular, and cannot be put.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts stated in the second paragraph of the question appear to be correct. The removal appears to have been legal. As to the rest of the question, I will refer the hon. Gentleman to a reply which I gave on the 22nd March, 1889.

BOYCOTTING—CASE OF MR. JAMES DALY.

MR. O'HANLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen the following paragraph in the Ulster Weekly News, of the 12th April, 1890:—

"James Daly and his fellow prisoners, who were convicted at the last Derry Assizes for boycotting the engines and waggons of the Great Northern Railway, Ireland, were transferred on Tuesday from Derry to Belfast, in charge of three policemen. They were clad in prison garb, and, on their arrival at Belfast, were handcuffed two and two, like common felons, and taken away on cars; and, to an ordinary observer, it seemed that their clothing (they had no overcoats) was hardly sufficient for the biting winds of the day;"

whether the above is a true statement of the removal of the prisoners; and will he see that in future prisoners will receive better treatment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A great part of this question has been answered before. In regard to the new part of it, I have made inquiry, but have not yet received a reply.

THE CRIMES ACT.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen the reports in the newspapers of the trial of Messrs. Kennedy, P.L.G., Doyle, Milligan, Kavanagh, and Mordaunt, at Gorey, on Monday 5th instant, under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; what was the nature of the evidence on which these men were sentenced to three months' imprisonment each with hard labour; whether it is true that two of the defendants, Messrs. Mordaunt and Kavanagh, were sentenced at the same Court on the same day to six months' imprisonment each with hard labour, in addition to the three months already inflicted; and whether it is true, as stated, that counsel for the defendants applied to the two Resident Magistrates to have a case stated, on the grounds that there was no evidence to go before a jury; and, if so, why was the application refused?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that sentences were inflicted, as stated in the second and third paragraphs of the question. The Magistrates refused to state a case on the ground that the application was frivolous, as they were satisfied there was very strong evidence to go before a jury. I am unable to make any statement bearing on the nature of the evidence, two of the defendants having appealed.

MR. FLYNN: Will the right hon. Gentleman communicate with the Law Officers of the Crown in order to have a case stated?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see that there is any necessity in this case.

POLICE WATCHING.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether complaints have reached him that at the last Fermoy fair, on Monday, the 5th instant, a number of cattle dealers and farmers were persistently followed by policemen all over the fair; if so, what is the object of this constant watching; and, in view of the complaints made by the parties that they cannot buy or sell their cattle on account of being so followed, whether suitable instructions will be given to the constabulary to desist from the practice complained of?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that no persons were watched by the police at the fair mentioned except those whom they had reason to know were endeavouring to boycott the sale of cattle belonging to so-called obnoxious persons. No cattle dealer was followed.

MR. FLYNN: In reference to the second paragraph of the question, will the right hon. Gentleman ascertain whether it is not possible to issue instructions to the constabulary to desist from the practice complained of in the case of persons engaged in the pursuit of their own legitimate business?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If these persons have been engaged in illegal transactions they must expect that disagreeable consequences may follow.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that, on the 7th instant, in the town of Tipperary, Mr. Robert Paul Gill, civil engineer and architect, of New Tipperary, was accompanied by two policemen named Maddock and Gurry, who walked alongside of, and keeping step with him; whether Mr. Gill asked the policemen had they any business with him, and again would they persist in accompanying him in the same manner; whether Gurry said to Maddock, "Answer no more questions, we will do what we like," and continued to accompany Mr. Gill; and whether this procedure of the policemen is according to any special instructions to the police of Tipperary? I wish to supplement the question by another—whether a Roman Catholic priest in Tipperary has not also been followed in this way; and whether, when he goes to fulfil his sacred function, he is not accompanied by the police, who walk by his side in the street, no matter where he is going, or for what purpose? Does such conduct receive the approval of the Government, and is it by their instructions? If he is unable to answer the question will he take a note of the particulars, make inquiries, and give a satisfactory answer?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that Mr. Gill is not under police supervision, but that he was accompanying Mr. Cullinane, who is.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Gill is an architect who is now engaged in superintending important building operations in New Tipperary; and is it fair that a professional gentleman should be so interfered with in the transaction of his ordinary business?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware of the fact stated by the hon. Gentleman.

HANDCUFFING PRISONERS.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he explain why Messrs. Mulligan, Kavanagh, Mordaunt, and Grannel, who were sentenced by a Special Court, under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, at Gorey on Monday last, were handcuffed in pairs, and conveyed under a heavy escort to Wexford Gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the course referred to was rendered necessary to secure the safe custody of the prisoners, a large number of persons having assembled and surrounded the escort in charge of the prisoners. The police are responsible for the custody of prisoners, and it might be that they anticipated a rescue.

MR. CLANCY: Has there been a single attempt at rescue for the last five or six years?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If that is the case, I suppose it is because the precautions taken have been adequate.

CASE OF MARY CULLINANE.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it is true, as reported in the local papers, that a young woman named Mary Cullinane was sentenced by Colonel Evanston, R.M., on Monday last, at Clonmel, to six months' imprisonment for the alleged boycotting of two men named Duggan; and, if so, what explanation can be given for the infliction of such a heavy sentence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the facts are not accurately represented in the question. The defendant was charged with persistently following and preventing a man who occupied a farm from which this woman and her brother had been evicted from pursuing his lawful callings. Her conduct was such as to lead to a breach of the peace. The Magistrate ordered the defendant to find bail. This she refused to do, electing to go to prison in default.

In reply to a further question by Mr. FLYNN,

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said: This was the third time this woman was brought up for the same offence. If she had found security she would have been liberated.

IRISH MUNICIPAL VOTERS.

Mr. WEBB: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any Return has been presented to Parliament giving the municipal population and number of municipal voters in Ireland; and, if not, whether there would be any objection to furnishing such Return?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; there is a Return of 1885, giving this information with regard to England, Scotland, and Wales, and a Return of 1886, giving it with regard to England. There would be no objection to continuing these Returns, if the hon. Member wishes it.

THE FUNERAL OF MR. HARRIS, M.P.

Mr. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now make his promised statement as to the conduct of the police at Ballinasloe on the occasion of the funeral of Mr. Harris, M.P.?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the police waited on the leaders of the committee organised to carry out the public funeral of Mr. Harris, and mentioned that if a funeral oration were delivered a Government shorthand writer would be present, and requested to know whether any objection would be raised. The police were informed at once that there would not be the slightest objection, and that, on the contrary, every facility would be given to the police. The police, accompanied by a shorthand writer in plain clothes, simply walked into the graveyard with the rest of the concourse of about 2,000 people, and paid as much respect to the dead as any one present.

Mr. SEXTON: As there is a direct conflict of testimony on the subject, will the Chief Secretary give any facilities for inquiring into the truth of the allegations against the police?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, really, I do not know what further inquiry can be made unless by a Special Commission.

Mr. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman has had enough of Special Commissions for the present. Did the right hon. Gentleman approve of the intrusion of the police on the relatives of the deceased; and, if he approved of the presence of an armed force at funerals in Ireland, would he, at least, undertake that this should be done on the orders of the Executive, and not at the discretion of the local police?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Gentleman has misinterpreted the facts. He talks of an armed force as if there had been an army of police, with swords drawn, bayonets fixed, and all the rest of it.

Mr. SEXTON: They had swords.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The police were not armed in the manner suggested. There were only, I think, eight policemen altogether, a far less number, by the way, than would be present in the case of a large public funeral in England or Scotland. It seems to me the Head Constable acted properly in asking the committee making the arrangements for a public funeral whether they had any objections to the police attending or not. The request in this case seems to have been made in a respectful manner. With regard, however, to the question, I am distinctly of opinion that unless there was some ground to think that illegal speeches were going to be made there was no occasion for having police reporters about the grave; and that unless there was some proof that the funeral was to be made the excuse for illegal speeches the police reporters should not be present.

Mr. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the constables had their side arms, and also not merely attended in the churchyard, but formed a line immediately about the grave and shut out the mourners from the coffin?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think the hon. Gentleman is correct in his facts. The police had their batons only, and not their side arms. Of that I am not quite sure; but I am distinctly informed that no obstruction of any kind was offered to the mourners by the police.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The grave of the late Mr. Biggar was similarly "moucharded."

MR. HAYDEN: I myself saw the side arms. Will the Chief Secretary make further inquiries, there being a great deal of dissatisfaction in the district on the subject.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Is it the custom, when men are buried in Westminster Abbey, to have police notetakers to take notes of speeches?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS MAILS.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, as the mails for the Straits Settlements, now sent fortnightly by French Packet, are frequently delayed in their arrival till after the departure of the Home Mails, it would be possible to send the outgoing alternate mails, now transmitted by the French Packet Service, by Bombay and Negapatam, as the Home going mails are now fortnightly sent?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): The French Packets conveying mails fortnightly from this country to Singapore are timed during part of the year to arrive at that place about five days in advance of the departure of the mails sent home by the same line of steamers, and I have no official information of the delays referred to by my hon. Friend. But I will make a point of inquiring of the Singapore Post Office whether inconvenience does not arise from the present Postal arrangements with the colony, and whether the remedy which my hon. Friend suggests could, with advantage, be adopted.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government, having taken for other purposes the evening allotted by the fortune of the Ballot to the discussion of a proposal for a return to the ancient freedom of Debate on the Indian Budget, will propose some amendment of the procedure of the House in this respect?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury has asked me to answer this question. My right hon. Friend is not prepared to recommend the House to make any change in its Rules in the direction suggested by my hon. Friend. The effect of his proposal might be to postpone the statement of Indian finance and the discussion on the most important questions of Revenue and Expenditure for the consideration of some local or personal matter. Hon. Gentlemen who take an interest in India have opportunities, in common with other hon. Members, to put Motions on the Paper, and there are other occasions of Bills affecting India on which discussions may arise.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will remember that in connection with other questions there is always an opportunity of raising a discussion when we are asked to vote money. But in the case of India none of the salaries are voted here.

MR. GOSCHEN: No doubt the Indian salaries are not voted by this House in the same way as other salaries are; but I am afraid that any new course of procedure would only be likely to land us in difficulty.

NAVAL MANŒUVRES ON THE CHINA STATION.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is correct that the Naval Manœuvres conducted by Admiral Sir Nowell Salmon on the China Station, between the 17th and 20th March, resulted in the following casualties:—A second-class torpedo boat cut almost in halves by one of the boats of the attacking squadron by a blunder on the part of the engine-room artificers; that the Alacrity despatch vessel, with the Commander-in-Chief on board, ran ashore in a fog whilst steaming 12 knots an hour, carrying away four square feet of her prow, and that her repairs will occupy at least three weeks, and that all the attacking boats were more or less injured by collisions; whether these collisions were caused by the boats being worked by artificers in place of certificated engineers; if it is correct that the Im-

périeuse flagship, in returning into Hong Kong Harbour, collided with the German flagship there at anchor by not making sufficient allowance for the tide; and what inquiry he intends making with regard to the manœuvres and casualties?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The casualties referred to by the hon. Member did, unfortunately, occur during the course of the recent Naval Manœuvres on the China Station. The Report of the grounding of the Alacrity is now under the consideration of the Admiralty; but no official Reports on the other casualties have yet been received. Until these Reports are received the Admiralty will not be in a position to come to any decision with regard to the circumstances in question.

SAVING OF LIFE AT SEA.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is true that he has again postponed for several months the enforcement of the Regulations drawn under the Saving of Life at Sea Act of 1888 by a Committee of Experts; and in such case, what is the reason for the further delay, having regard to the three years which have nearly elapsed since the Select Committee reported the total inadequacy of present arrangements for the safety of passengers or sailors, and to the fact that the requirements of the Act as to the provision of life-saving gear have long been in force in the United States and elsewhere?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The operation of the Rules drawn under the Saving of Life at Sea Act of 1888 by a Committee of Experts has been postponed until the 1st of November next at the request of the Committee of Experts which framed them, and which was appointed under the Merchant Shipping (Life-Saving Appliances) Act, 1888. The ground upon which the postponement was recommended was the necessity for carefully re-considering the Rules as affecting vessels in the short-sea and coasting services. Some other points more generally affecting the registration of the Rules are also under the consideration of the Committee.

Mr. Gourley

MR. H. VINCENT: Will the Rules be laid on the Table before they are finally adopted?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I believe so.

COAL MINE FATALITIES IN SOUTH WALES.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the Report of Mr. Robson, the Mines Inspector of the South Wales District, for 1887, in which he says that the fatalities from falls of roof and sides were "very excessive," and could not be accounted for by the inferiority of the roofs and greater "squeeze" in the South Wales coalfield, and to the paragraph in Mr. Robson's last Report that—

"After two years' experience in this district, I am convinced that the supervision of the colliers' working places, where the majority of the falls occur, is not all that can be desired. The supervision is, I believe, generally given, but it is of too cursory a nature, &c.;"

and whether, considering that the ratio of fatalities to persons employed in South Wales is double that in the North of England, and that the number of collieries under the inspection of Mr. Robson is 50 per cent. more than the number under the charge of the Inspectors in the Newcastle and Durham districts, he will consider the desirability of appointing a few experienced workmen as sub-Inspectors, to assist the Inspectors in South Wales, with a view to securing a more strict observance of the 21st General Rule of "The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887"?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have no reason to believe that the Inspectors are unmindful of the Rule providing that no persons shall be allowed to work alone as a collier in the face of the workings until he has had two years' experience of such work. On the contrary, at their last general meeting it formed the subject of discussion. No complaints have reached me that the Rule is disregarded. If the hon. Member will bring to my notice any instance of disregard I will do all in my power, by issuing instructions to the Inspectors, to secure, as far as possible, its proper observance.

THE COAL MINES REGULATION ACT.

MR. DAVID THOMAS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will direct the particular attention of the Mines Inspectors to Rule 39 in the General Rules under "The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887," which provides that no person shall be allowed to work alone as a collier in the face of the workings until he has had two years' experience of such work under the supervision of skilled workmen, and which Rule it is alleged is not generally observed; and what steps have been taken by the Inspectors of Mines to carry out the intention of the Rule, namely, that no inexperienced person is to be allowed to work in a stall except together with, and under the direction of, a skilled workman?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must somewhat modify the hon. Member's figures. The number of persons employed per life lost was 480 in South Wales, 741 in the Durham, and 757 in the Newcastle District last year. The lives lost from falls of roof were last year 77 in South Wales, against 87 in the previous year. I am informed by the Inspector that these are the accidents against which inspection is of the least avail. The timbering of the working places devolves upon the colliers, who resent interference or advice from the Inspector; and it would be absolutely impossible for Inspectors to supervise the timbering of the shifting working places of a district where upwards of 70,000 men are employed.

PAINT FOR THE NAVY.

SIR ROGER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what is the present system under which paints are tested and selected for use on the bottoms of Her Majesty's ships; and who is responsible for the selection of the compositions which are ordered from time to time to be used for this purpose; by whom was he appointed, and for how long; and on what principle does he make his selection?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The system under which paints for coating ships' bottoms are selected for use in the Navy was very carefully revised by the present Board of Admiralty after a Committee of experts had reported on the whole subject. An officer who was a member of that Committee has been charged with the special duty of watching not only the results of the paints applied to Her Majesty's ships, but he also reports upon the various coatings used in the Mercantile Marine. With the information thus obtained, the Admiralty select those paints which, so far as present experience goes, have given the best results, and they find it advantageous, once a certain description of paint is applied to a vessel, to continue the use of the same material when the vessel requires subsequent coatings. I may add that compositions for coating the bottoms of Her Majesty's ships are first of all chemically tested to ascertain whether they contain anything that might act injuriously upon the plating. They are then practically tested on a ship's bottom alongside other compositions used in the Navy.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): Will the noble Lord take precautions to guard against storing paints and dryers containing chemicals liable to cause explosion?

LORD G. HAMILTON: These things are used externally and not internally.

OFFICERS OF THE INLAND REVENUE.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the number of officers of the outdoor branch of the Inland Revenue Department censured, reduced, and dismissed during the past three years; and what is the number so censured, reduced, and dismissed in what is called the indoor branch of the same Department during the same period?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Comparisons are proverbially odious. I do not see any advantage in a public statement of censure inflicted on two great Departments, both of which, as a rule, perform their functions well. Nor could any comparison be fair looking to the different circumstances and size of the two branches in question.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask whether any Circular has been recently issued in connection with this or the Customs Department asking to be supplied with a Return of the nationality of the persons employed; and, if so, what is the object?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am not aware of the fact; but if it is desired I will obtain the information. It is possible that it may have been the case.

MR. SEXTON: I will put a question upon the subject again.

DEPUTATIONS TO THE BOARD OF TRADE.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will take into consideration the question of providing reasonable accommodation for the numerous deputations having business at the Board of Trade whilst kept waiting for an audience, so as to prevent them from being detained in ill-ventilated passages, or on the staircase, as was the case with a deputation on the 2nd May, for about 20 minutes after the time appointed for their reception, such deputation having been composed of numerous Members of Parliament and others, assembled to discuss the question of the proposed bankruptcy legislation?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I very much regret any inconvenience that may have been caused to any members of the deputation on the occasion referred to. It was due to the fact that the deputation which immediately preceded them detained me much longer than had been anticipated, so that the room ordinarily used for deputations to assemble in was not at their service.

THE THWING SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to an advertisement in the Schoolmaster of the 26th ultimo, issued by the Thwing School Board, for a certificated master, stipulating that candidates must be able to play the harmonium, and will be expected to do so in the parish church; and whether this requirement, that the instrumental music in church shall be provided at the cost of the rates, is in accord with the law of the land; and, if not, whether he will take the matter up with this School Board?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Department have no power to prescribe to School Boards the terms of their advertisements; but if it should appear that any part of the master's salary is paid in respect of services tendered as organist in the parish church, it would, no doubt, be for the auditor to disallow the amount, and it would not be taken into consideration by the Department in estimating the grant due under Article 114.

THE RAILWAY RATES INQUIRY.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is true, as reported in the Birmingham Daily Post of 4th March, 1890, that the cost of the Railway Rates Inquiry has been at the rate of £10,000 a day; what proportion of the cost has been borne by the traders, what by the Railway Companies, and what by the country; and whether it was contemplated when the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1888 was passed, that such a long period would elapse before its provisions came into operation?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have no means of knowing what is the total cost per diem of the Railway Rates Inquiry, nor have I any means of ascertaining what cost is incurred by the traders or the Railway Companies. But I cannot suppose that it reaches anything like the amount mentioned. The charge which falls upon the Public Funds is limited to the expenses connected with the hiring of a room, shorthand writers' notes, printing of proceedings, and the salaries of a few temporary clerks; but a portion, if not the whole, of this charge will be met by the fees paid by the Railway Companies on the deposit of their respective schedules. As regards the length of the inquiry, Lord Balfour of Burleigh and Mr. Courtenay Boyle have used their best endeavours to shorten the proceedings as much as possible; but a large number of traders have desired to come before them whom they have not thought it compatible with their duty absolutely to decline to hear. There have been 33 witnesses for the Railway Companies, and up to yesterday, when the evidence closed, 178 witnesses for the traders.

TITHE REDEMPTION.

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, whether the Government will consider the advisability of advancing money, at a low rate of interest, from the Treasury for the purpose of tithe redemption?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: There is a good deal of difficulty involved in the suggestion made by my hon. Friend, but the matter is receiving very careful consideration from the Government.

THE ICARUS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the Naval and Military Record of 8th May; and whether, in view of the precise and serious allegations therein contained, he will order a Court of Inquiry into the condition of the Icarus while under Commander Annesley?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have not seen the report in the newspaper in question. In view of the serious nature of the allegations that have been made, which have already formed the subject of a question in the House, substantiated by a letter written by the hon. Gentleman, instructions have been sent to the Commander-in-Chief at Plymouth to inquire into them, as I felt that, in the interests both of the officer commanding and of the crew, an investigation was necessary.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I regret that the notice should have been so short, but the case seemed to me to be very urgent.

POSTAGE RATES TO AUSTRALIA AND INDIA.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield) postponed until Monday a question to ask the Postmaster General what is the estimated loss to the Revenue by the reduction of the postage rates to Australia and to India from 6d. and 5d. to 2½d. in each case; what is the estimated additional loss to the Revenue if the postage rates to Australia and to India were reduced from 2½d. to 1d.; and what is the further estimated loss if the postage rates to all the Colonies and to India were reduced to 1d.?

THE NEW CODE.

MR. A. PEASE (York): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether Article 100 of the New Code is intended in its operation to disqualify and supersede all those uncertificated assistant teachers and others who are now teaching separate infant classes under Article 108 of the Old Code with an average attendance of 50?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: Article 100 of the New Code has been framed in conformity with Article 73, by which the staff requirements have been sensibly increased; but nothing in the terms of the Article will disqualify or supersede any teacher who is superintending an infant class with an average attendance of 50.

THE AMERICAN TARIFF BILL.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham Bordesley): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, if the American Tariff Bill now before Congress is passed into law, the Government intend to take any steps to encourage British manufacturers to exhibit at the "World's Fair" in Chicago, seeing that the Bill in question is prohibitive as regards many classes of British manufactures?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The question of any official participation by Her Majesty's Government in an International Exhibition can only be determined upon a review of the advantages to British interests when an invitation is received from the Government promoting it. But it is only probable that manufacturers in this country would be to a great extent deterred from sending specimens of their goods for exhibition if the Customs Duties imposed in the country of the Exhibition were such as to preclude their profitable sale there.

TROPICAL AFRICA.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I have on the Paper a question to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the rumours which have appeared in the public prints regarding treaties or arrangements with Native, Chiefs in the interior of tropical Africa alleged to have been recently made on behalf of Her Majesty or of any British Company; and whether he is now in a position to give the House any information upon this subject? I beg to postpone the question.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL POSTAL SERVICES.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) postponed until Monday a question to ask the Postmaster General whether by far the greater proportion of the loss to the Revenue of £254,000 per annum on the Foreign and Colonial Postal Services is due to the East and West Indian Packet Services; and whether, down to the year 1858, this portion of the loss to the Revenue was charged upon the Admiralty Vote?

THE LICENSING PROPOSALS.

MR. ALLISON (Cumberland, Eskdale): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the effect of the licensing proposals of the Government, as explained by him at Rawtonstall, will be to establish two authorities with power to diminish the number of public houses, one the Justices with powers to do so without giving compensation, the other the County Council, who are only empowered to do so on giving compensation; and will he explain in what manner he proposes to maintain the two systems side by side without weakening the powers possessed by the present Licensing Authority?

MR. GOSCHEN: The powers at present possessed by the Justices will not be interfered with, and will be exercised side by side with the employment of the means placed at the disposal of the County Councils for the extinction of licences. The Government do not anticipate that their proposal will in any way weaken the powers possessed by the Justices.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): May I ask whether it would not be desirable to postpone the proposal in question until the Committee which is to consider the Bill of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) has made its Report?

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not think that my right hon. Friend the leader of the House would be disposed to assent to that proposal.

HONG KONG—THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ORDINANCE.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Ordinance directed by the Secretary of State to be introduced in the Hong Kong Legislature for amending the Contagious Diseases Ordinance of 1889 has yet been passed; and, if not, what is the cause of the delay?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): As the Secretary of State's instructions in regard to an amending Ordinance were only sent last January, there has not yet been time for the Ordinance to be passed and sent home, but the officer administering the Government will be requested to push the matter forward as soon as possible.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government has any intention of improving in any way the present unsatisfactory position of the Civil Service Writers, many of whom have already served the State continuously for a period of 20 years, and only receive, after eight-and-a-half years' service, an annual bonus of 30s., increasing annually at the rate of 1d. per day?

MR. GOSCHEN: The case of the registered copyists was examined into by the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments, who stated in their second Report that they had before them—

"The representatives of the copyists, but we cannot report that, in our opinion, they have established any grievance which it is the duty of the State to remedy."

HIRED DOCKYARD MEN.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether James Davies, at the time he was injured in the execution of his duty, had worked in the hired department of the Pembroke Dockyard for more than 25 years, and was, therefore, entitled to a gratuity of £25 whenever he was discharged; can he explain why, although at the time of his injury, James Davies was earning £1 a week, and would have been entitled under the rules to a gratuity of £52 as a maximum on account of his injury, or in all to a gratuity of £77 as a maximum on account of his length of service and of his injury combined, when he was discharged (in consequence of the injury to his hand) he received a gratuity of £52 2s. 10d., of which £25 was due to him apart from his injury, and the balance, £27 2s. 10d., only paid to him on account of his injury; do the rules permit of pensions being granted to workmen in the dockyard who receive injuries in the performance of their duty, and is there anything in the rules which would debar James Davies from receiving a pension; and is he aware that the accident entirely incapacitated James Davies from using the injured hand, inasmuch as he has lost his thumb and middle finger and is unable to close the remaining fingers?

LORD G. HAMILTON: James Davies had completed 25 years' service at the time of his injury, and could have received a gratuity of £25 for his services, if he had been discharged on account of a reduction in the establishment, or through being invalided. In the second question there is a misapprehension of the regulations under which gratuities are awarded. The amount of a year's wages in full is the maximum compensation, for service and injury combined, which can be awarded in a case of this kind; and Davies received the full award of £52 2s. 10d. to which he was entitled. Pensions can be granted to workmen who are totally disabled by accident; but the injuries Davies received were of a less severe nature, and his capacity to earn a livelihood was only materially impaired and not totally destroyed. The injury resulted in the amputation of the thumb and middle finger of the left hand.

PRACTICE FIRING ON THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

MR. ROE (Derby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware of the dangerous character of the practice firing on the Isle of Wight, a shot from Totland Bay having passed immediately over the tops of the funnels of the steamship Brodrick Castle (filled with passengers on her way from Bournemouth to Ventnor), and dropped into the sea within 300 yards of the boat whilst rounding, and within two miles of the Needles, at about noon, in bright and clear weather, on Tuesday, the 6th of May; and if he will give orders to prevent such firing in future as may be dangerous to passing ships?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The officer in charge reports that before the shot in question was fired it was estimated by the position-finder on Headon Hill that it would fall 1,000 yards from the Brodrick Castle. The shot fell exactly where it was predicted, and the steamer was never in the slightest danger.

THE COSWAY MINIATURES.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been drawn to the announcement of the sale by public auction next month of the most complete collection in existence of the famous Cosway Miniatures; and whether any arrangement would be sanctioned by the Treasury, under which these beautiful works of art might be preserved to the nation?

MR. GOSCHEN: No proposals have been made to the Government by any of their advisers in these matters with respect to the Cosway Miniatures. The Government have not been approached in the matter by the Trustees of the National Gallery with a view of placing funds at their disposal.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Will the right hon. Gentleman make further inquiries into the matter, or some of these valuable historical miniatures will be taken off to Texas or somewhere?

MR. GOSCHEN: I think that the notice which has been taken in the House will draw attention to the matter.

RAILWAY BRAKES.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): The Report of Colonel Rich, in reference to the Carlisle accident, being now in the hands of hon. Members, I wish to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the great divergence of opinion as to the nature and character of brake failures and the urgency of the question, he will consent to refer it to a Departmental Committee of scientific and practical experts?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have considered the point; but it appears to me that such a Committee would have to be largely composed of persons who either are inventors, or manufacturers, or users, and who would therefore be prejudiced in favour of particular forms of brakes. I do not think that the conclusions of such a Committee would be more authoritative or useful than the advice now at my disposal.

MR. CHANNING: In consequence of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to give notice that, on a favourable occasion, I will call the attention of the House to the matter.

SEA FISHERY WORKS (IRELAND).

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to know from the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant whether he intends to oppose the Return in reference to sea fishery works in Ireland, which appears on the Paper in my name to-day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am at present inquiring into the matter.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I will postpone the Motion until this day week.

MOTION.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Thorburn, Bill to amend the Law relating to Municipal Elections in certain Burghs in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Thorburn, Sir John Kinloch, Mr. Mark Stewart, Mr. Shiress Will, and Mr. Barbour.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 262.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MARRIAGE (ACTIONS FOR BREACH OF PROMISE) BILL.—(No. 207.)

Order for Second Reading this day, read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) (PLEURO-PNEUMONIA) BILL.—(No. 168.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(3.10.) THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has handed in Amendments to this clause which will more properly form the subject of a new clause.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

Sir M. Hicks Beach

(3.15.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I notice that all the Amendments to this Bill which appear on the Paper are in the names of Scotch Members. There is one, however, which I wish to move in the interests of the cowkeepers and dairymen. In Dublin there is a very large industry connected with the sale of milk, and the persons who are engaged in it represent that their business may be entirely suspended unless provision is made for the immediate slaughter of cattle suspected of suffering from disease. I imagine that what the Government desire is that some time should elapse for the development of the disease, so that the Inspectors may know exactly what a suspected animal is suffering from—whether pleuro-pneumonia or tuberculosis; but it is rather a strong order that a man's business should be suspended, and that he should be deprived of the power of selling milk for an indefinite period. If it is necessary to hang up a man's business for more than a week, in order to enable the Inspector to discover what the disease is, I maintain that the dairyman or cow-keeper ought to be compensated. It is hardly fair that in the Imperial interests of agriculture a vendor of milk should have the whole of his means of livelihood destroyed. If the Government say that they are prepared to consider the point I will not press the Amendment; but, in the absence of such an assurance, I beg to move a proviso to this effect—

"Provided that the slaughter be carried out within one week from the enforcement of the powers conferred by the principal Act."

Let me take the case of London. There are in this City 4,000,000 of people who require to be supplied with milk every morning, and there are hundreds of cowkeepers and dairymen. If the Inspectors are to have the right on mere suspicion of suspending the business of these men, the consequence will be that their means of obtaining a living will be broken and ruined. What ought to be done is to give a week, and then if the cattle are not cured to slaughter them, and compensate the owners. I fully recognise that this is not a contentious Bill, but that it is one which ought to be passed for the general benefit of the community.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 15, to insert—

"Provided the slaughter be carried out within one week from the enforcement of the powers conferred by the principal Act."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(3.20.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The proposition of the hon. and learned Member is one which has already been considered, and I am indebted to him for giving me an opportunity of expressing the views of the Government on the matter. I understand him to object to the discretionary power given to the Inspectors to suspend the slaughter of suspected animals, and I admit that in the case of large towns the interests of the cowkeepers and dairymen might be prejudicially affected. But, on the other hand, I must point out that a great many representations have been made to the Board in which the complaint made was that the power of slaughter has not been made imperative and obligatory in all cases. Now, I strongly object to the insertion of the word "shall," for the very reason that the hon. and learned Member has stated. I think it would be very hard for the Government, or the Board of Agriculture, to go into the dairies in the large towns and, without a moment's notice or warning, slaughter all the animals, without having any discretionary power whatever. We have endeavoured to guard against that by providing that there shall be a certain period of probation, with due restrictions for the prevention of contact with other animals.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What in London would be the probationary period?

MR. CHAPLIN: That would be left entirely to the discretion of the Board.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is my principal objection, because the Inspector may put under probation the entire stock of a man, and prevent him from carrying on his business, practically, for an indefinite period. What I suggest is that there should be some limit to the probationary period.

MR. CHAPLIN: During the time the cows were in the dairy in a state of imprisonment, with a view to ultimate slaughter if necessary, the dairyman would be able to pursue his business, and to sell his milk. It was with the view of not immediately destroying his business that the Bill has been drawn up in this way. It was drawn up expressly to meet the difficulty which the hon. and learned Gentleman has pointed out.

(3.25.) MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): As I understand the point which has been raised, it is that the authorities should have power to indicate a certain number of animals which it may be necessary to slaughter eventually, but to postpone the carrying out of the order for an indefinite time. Perhaps it may be worthy the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not desirable to give the owner power to call on the authorities to do one of two things—either to withdraw the restriction or to carry out the power of slaughter at once. I hope my right hon. Friend will take that suggestion into consideration. As the Bill is at present framed the town cowkeeper would not know exactly where he stood.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): It might be of advantage to the dairyman to have the cash down so as to be able to replace the suspected animals; but it would be of distinct advantage to the farmer that the authorities should not be too hasty in destroying the animals.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): Does the right hon. Gentleman contemplate that this discretionary power should be exercised in the case of country dairies as well as of town dairies? I hope that he does, and that he does not entirely exclude from consideration those cases which must arise in the country as well as in the town.

MR. CHAPLIN: I contemplate no exclusion in any case, either in regard to town or country dairies; and when I prepared the Bill, I had in my mind the case of the farmers' fat beasts, which might be kept for three weeks or a month until they would reach their full value. Before the Report I will consider the suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Mr. J. Lowther).

MR. T. M. HEALY: As I understand that the matter will be duly considered I will not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): May I ask the President of the Board of Agriculture to amplify the answer which he gave to me recently in reference to the movement of cattle? I regret to find that no distinct arrangements have been made to regulate the movement of cattle after an epidemic. If each Local Authority is allowed to legislate for itself, great inconvenience may arise. No county has suffered more than my own from the fact that, although they have been able to frame efficient regulations for themselves, the Local Authorities of other counties have not discharged their duties so efficiently, and diseased animals have found their way into Aberdeenshire. I trust that in future the Central Authorities will frame stringent rules, and that the Local Authorities will not be left to make their own regulations. Unless something of that kind is done I am afraid the Bill will be of very little use.

(3.30.) MR. CHAPLIN: I think my hon. Friend misunderstood my answer. The execution of the orders will be carried out, as usual, by the Local Authorities who, of course, will be subject to the inspection of the officers of the Board of Agriculture, and in any case of default in adhering most strictly to the rules and regulations of the Board of Agriculture the Board itself will step in and carry out the orders.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I think the right hon. Gentleman has met the difficulty by saying that the rules will be uniform, and will be uniformly enforced throughout the country.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the information he has given us.

(3.31.) MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I trust the right hon. Gentleman will give such an answer to the appeal of my hon. Friend the Member for North Longford as will render it unnecessary for me to propose the new clause which stands in my name. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet that as the Bill now stands the owners of cattle in towns will not know their exact position. My hon. Friend has suggested that suspected cattle should be slaughtered within a definite period—say, seven days. The owners of cattle in Dublin desire to have some finality in this respect, and if the Bill passes, as framed, it will be perfectly optional for the officers employed under the Act to do as they like; the owners of dairies will be entirely at the mercy of their whims and fancies. Again, the Bill provides that the authorities may declare a place free from infection after 56 days. They may not do it sooner, but the declaration that the place is free from pleuro-pneumonia may be delayed for months, owing to the caprice or the laziness of the officers appointed under the Bill. We think the Bill should be more definite on this point. I know of one case in which the declaration of freedom from infection was delayed for three months, and all that time, although it was winter, the cattle had to be kept in the field instead of being properly housed, and the owner sustained considerable loss. The owner ought to know his exact position. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will consider this point.

(3.35.) MR. CHAPLIN: I will with pleasure. I want clearly to understand one thing. I assume that the hon. Gentleman contemplates a condition of things where all the cattle have been slaughtered. In such a case a specific time might be mentioned for declaring the place free from infection. But if any of the cattle are left alive it will be quite impossible to fix a specific time.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I think it would be interesting if the right hon. Gentleman would give the Committee some information as to the officers to be appointed under the Bill. What will be the relations between the staff at headquarters and the Local Authorities, and what, approximately, will be the expense to be incurred? Of course, I am aware we cannot expect to have details, but I should like, if possible, a rough outline.

(3.36.) MR. CHAPLIN: I will with pleasure give what information I can. According to the estimates made by the Department of Agriculture, the additional sum required will be about £10,000 a year. It is impossible for me to take any steps for the creation of the staff until the Bill is passed; and it will be a month or six weeks after the Bill becomes law before everything can be satisfactorily arranged. I have in contemplation a staff that would be sufficient to carry out the instructions of the Board, as a reasonable forecast would estimate them to be. It is expected that the benefits to localities from the Bill will be so great that the cordial assistance and support of the Local Authorities will be given. We hope that our officers will work in perfect harmony and co-operation with the Local Authorities, but, at the same time, it will be necessary to be prepared for any opposite result; and in any case the work of inspection must be heavy.

*(3.38.) MR. WHARTON (York, W.R., Ripon); I should like to ask whether the Board of Agriculture intend to employ the existing County Inspectors, as by doing so a considerable economy might be effected, and their local knowledge would be of great value. I think the Board of Agriculture will lose a great deal if they pass over these gentlemen in their appointments.

(3.39.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I agree with the hon. Member who last spoke, but I should like to add that it is necessary that the Inspectors should be men in whom the counties have the greatest possible confidence. It would be a very unwise economy to appoint local Inspectors merely because they are such.

(3.40.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Might I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will consider, when the slaughtered animal has been found not to be infected with pleuro-pneumonia, the possibility of declaring the place free within two days? In such a case surely 56 days is too long a period to elapse before making the declaration.

*(3.41.) SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I think my right hon. Friend is quite right in saying he wishes to consult the views of the Local Authorities. I believe if he takes that course he would get from them valuable information as to who are the men likely to be most trusted by the county. I know that in my own county we have often wished for the opinion of a Government Inspector, because, however excellent a man the local officer may be, he is liable, like other people, to make mistakes. In all counties, however, there are men pre-eminently qualified to carry out these duties, and if the right hon. Gentleman gets his information locally from the best men I hold it will be of great advantage, not only to his Department, but also to the country.

(3.43.) MR. CHAPLIN: I hope that the hon. Member for Longford will not ask me to bind myself at present to a specific number of days for the cases which the hon. Member has mentioned. I certainly think, however, that where all the animals have been slaughtered a place might be declared free within a much shorter period than 56 days. The Board will certainly endeavour to consult Local Authorities, whose local knowledge will be essential to the effective working of the Act, but I recognise the importance of having men upon whom the Board can thoroughly rely. Every endeavour shall be made on the part of the Board to see that this is done. We are already taking measures to ascertain every centre of the country in which pleuro-pneumonia exists, and where we are likely to get the most effectual assistance.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

(3.46.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): The Amendment I have to move raises a very important question. The amount to be paid out of the Imperial Exchequer is £140,000, but, in the event of there being a deficiency, it is to be supplied out of the local taxation accounts of England and Scotland. Now, there is a very important principle involved in this. The local taxation funds are already the property of the ratepayers, and it has always been held that the expenditure of such funds should be managed by the representatives of the locality. But, according to this Bill, the money required to make up the deficit will be taken from the rates by the Board of Agriculture, a Board over which the ratepayers will have no control. The result will be that as there is no limit placed on the expenditure of the Board, it may spend £300,000, of which £160,000 will be taken out of local taxation. Grants were given to localities on condition that they should be hypothecated by Parliament to purposes that were new. It is contrary to the principles of representative Government that localities should be assessed by the Imperial Government for Imperial purposes, and that they should be called upon to pay sums out of local taxation by a Board which they have no right to call to account. Hitherto the money has been found by the Local Bodies, but then those bodies had control over its expenditure, and, as a result of their good management, the expense was small. In Glasgow, for instance, we have during the past five years spent only £400 a year under the Contagious Diseases Animals Act. Now, if you are going to take the management out of the hands of Local Bodies, it is only reasonable that the Board of Agriculture should bear all the cost. Under the Bill the assessment to make up the deficiency will fall equally upon the boroughs and counties: but in the past only one-fourth of the cost has fallen upon the boroughs, while the counties have had to bear three-fourths, which shows that this is a matter which affects the counties much more than it does the boroughs. In Scotland the rental of the burghs is exactly equal to the rental of the counties, so that the proposed arrangement will give three times as much to the counties as to the burghs. We, who represent the burghs in Scotland, know very well that nearly all the Conservative Members represent counties in Scotland, and we can understand a Conservative Government granting more relief to the counties than to the burghs. Indeed, one of our great complaints in regard to Scotch legislation is that the burgh ratepayer is always worse treated than the county ratepayer. I, therefore, move to omit Sub-section 4, on the ground that the whole expense of the working of the Act should be paid out of Imperial funds, and that the sub-section imposes the burden to an unfair extent on the boroughs.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 13, to leave out Sub-section (4).—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed,

"That the words, 'if in any financial year the money standing to that account is insufficient to defray the execution of this Act in Great Britain,' stand part of the Clause."

(3.53.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I have a suggestion to make which, I think, if adopted, will facilitate the progress of this measure. This is the clause which raises the question of the mode of payment. So far as Scotland is concerned, the Government is not satisfied with the mode of payment provided in the clause, and the Lord Advocate proposed that, instead of the deficiency being made up out of the funds for pauper lunatics, it should be made up out of the new taxes on beer and whisky. The House has not agreed to that yet; and on the very sound principle affirmed last night, that until the House has had an opportunity of discussing the purpose for which a tax is to be levied, it should not be imposed, it is obvious that it is premature to apply to the expenses to be incurred under this Act taxes which have not yet been agreed to. I, therefore, suggest that the House should defer the consideration of the machinery for the payment of the expenses, for which, if necessary, the Bill can be re-committed before the Third Reading. This would probably save time, because there are a number of Amendments on the Paper, and if the Government persist in pressing this clause, we shall be obliged to discuss those Amendments.

*(3.58.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lenark, N.E.): I think there is a good deal of reason in the suggestion of my hon. Friend. As the Government are well aware, the proposal to supply the deficiency in Scotland out of the grant for pauper lunatics has caused a great outcry, and it is now admitted to be indefensible. The Government have, consequently, made a fresh proposal to set apart certain Customs and Excise Duties for the purpose. But the Bill appropriating these duties to the purpose is not before the House, and, that being so, I submit that the position to-day is analogous to the position yesterday, when the Government postponed the consideration of certain clauses.

*(3.59.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): The hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division seems to think that there are no Liberal Members for Scotch counties. Whatever may be the case in the West of Scotland, it certainly is not so in the East. If the proportions in which the counties and burghs have contributed in the past has been correctly stated, my contention is that the burghs have paid too little, for they are directly benefited, and they are the points of entry through which the cattle reach the districts in the counties. Therefore, I say the counties have a right to expect that the boroughs shall bear their share in securing that the cattle shall be introduced in a good, sound, and healthy condition. The boroughs derive almost the entire benefit of the trade carried on in foreign cattle, inasmuch as the middleman and the consumer, as well as the Dock Companies and the shipping trade, that obtain the advantage derived from that traffic. Therefore, if the counties pay three-fourths of the cost of slaughtering diseased cattle they pay too much, and have a right to demand that the boroughs shall have a fair charge laid upon them in connection with the enforcement of the Act. I have no objection to foreign cattle coming to this country; but we know it is the foreign competition that has brought down the price of home-grown cattle. This is a very good thing for the consumers, the bulk of whom reside in the boroughs, and who, therefore, ought to pay the greater portion of the charge.

*(4.2.) MR. HOZIER (Lanark, S.): I wish to emphasize the arguments which have been put forward by my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Marjoribanks). We, in the County of Lanark, have suffered more than any other part of Scotland from pleuro-pneumonia, and we attribute that to a great extent to the fact that diseased cattle are landed in Glasgow, whence the infection is distributed through Lanarkshire and the rest of the kingdom.

(4.4.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): In my opinion, the whole cost should be thrown upon the counties; but before entering on that question I wish to call attention to the position in which we are placed. I hope the Government will tell us what course they are going to pursue. We are in this difficulty, that the proposal of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Caldwell) has completely changed the original character of the Amendment of which the Lord Advocate gave notice at Sub-section 6. The Amendment put down at Sub-section 4 of this clause is, in some degree, met by the Amendment of the Lord Advocate to Sub-section 6. The difficulty is that we cannot discuss Sub-section 4 without also discussing the Lord Advocate's Amendment, which comes at a later stage of the Bill.

I think it would be an advantage if that part of the question could be postponed. The matter is one of great importance to Scotland. We have four proposals before us; one proposal is to take the expenses out of the Consolidated Fund; another is to take it out of the rates altogether; another to take it from the county rates; and the fourth, that the Government is to take it out of the new tax which is to be created by a Bill which has not yet been read a second time, and possibly may never be passed. I think it would be highly inconvenient that the proposal we are discussing should be carried, and then left in the air because it is entirely dependent on the passing of another Bill. If this Bill is passed, which is very likely, inasmuch as it is supported by the Government, it would leave this Committee proposing to supplement any deficiency out of moneys to be levied by a tax not yet imposed; and if that tax be not imposed this Bill will have no effect as regards Scotland, or could only be made effectual by throwing the whole amount on the General Fund. I doubt very much whether that could be done; and I suppose it would be necessary at the last moment to re-commit the Bill for the purpose of dealing with the matter, or else to insert a provision when the Bill reaches the House of Lords. I should like to hear from the Government how they propose to obtain the money, and whether they do not think the best course would be to leave the question of Scotland out of the Bill altogether, or to postpone this clause until the money can be found under the Lord Advocate's Bill.

(4.8.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I must join issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Caldwell). It ill becomes him to taunt counties for representing Conservatism, seeing that Glasgow, with her seven Members, send three to vote with the Government. I must also join issue with my hon. Friend the Member for South Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce), in respect to the apportionment. It would be easy to show that the burghs are equally if not more benefited than the counties.

(4.9.) MR. JEFFREYS (Basingstoke): I trust the Government will not give way on this clause. Hitherto the counties have paid more than their fair share of the cost of the Act, and it appears to me to be a matter in which the boroughs are much more interested than the counties. We in the counties have to supply the boroughs with milk, which is a very important article of consumption, and cannot be imported from abroad. If pleuro-pneumonia once gets into the dairies it stops the supply of milk, to the great detriment of the town consumers. The counties already have spent enormous sums in endeavouring to stamp out this disease, and I think it quite time that the boroughs should be called upon to pay their fair share.

(4.10.) Mr. J. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick): I think there is a great deal in what has been said by my hon. Friend (Mr. Bryce) in regard to the Amendment of the Lord Advocate for providing the money. I have an Amendment of my own upon the Paper, but I do not propose to move it now. I hope, however, the right hon. Gentleman will concur in the proposal that the clause should be postponed, so that it may be brought up for subsequent discussion. If it be true that the counties have hitherto paid three-fourths, and the boroughs only one-fourth of the cost of enforcing the Act, the difference is exceedingly unfair to the counties; and I hope the Government will persist in their endeavour to make the burden as equable as possible. In Gloucestershire there can be no doubt that 9-10ths of the disease amongst our cattle is disseminated through the Port of Bristol. That being so, it is monstrous that the Gloucestershire dairies should have to bear the whole of the burden. This is not, and must not, be allowed to be a Party question.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I must express my surprise that the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Bryce) should have suggested that Scotland should be omitted altogether from the operation of the Bill.

Mr. BRYCE: I only meant that that part of the Bill which relates to Scotland should be postponed.

(4.12.) Mr. CHAPLIN: Every Amendment on the Paper refers to Scotland, and to Scotland alone, and in making such a proposition the hon. Gentleman is practically asking us to postpone the whole Bill. I admit that it is something of an anomaly that we should be looking for a portion of our funds to a Bill which has not yet been read a second time. I must decline to contemplate the possibility of that Bill not being carried during the Session, but I admit the force of the objection taken by hon. Gentlemen. My alternative will lie either in limiting my expenses, or in taking some measures before the final stages which would admit of the introduction of another Bill. The explanation which I have to give will, I hope, be satisfactory. I am not going to enter into any controversy between the boroughs and the counties, further than to say that, although in times past it might be the case that the boroughs had to pay only one-fourth and the counties three-fourths for all the animals slaughtered in consequence of pleuro-pneumonia, that was no guarantee of what their relative position might become under the Bill. The information which I received from those gentlemen who assist me, and whose opinions are more to be relied on than those of any others, is that the cost to the boroughs might, in the future, be very heavy, because in the large boroughs pleuro-pneumonia undoubtedly prevailed more than anywhere else. Whatever may be the case with regard to the past, the boroughs will find that they will no longer occupy the same advantageous position with respect to the counties. But the whole of the additional cost to be raised from local resources is so comparatively small and trivial that it is not worth while to discuss the matter at any great length. I stated on the Second Reading that this was a question upon which it was impossible, from the nature of the case, to obtain an accurate estimate. But I have had a great many estimates made with great care, and the most extravagant estimate is from £200,000 to £250,000, at the outside. I am provided with £160,000, to begin with, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and, in addition, I shall have all the money derived from the sale of the carcases of the animals slaughtered. I cannot say how much will be derived from that source, but I shall be greatly disappointed if I do not receive a considerable sum. I cannot conceive, even at the worst, that I shall have to ask for more than £50,000 from local resources; and I believe that sum to be an extravagant one. Supposing we are called upon to provide that sum, how could it fall upon Scotland? It is to be provided at the rate of 18 per cent. by England, and 12 per cent. by Scotland. So that, really assuming the worst, I estimate that the sum Scotland will be called upon to pay will range from £5,000 to £7,000, and that would have to be distributed among the whole of the Local Authorities of the country. Really and truly, regarded in that way, the cost which is to fall upon the counties and the boroughs becomes inappreciable. I hope, and still think, the small call will not be required, and under the circumstances I hope the Committee will allow the Bill to proceed. This Bill is accepted by all sides of the House, and hon. Members are anxious to see it pass; but, knowing the state of public business, suppose it was not possible to find a further opportunity of discussing this measure, do you think that the constituencies, which have been so ably represented by the Members for Scotland, would be very well pleased at the loss of the Bill? I would remind the House that the Board of Agriculture has power at the present moment to insist on the Local Authorities carrying out the Act with regard to slaughter; and if they do not do it, then the Central Authority can do it at their expense. I thought that was a position which ought to be remedied, and, therefore, I introduced this Bill, which, accepted by all who are specially interested, will be a great gain to the country, and I think, therefore, ought to be allowed to proceed.

DR. CAMERON: I think the right hon. Gentleman misapprehends the position we take up. Nothing is further from our thoughts than to prevent the Bill proceeding. When the Bill was drafted the right hon. Gentleman proposed to deal with a small surplus in a manner which may be satisfactory to English Members; but in the case of Scotland he proposes that a deficit, which may possibly amount to £7,000, should be taken out of the sum at present allocated to the maintenance of pauper lunatics. That was so very questionable a proposal that an outcry was raised in Scotland, and it was abandoned. I do not enter into any discussion about counties and boroughs. The right hon. Gentleman says they should bear the expense equally, and upon that point we are at one. But the Government have been obliged to make another proposal for obtaining the residue of the money required for carrying out the Act, and the Lord Advocate proposes to allocate a sum from the new duty on spirits and beer. I believe almost every Scotch Member is opposed to the imposition of the new Whisky Duty. But we protest, from independent and Constitutional considerations, so far as Scotland is concerned, against being committed to the expenditure of a tax which we consider to be most unjustly levied upon Scotland. The injustice of it has only become apparent since yesterday, when the Government issued a Return intended to show the equity of their proposal. We were told on Friday night that Scotland was receiving £18,000 more than she contributed as her share to the Probate Duty, but the Government Return issued yesterday shows that she will have to pay £52,000 more than her share in connection with this new tax. Now, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a fair-minded man, and when these figures are pointed out to him he will incontinently abandon his proposal as indefensible. Then what becomes of the financial provisions of this Bill, so far as any deficit is concerned, if the Government have to rely upon the Amendment of the Lord Advocate, which would then not be worth the paper it is written on? The proposal I make does not mean the discussion of the whole question again. My hon. Friend (Mr. Caldwell) might object to the incidence as between the counties and boroughs, but that is the only point that would be left for discussion. But if you proceed with this now, we shall be obliged to discuss the whole of the Amendments, which will be absolutely useless, and we shall be obliged to discuss the Lord Advocate's Amendment, and certainly in nine cases out of 10 it will simply be a waste of time. On these grounds I urge the postponement of this sub-section.

(4.26.) MR. LLEWELLYN: The hon. Member for St. Rollox has used the argument that the money has not been voted, and last night the argument was used that the money could not be voted until we had the details. Looking at the Amendments on the Paper, it is clear that the opposition is from the Borough Members. If we are to vote on this Amendment, I see no reason why we should not at once go to a Division.

*(4.28.) MR. J. WILSON (Govan): I find by the Returns that the expense connected with pleuro-pneumonia in Scotland, in 1887-8—

MR. CHAPLIN: As far as the expenditure of the money is concerned, England and Scotland share alike in all cases in the Common Fund. Scotland, in the event of a deficiency, is only called upon to subscribe 12 per cent., and England 18 per cent.

*MR. WILSON: So far as Scotland is concerned, the cost of stamping out this disease was £38,707 in 1887-8, but the actual amount spent in that year was £54,756. The proportion of the grant referring to Scotland under the new arrangement would have been £16,800, the difference being, in round figures, the sum of £37,000. Therefore, the estimate of £7,000 as the whole of the amount that we would be called upon to pay out of the rates, is, I am afraid, rather fallacious. However, it is a good Bill; and I am sure the people will welcome it, but we really ought to see where the money is to come from, and the burden should not be laid upon the boroughs more than in the past. If the right hon. Gentleman requires more than the £140,000, it should be obtained from the rates as heretofore.

(4.30.) MR. C. GRAY (Maldon): There would be no difficulty as to the money. I respectfully submit that you may meet the case by a 1s. poll tax on all foreign cattle.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 233; Noes 102.—(Div. List, No. 79.)

*(4.42.) MR. D. CRAWFORD: I beg to move to insert in line 15, after "Great Britain," the words "(a) in England." The object of this Amendment is to give a different method of providing against any possible deficiency instead of that in the Bill. It is provided in the Bill that any deficiency that may occur is to be made good both in England and Scotland out of the local taxation accounts. That may be a very good plan in England, and I propose to distinguish the case of England by inserting these words. But it is not a good plan in Scotland, and accordingly, by consequential Amendments, I propose to provide the funds in another way. In the discussion it has been said that the Government are not adhering to the plan for providing for this deficiency which they themselves suggest in the Bill. They first suggest that the money should be taken from the local grant in aid, conferred only last year on the Local Authorities for the benefit of pauper lunatics, and now they have departed from that and propose that the deficiency should continue to come out of the Local Taxation Account, but that instead of being derived from the grant for pauper lunatics it is to be derived from the proceeds of the Spirit Tax which the House has not yet assented to. Though that plan is free from the objections which might have been urged against the proposal to take the money from the grant for pauper lunatics, it is open to other objections of its own. What I would suggest is that the deficiency might very well continue to be levied both in counties and in burghs in the same way as the assessment under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act. The President of the Board of Agriculture says the sum required will be exceedingly small, and I hope his estimate will turn out to be correct. The machinery is there, and I think that would be the simplest way of making up any deficiency. I would not be a party to laying a new burden on the counties—as a County Member myself. This is not laying a new burden on the counties. From the enormous proportion of the tax the counties will be relieved by this Bill which we welcome and desire to see passed. The objections to the method of supplying the deficiency proposed by the Government are much greater than those to the method I now propose. The objections to the Government plan are these: We object to meeting the deficiency by a Bill which has not yet passed—and however inconvenient it may be, I find it necessary to make some reference to the provisions of the Bill itself. A share of the Spirit Tax will be granted under it to the Local Authorities in Scotland, and that money will be apportioned in a particular way. It will give so much for the superannuation of the police and so much for compensation to be paid to holders of licences which are to be abolished; and, finally, it will say that the rest of the Spirit Tax is to be chargeable with the deficiency we are dealing with in this Bill. There is a great deal in that Bill which almost all of us object to in toto; therefore, we do not want to make it a vehicle for enacting the necessary provision required under the present Bill. But we have a more specific objection than that. It says that a sum of £40,000 is to be given for the completion of the free education system in Scotland. We know that that sum is not sufficient, and we are at a loss to know why the Government—after having, as we thought, given us free education in Scotland last year—should tinker with the question by giving us another dribblet instead of completing the edifice. We are exceedingly anxious that sufficient money should be got for the purpose now that we have entered upon the policy of freeing education in Scotland. On that ground I object to the proceeds of the Spirit Tax being diminished for an unnecessary purpose, such as is contained in this Bill. I should think that nearer £70,000 than £40,000 will be required for freeing Scotch education, and I object to any deduction for other purposes from sums which can be made available to complete the system of free education.

(4.53.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I must say the hon. Member has introduced into the Debate very various and very controversial subjects, and I must deprecate the tone of his remarks. I have noticed that several speeches which have come from the opposite side have been characterised by the warmth of their controversial tone. The object which I have in view is to facilitate the Committee in coming to a decision on what is, after all, a very small practical question. It should be borne in mind that the amount that has to be provided for is contingent, and is almost certain to be very small. It will probably be £4,000 or £5,000 at the outside. The amount is to be distributed over the whole of Scotland, and what we have to do is to find a ready means of enabling the President of the Local Government Board to put his hands on the money without delay or embarrassment. That points to a Central Fund. The first objection

I have to the Amendment is that it will, for this wretched sum of £4,000 or £5,000, make the President of the Local Government Board creditor for all the counties and burghs in Scotland, and will require him to go down and pick up the wretched fragments pertaining to each community. That is altogether inconsistent with the scheme of the Bill, which is approved by both sides of the House—that scheme being that the question should be dealt with as a matter of administration in which the whole community is interested. It is true that the proposal of the Government is to attach a fund which has not yet come into existence, and I admit that the objection to the proposal on that ground is plausible. It is said that it is problematical whether the Whisky Duty will really be imposed; but, to say the least, there is certainly an even chance that the duty will be imposed and that the fund will be available. However, to meet the objection of the hon. Member opposite, I am willing, if the Committee will now agree to the proposal to attach liability to the proceeds of the Whisky Tax, to undertake that the Bill shall not be passed until a decision shall have been come to upon the question of the imposition of the tax.

(4.56.) SIR G. TREVELYAN: I think there is a great deal in the contention of the Lord Advocate. I am one of those who hold in the strongest manner that the liability for any deficiency ought to fall on the counties where diseased animals are killed; but, as the principle of local liability has been abandoned, it is useless to attempt to revive it when only such small sums as will be required to make good deficiencies are in question. If they have recourse to the county and burgh rates in order to make good the deficiency of £5,000 or £7,000 in Scotland, the work of collection will be quite disproportionate to the sum collected. The Government, I understand, having undertaken the duty of suppressing pleuro-pneumonia, are prepared, in the last resort, to throw the whole expense on the Treasury.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: That is an unwarranted inference to draw from anything which I have said.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: Nevertheless it must be the inevitable result of the course which the Government are pursuing. Supposing that the Spirit Duty proposal is not agreed to, there will be very good grounds for urging the Government to supply the deficiencies in respect of the slaughter of diseased cattle from other Imperial sources. I should myself strongly oppose the additional duty on spirits; but pending the decision of the House upon that question, I think we might well leave the matter under consideration as it stands at present.

(5.0.) MR. MARJORIBANKS: I think it is utterly unreasonable that we should go on wrangling about a small remnant which is mere surplusage. If this is going to be a large amount, the more reason why it should be borne by the Imperial Exchequer. All these new proposals should be charged upon Imperial Funds, and this is recognised by the proposal for the new Whisky Tax. It is useless to discuss now whether that proposal will pass the House or not. If it does not pass, then the Government must find some other means of meeting this remnant. County Members cannot submit to the proposal that this remnant, be it big or small, should be charged on the county rates. I shall certainly give most determined opposition to any proposal to charge the deficit on county or borough rates.

(5.1.) MR. BRYCE: I do not think my right hon. Friend quite appreciates the position taken up by the hon. Member for Lanark (Mr. Crawford). This is not a question as between burghs and counties. This Amendment is the first of a series leading up to the proposal to provide this compensation from local taxation accounts.

THE CHAIRMAN: I should here mention that it appears to me that the decision of the Committee upon the Amendment now before us will decide all the other Amendments on the Paper involving the question of differential treatment.

MR. BRYCE: I thank you, Sir, for explaining that. I was going to point out what I conceive to be the effect of the Amendment. It is really a question as to taking the money as regards Scotland as well as England out of local taxation accounts, and not whether we should treat it differently in England and Scotland. The Lord Advocate anticipates that the deficiency will be small in amount, and he has suggested that the House should reserve its control over the Bill until the question of the imposition of the new Spirit Duty is decided, and that, I think, is a fair offer. There is, however, one difficulty. After the allocation of the proposed tax to the purposes set out, the "residue" is to be applied for purposes of pleuro-pneumonia, in conformity with an Amendment which the Lord Advocate has yet to move to the Bill. But suppose, for the sake of argument, we withdraw our Amendments, that we agree the money shall come from local taxation, that the proposal of the Lord Advocate is accepted, and that the Customs and Excise Bill is read a second time; and we on this side of the House—I think I may say universally—are prepared to urge in Committee that the sum allotted for the relief of school fees is inadequate; if we have assented to taking the "residue" for pleuro-pneumonia purposes, are we thereby precluded from insisting that all the money that can possibly be taken shall be devoted to freeing school fees? Either we must oppose the proposal of the Lord Advocate now with a view to the contention we intend to raise on the Customs and Excise Bill for the purpose of free education, or we must have a complete and explicit declaration that the question shall be considered entirely res integra, and that we shall not be met with the objection that we cannot increase the sum for free education, the residue having already been appropriated.

(5.6.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I hope the question of differential rates will not be pressed now upon such a small sum, but I would ask the Lord Advocate, with whose opinion and remarks I agree so far, whether it is worth while to ask the Committee to commit itself to his proposition now? If we understand that the deficit shall be raised from some Imperial rate, we shall be quite content to leave the matter open, and the passing of this Bill will be facilitated.

(5.7.) DR. CAMERON: That, I think, is a sensible suggestion; it is, in fact, the suggestion I made before the last Division, and which, if the Government had accepted it, we might have been fairly through the Bill by this time. Let the Lord Advocate leave the Bill, as regards Scotland, in the position in which it now stands for the present, deferring the proposition he is pledged to make to a later stage.

*(5.8.) MR. D. CRAWFORD: I am anxious to take the course suggested by my hon. Friends, and I do not wish to press my Amendment, but I hope the Government will give an assurance that our position on the question of payments in relief of school fees under the Customs and Excise Bill shall be considered as intact.

(5.9.) MR. CHAPLIN: There is one consideration that presses in this matter, and which, perhaps, I should have mentioned before. As a matter of fact this disease is spreading rapidly; the Committee will regret to learn that the last Returns are most unfavourable. This means that every day I am denied the power of dealing with this disease the loss becomes greater. If the Bill is held over, as hon. Members desire, I trust it may not be for any considerable period, for ultimately it means greatly increased cost to Scotland as well as England; the loss will certainly be greater than anything you can hope to gain. I am, therefore, anxious to come to an understanding which would facilitate the passing of the measure. The utmost limit to which I feel disposed to go is this—that while I decline to admit the possibility of the other Bill not passing, I would undertake that until that Bill does pass, or other means are provided, I will not exceed the amount to be received from Imperial sources.

(5.11.) DR. CAMERON: But what are we to understand? The Lord Advocate gave us an assurance that the Bill should not leave our control until the principle of the other Bill was affirmed, but the right hon. Gentleman throws over his Colleague, and says, "I must make progress with the Bill." Are we to place upon the words of the Lord Advocate that reliance which on Scotch matters we usually attach to anything he says on behalf of the Government, or are we to consider him as subordinate in this matter to the decision of a Cabinet Minister? I certainly think the proposal for meeting the residue should be left in skeleton, as it stands, to be filled in afterwards by the Lord Advocate's proposal, or in some other way that may suggest itself. If that is done we are ready to forego contention now.

(5.13.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): As an English county member I would just say a word in support of the suggestion of the Minister for Agriculture. This is a Bill for the prevention of a disease that does infinite injury, and it is very important that it should be carried into law, and I think that the offer of the Government ought to be accepted.

(5.14.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I must say the discussion is being carried on at needless length. Now, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) has said that if the worst comes to the worst he will do without more money, and, under these circumstances, I again appeal to the Lord Advocate not to press his proposal with regard to the Spirit Duties now, but to leave it open, and the Bill will proceed fairly and smoothly.

(5.15.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I quite agree that would facilitate matters, but unfortunately some sort of Amendment of the kind is absolutely necessary, unless we are to fall back upon the Pauper Lunatic Fund. All that we want on this side of the House is that it shall be explicitly understood that we are not, either technically, or, as I might say, morally disqualified from discussing this matter fully when we come to deal with it later.

(5.17.) MR. CHAPLIN: I think we have made every effort to meet hon. Gentlemen opposite. My right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate made a proposal which, I understood, was not accepted by hon. Members opposite, and I then made another. As I said before, I decline to admit the possibility of the Licensing Bill not passing, but I have no hesitation in repeating my undertaking to confine the money spent for the purpose of the Bill to £160,000, until that Bill is passed or some other way settled.

(5.19.) DR. CAMERON: In that case I do not see that we want the Amendment of the Lord Advocate to Sub-section 5 of Clause 6, and the simplest plan will be to strike out the Sub-section, leaving the matter practically open. I do not think that the proposal of the Lord Advocate that we should retain control of this Bill, pending the decision of the House on the other Bill, was objected to except by the right hon.

Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) himself who seemed determined to push his Bill through. [Interruptions.] I have no wish to impede the Bill, and did not impede the Second Reading; but there are matters of detail which closely affect our constituencies. Our best plan, I think, will be to drop the Amendments relating to Scotland until we come to Clause 5, and then take a Division on Sub-section 5 of that clause.

(5.25.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): Delay in passing this Bill will be a public misfortune, and I hope the Government will not agree to indefinitely postpone its discussion. A few days' delay will cause a greater expenditure than the whole of the sum which is now being discussed, which only amounts to some £4,000 to £7,000. I hope and believe that, if the Act is vigorously carried out, the sum required next year will be much smaller.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5.

(5.30.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to this clause. There is nothing in the Bill which would prevent the expenditure of £140,000 in England, but I notice that the contribution from the Treasury to Ireland is restricted to £20,000. That is not equality of treatment. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture may be aware that in March an enormous number of cattle were slaughtered in Dublin with the object of stamping out the cattle disease. If the compensation for these cattle is to come out of the £20,000, the sum may be exhausted, and any further amount required would have to come out of the rates. I would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should make some provision in this clause for an additional grant to cover the amount that has already been expended.

(5.32.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As the learned Attorney General for Ireland has entered the House I wish to press on his attention the point raised by my hon. Friend. The slaughter of cattle for disease in Ireland takes place almost exclusively in Dublin, and the result is that a very oppressive burden has fallen on the North and South Dublin Unions. I wish to ask whether those Unions will be compensated out of the £20,000 for the special burden that has fallen on them in this respect; and I desire also to know what security we have that those Unions will in the future be saved from loss?

(5.34.) MR. CHAPLIN: The £20,000 will go on from year to year, and, if it be not all spent in the first year, it will mount up. It is quite true that a large number of cattle have been slaughtered in Ireland, but I apprehend that the expenditure next year is not likely to be as great as it has been recently. The £20,000, therefore, will not probably be all spent.

(5.37.) MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman does not seem to have understood our contention. What we desire to know is whether any special step will be taken by which the amount spent by these two Unions out of the rates will be made good to them?

*(5.37.) MR. MADDEN: No doubt the greater amount of the cost of stamping out pleuro-pneumonia has fallen on Dublin. I think I can promise that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will give his attention to the subject and will consider whether the clause in the Bill is adequate and gives the necessary relief.

(5.38.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): May I point out that, as the clause is drawn at present, the first year is unfairly burdened? The £20,000 to be given for the first year will really be required to meet the debts of pre-the clause in the Bill is adequate to join the necessary relief.

Clause agreed to.

(5.39.) DR. CAMERON: I beg to move the omission from this clause of Sub-sections 4 and 5. If my Amendment be accepted, the result will be to enable the Bill to come into operation at once. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) has told us that he does not propose to exceed the expenditure of £160,000, and that it is of the very first importance that he should be able to incur that expenditure. There is no reason why, if these two sub-sections were omitted from the Bill, the measure should not come into force to-morrow.

The Government propose to provide for the deficit in a manner that must necessarily give rise to a considerable amount of controversy. They propose to levy a tax to which a large number of the Scottish Members are opposed. The Lord Advocate proposes to divert from free education a sum of money with which to pay compensation to landowners for the slaughtering of their cattle arising from pleuro-pneumonia. It is all very well to say the Government fully agree to the understanding that nothing contained in this Bill is to be held as prejudicing us when we come to discuss the provisions of the Licensing Bill. But if we have spent the money here we may discuss until we are black in the face and we will not be able to get it back. The obvious cause to prevent any complication is to oppose now the application of this money. I beg to move the omission of Sub-sections 4 and 5.

Amendment proposed, page 4, line 14, leave out sub-sections 4 and 5.—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. CALDWELL: I think the Government might readily accept this Amendment, which is really proposed with the view of carrying out their intentions. The deficiency is to be debited to the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account, and these sub-sections state what accounts are to be debited with the deficiency—one is the Probate Duty, and the other is the sum paid to Parochial Boards in respect to lunatics. The Lord Advocate's proposal is that neither of these two accounts are to be debited with the deficiency.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): Sub-section 4 has nothing whatever to do with Scotland.

MR. CALDWELL: With regard to Sub-section 5, the Government have pledged themselves to find the money in another way. Certainly, the Scotch Members have only one course to adopt, and that is, to resist the taking of the money from pauper lunatics.

DR. CAMERON: I will only move the omission of Sub-section 5.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, to leave out sub-section (5).—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'All moneys paid under this Act out of or into the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account shall in account be charged against' stand part of the Clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: I am afraid I cannot agree to the omission of Sub-section 5. Personally, I look forward to the passing of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

MR. BRYCE: The matter is left in a very unsatisfactory position. The right hon. Gentleman wishes to retain the sub-section because he is convinced the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill will pass. We intend to oppose that Bill, and we think it is very likely we shall defeat it, or, at any rate, very largely modify the application of funds under it. By accepting the Lord Advocate's Amendment we put ourselves in the position of assenting to a provision which we do not intend to carry out and which we intend to oppose. The best suggestion made so far is that we should pass the Report stage of this Bill until after the other Bill has been disposed of.

MR. CHAPLIN: I will undertake to consider very carefully all the suggestions which have been made.

DR. CAMERON: The right hon. Gentleman is a young Minister, but he is already an adept in the phraseology of office. I am an old Parliamentary hand, and have heard too many vague declarations by Ministers to be satisfied with the promise of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: We want to bind the Government to find the money by a particular method of taxation of some sort or other, and, therefore, I shall support them on this occasion.

Ayes 261; Noes 110.—(Div. List, No. 80.)

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 18, to leave out from the word "against" to the end of sub-section (5), and insert the words "or credited in manner provided by any Act hereafter passed respecting the application of any Customs or Excise Duties paid to the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account.—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.10.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 253; Noes 108.—(Div. List, No. 81.)

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Friday next, at Two of the clock.

ALLOTMENTS ACT (1887) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 147.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 25, to leave out, after the word "acquired," to the end of the Clause, and add the words "shall pass a resolution to that effect, and thereupon the powers and duties of the Sanitary Authority under the principal Act, so far as regards that district or parish, shall be transferred from the Sanitary Authority to the County Council, and the County Council, in substitution for the Sanitary Authority, shall proceed to acquire land in accordance with the principal Act, and otherwise execute that Act in the said district or parish.

"Provided that this section shall not affect the property in, or any powers or duties of the Sanitary Authority in relation to, any land which, before the passing of the said resolution, was acquired by the Sanitary Authority under the principal Act."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(6.25.) MR. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I rise to a point of order. I wish to ask whether, as a matter of fact, after the rejection of the Amendment I moved on the last occasion this Bill was before the House, the words "Sanitary Authority" in the third line were not passed, but that the remaining words were not put by you to the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: The words were not added. The question put was that the words stand part of the Amendment. Now the question is that the Amendment be added.

(6.26.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I have an Amendment, to move to the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: That cannot be done. The sole question is "That the words be there inserted."

(6.27.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I wish to add, at the end of the Amendment, the words "or by the compulsory hiring of land." The effect of the Amendment would be to enable County Councils not merely to acquire land in accordance with the provisions of the Act, but also by a compulsory hiring. I move these words because, in the first place, a sort of challenge is thrown out by the Amendment, which goes out of its way to specify that the acquisition of land shall be in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and therefore a question is raised whether the methods of the acquisition cannot be, to some extent, enlarged.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Amendment cannot be entertained. The question was put to the Committee at the last Sitting, "That those words stand part of the Amendment," and that having been decided in the affirmative it is impossible to alter the words.

(6.28.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON: And if that is carried, shall I be in order in moving the addition of these words?

THE CHAIRMAN: They would not make sense, as a matter of fact.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: Shall I be in order in adding words to a similar effect?

THE CHAIRMAN: If sense can be made of them.

* (6.29.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N): I wish to address the Committee in opposition to the Amendment. At the last sitting on this Bill, I asked the right hon. Gentleman if he would accept my statement that if his Amendment were carried no spade could be put into allotments, provided under the Bill, until next Michaelmas two years. The right hon. Gentleman dissented, and I now propose to ask the Committee to follow me through every stage from now until next Michaelmas two years, and I will show what will be the effect of this Amendment. I have here a list of all the different steps that will have to be taken in order to secure allotments. The first date is the 20th May, the day on which the next meeting of the Rural Sanitary Authority will be held. If, instead of the Rural Sanitary Authority, the matter is taken over by the County Councils, they would be in the same position. Notice should be given on the 10th of May. On the 7th of June it may be adopted unanimously, and on the 12th of July the Report may be received and adopted, and the clerk may be directed to give the necessary notice. What I want the Committee to observe is that, whatever else may take place between now and next September, September is the earliest date when under the Public Health Act a notice can be put in the newspapers, and it then has to be advertised for three weeks consecutively. On the 27th of September the authority can petition the County Council, and in October the owner can receive his notice that certain land is to be applied for. In November the County Council will receive the petition, and the earliest day on which an inquiry can be held under the Act is the first of December, if the result of the application be favourable, but otherwise it cannot take place till January. In January, 1891, the County Council can receive the Report, on which to found a Provisional Order, but this can have no force until it has been confirmed by Parliament, which would be in the Session of 1891. But the Bill may be opposed before a Select Committee, and involve the county in considerable expense. After this, notice must be given to the tenant, and this could not take effect until Michaelmas, 1891, unless it should happen that the tenant is under special contract with the landowner, when notice might be given at Lady Day. But it is not likely that the Provisional Order could be confirmed by Lady Day, 1891, and even then, if the tenant has no special contract with the landlord, the notice to be given to the tenant would be for 12 months from Michaelmas, 1891, which carries us on to Michaelmas, 1892. I hope the Committee will agree that this is not to be made a Party question. Why should it be? These are notices by Act of Parliament and are not Party matters. The Act fixes certain hard and fast dates from which there is no escape. I do not believe the right hon. Gentleman wishes to keep everybody waiting till Michaelmas, 1892, and although the process has been termed "short, sharp, and summary," I submit that that is a misnomer, because no spade can be put into the soil until Michaelmas, 1892. Would it not be better that he should move to report Progress, and, in the meantime, devise some provision more in accordance with his wishes, for I venture to think that hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House do not want to strengthen my hands by enabling me to go down to my constituents and say, "This is the best Her Majesty's Government, have to offer you." I am sure it must be the wish of both sides of the House to give the people something better than the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman. It is possible that the right hon. Gentleman has so much to occupy him that the fact has escaped him that the dates in the Act of Parliament are all hard and fast; it is possible that if he can see his way to offer something more to the point he will be glad to do so. I do not want to propose a hostile Amendment that may be regarded as of a Party nature; nor do I see why it should be so regarded. The Bill, as I sent it down to Twyford, as originally drawn would have involved a period of three years' delay; now we have got down to next Michaelmas two years, which, I think the Committee will agree, is not a satisfactory solution of this question to either side of the House. I am sure hon. Members on both sides must desire that something better should be devised. I do not propose to move an Amendment, because I must confess I have nothing to suggest. My desire is to make the Bill operate more quickly, but I can see no way of doing so, because we are tied in this matter by the hard and fast dates of the Public Health Act. I think, however, it would be better not to proceed further with the Bill to-day. I asked the right hon. Gentleman to take the trouble to look into this matter some weeks ago. I am not aware whether he has done so, but, so far as I am concerned, I do not think we can amend the clause at present in view of the wording of the existing Public Health Act. If the right hon. Gentleman can show that my dates on this subject have no foundation I trust he will do so. If not, I hope he will consent to the postponement of this question.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The hon. Member has taken up a considerable part of the very small amount of time that remained before 10 minutes to 7 arrived. The hon. Member has not been speaking upon the Amendment, but has been endeavouring to show that the processes required to be taken under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act occupy a considerable time to be carried into effect. The Committee will hardly believe that the Amendment they are discussing transfers, in case of default by the Local Authorities, all the powers under the original Act to the Committee of the County Council. If there is to be an appeal at all, the one now proposed may fairly be regarded as satisfactory. The hon. Member admits that no Amendment to the proposal can be made which would shorten the period of which he spoke. The hon. Member, therefore, has been speaking against an Amendment which is intended to give a right of appeal where the Local Authority refuses to act. I quite admit that the processes under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act are not speedy, but I hope that where the Sanitary Authority does not fulfil its duty the Committee of the County Council will, in nine cases out of ten, be able to acquire land voluntarily, and that thus there will be no necessity for the County Council to resort to the cumbersome process of obtaining a Provisional Order. I am not prepared to say that the whole system of Provisional Orders does not require revision, but such a reform as that cannot be attempted by means of a Bill of this kind. I hope the Committee will agree to the Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman has thought it necessary to find fault with the hon. Gentleman behind me for having made a very able and instructive statement, the accuracy of which, as I understand, the right hon. Gentleman himself does not dispute. The hon. Member has a peculiar right to speak upon the point, he having been elected on the platform of the Twyford Allotments. The subject is one of great interest to county Members and their constituents, and the hon. Member was quite right in pointing out that nothing could be done under this clause for more than two years. One of the great difficulties of the Bill is that it is so framed as to render it impossible to introduce into it provisions which would make it effectual. I propose that we should now accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, and add any provisions which we can introduce into the four corners of it. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not be impatient of these Amendments. I believe there is only one hon. Gentleman who really is impatient, and that is the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. J. Collings), who cannot bear to see any Bill objected to that is introduced by Her Majesty's Government. I would suggest the one fact for the consideration of those who say that we on this side are overloading the Paper with Amendments. I have counted the Amendments, and I find that there are 25 on the Paper, of which 14 have been put down by Unionist Members and 11 by the unfortunate Separatists. Inasmuch as the majority come from the Unionist Party, I hope there will be some toleration in the discussion of our Amendments, the object of which is to give greater effect to the working of the Bill.

MR. CHANNING: I do not rise to object to this Amendment, but I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that on the Second Reading of the Bill I myself made a more practical suggestion, namely, that the powers of the Bill should be transferred to the County Council; that would make an important difference.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

Clause 3 omitted.

Clause 4.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name, namely—

"Clause 4, page 2, line 27, after 'boly,' insert 'not more than one-fourth of whom shall be aldermen.'"

*MR. RITCHIE: In declining to accept this Amendment, my answer to the hon. Member is this, that the County Council is a thoroughly Representative Body, electing their own aldermen, and it would be invidious to restrict them as to the composition of the Committee.

MR. CHANNING: I am bound to say that I think my hon. Friend quite justified in moving this Amendment, which I hope he will press to a Division.

Amendment put, and negatived.

It being after ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL—SELECT COMMITTEE—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.—SIR G. CAMPBELL.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Sir, I desire to make a personal explanation. I understand that just and reasonable offence has been given by a paragraph in an evening newspaper attributing to me certain remarks about the proceedings of the Western Australia Committee, of which I was a member. I had no idea of communicating anything to the Press, and I desire distinctly to state that to the best of my belief I did not use the words which are attributed to me. If any expressions used by me in private conversation have given rise to such a report I very much regret it, and I unreservedly withdraw any imputation either upon the constitution of the Committee, or upon the conscientious execution of their duty by any of its members.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, I am sure the House will have heard the personal explanation of the hon. Gentleman with great satisfaction. The hon. Gentleman is an old Member of this House, and I am confident that it would have been with the very greatest regret that any of us would have learned that he had sought to impugn the perfect fairness of any Committee of which he was a member. The House regards the honour of its Committees with great jealousy, and we have reason to know that the country is confident that the Committees of this House discharge their duties uniformly, with the greatest possible conscientiousness, with a due regard to the important trusts which are confided to them, and with a most earnest desire to arrive at a just conclusion.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to thank the right hon. Gentleman for what he has just said, and to express my entire concurrence in every word he has spoken.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I understand, Sir, that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer undertook that I should state this evening the business to be taken next week. It is the intention of the Government to ask the House to read the Local Taxation Bill a second time on Monday, and after that Bill has been read a second time to take the remaining clauses of the Budget Bill.

MR. J. MORLEY: In case the discussion on the Local Taxation Bill should not be completed on Monday night, will it be resumed on Tuesday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should hardly consider that probable; but if the discussion on that Bill is not concluded on Monday night it will certainly be resumed on Tuesday morning.

EDUCATION (PAYMENT BY RESULTS).

*(9.5.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I rise to move the Resolution that stands in my name—

"That the present system of payment by results is injurious to Education and should therefore be abolished, and that the condition of a school should be tested not by the individual examination of every scholar but by the general inspection of the institution as a whole, the grant being distributed as a capitation allowance on the average attendance, freedom being allowed to the teachers in classifying each scholar according to his aptitude and proficiency."

I desire to introduce to the House an abstract principle which is of vital importance to a great body of teachers, 40,000 in number, to tens of thousands of school managers, and to millions of young children of the rising generation.
Sir, having the fear of your ruling before my eyes, I shall make no allusion to the New Code, which seems to be giving much satisfaction to this House and to the country. And I shall make no appeal to my right hon Friend the Vice President of the Council (Sir W. Hart Dyke), except to ask him if he approves of the principle and believes it to be embodied in the New Code, to say so and earn the gratitude of the educational world. I and those who act with me are not so vain and over-confident as to expect that such a principle as this can be carried at once. It is a great deal too good to be given effect to all at once. But if it

turn out that he has embodied even a part of our principle in the Code we shall accept that as a step in the right direction and as an instalment. We shall be thankful for any part of it that can be realised, although our sense of gratitude will be mixed with the expectation of favours to come in future Codes. My Resolution is divided into two parts—first, the abolition of the present system of payment by results; and, second, the perfect freedom of classification. Payment by results is inevitable; indeed, the State will never pay without knowing what it is paying for. But I object to the present system of payment, which takes for its basis a wrong result, and tests that result in a manner equally wrong. I must explain briefly what that system is. There is a small fixed grant and a Merit Grant, which are given upon general considerations. But more than two-thirds of the existing Government grant are distributed after individual examination of the scholars, in all the subjects of instruction. Upon that examination, as a whole, a scholar is either passed or not passed. The grant is allowed only on those who pass. It operates in this way. If a school having every possible advantage succeeds in passing, say, 95 or 99 per cent. of its scholars it gets a high grant. If a school that is poor and that has every possible disadvantage passes only 75 or 85 per cent. it gets a poor grant. The Merit Grant ought to be given, no doubt, upon general considerations; but, as a matter of fact, Her Majesty's Inspectors are so much occupied with the results of the examinations that, generally speaking, the Merit Grant follows the examination grant. It often acts as a sort of cap upon the examination grant. Now, what are the examinations? This individual examination of every scholar is conducted in every one of the school subjects, which on the average are five or six in number. There are about 5,000,000 scholars in the country, and this, multiplied by five or six, gives no less than from 25,000,000 to 30,000,000 examinations conducted within the year. Sir, the imagination staggers under this load of figures! Such a mass of examinations cannot possibly be properly conducted, though the Inspectors undoubtedly do all that can be done by able and skilful men. The staff of Chief Inspectors, Deputy and Assistant Inspectors, serving under my right hon. Friend, all told, only numbers 350 persons. How can they properly conduct 30,000,000 of examinations each year? Now, several evils arise from this system. The examinations are necessarily rapid, mechanical, perfunctory, and superficial. In saying that, I cast no blame on anyone. I only say these are the necessary consequences of the present system. Then there is great uncertainty with regard to the examinations, owing to the different times at which they are held. A school examined when snow is on the ground will be in a much more unfavourable position than a school examined in May. Again, there are constant and large migrations of children from one school to another, so that when the examination comes round half the best scholars of a school may have gone elsewhere, their places being taken by new-comers, like raw recruits, who must yet be presented for examination, the result being very injurious to the grant. The true outcome of the joint labour of teacher and scholars is never tested. The school is judged, not as it is all the year round, but as it may happen to look on the examination day. The House would be surprised if it knew the extent to which this migration goes on in London. Moreover, the examination refers only to instruction of the intellect, and that is only a part, and not the most important part, of education. There is an education beyond that which refers mainly to the development of the moral qualities, the strengthening of the mental fibre, and the formation of character. This part is wholly untouched by the examination. Then this system tends, of course, to cramming the scholars, not with knowledge that can be digested and assimilated, but just enough learning to show on the surface before the Inspector. The whole attention of teachers is concentrated upon the matters which are tested by examination, and the consequence is that the weaker children are neglected. The teacher himself necessarily looks to those who can earn grants. The prosperity of the school and the character of the teacher depend upon the grants. Of course, being human, the poor teacher concentrates his attention upon the grant-winners, leaving the non-grant winners in the lurch almost unavoidably. I am sure the House will see that this system is very hard upon the poor. For instance, schools in Whitechapel, where the children are ill-fed and ill-cared for, and came from squalid homes, in which they are often obliged to stay for domestic duties, thus making their attendance irregular, are placed in the same category with schools in Pimlico which have every possible advantage, where the children's brains are fed with good nutrition, and where nothing diverts them from attending well. The Whitechapel School may work as hard, or harder, but can never earn as much as the Pimlico School. The effect of the system is that the grants are given to those who can get on without them, and are withheld from those who cannot. The bounty is bestowed largely on those who need it least, and grudgingly on those who need it most. Surely this system is a misapplication, almost a perversion, of the scriptural text—

“To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath.”

Lastly, it yokes together children of unequal capacity in the same class. I will explain this latter point more particularly when I come to the second part of my subject. With all these evils, I say that the system fails to test the results properly. Its failure is utter and complete. It is administrative only, and not educational at all. It exists only for the distribution of the Government grants. It involves a fundamental misconception of the purpose and nature of the Government grant. The principle on which the grant was intended to be given was not detur meliori, or detur digniori. It was not to be a prize giving. The grants were intended to help the halt, the maimed, and the poor, and to enable them to level themselves up and elevate themselves in the social scale. They were intended essentially to give help not to those who can help themselves, but to those who really need assistance in order that they may have a chance in the struggle of our national life. If that is the principle of our grants, then I say that the existing system of payment by results ought to be abolished absolutely—that is to say, there should be no more individual examination. For them there should be substituted a Report from Her Majesty's Inspector, which would furnish a true test of the educational result. I submit that this Report ought to be made as the result not of a visit at a stated time, of which due notice has been given, so that everything is dressed and marshalled in review order, but of several casual visits without notice, so that the teacher may be taken unawares, and the school be seen in its working dress. There would then be a proper Report; the Inspector would look at the building and the apparatus; he would see whether discipline was maintained, and whether the teacher had the faculty of command; whether with nervous force he made the children follow his voice and eye; he would observe whether the children were smart, clean, and well-mannered, and he would see the teacher instructing and examining them, which is the way to discover what the character of the instruction is. Again, the Inspector could see whether the teacher was acquainted with the social condition of all the children and in touch with the parents, in order to secure their co-operation for regular attendance, and he would note whether any of the children were famished, or came breakfastless to school, so that, if this were the case, it might be remedied by some private agency. He need not examine the children individually. Why should he, if he sees the instruction given, if he hears the children being questioned by their teacher? Thus relieved from the present fearful drudgery of examination the Inspector would be able to visit the school more than once in the year, and the Report would be worth a hundred times more than the result of the present examination. The Inspector then would declare whether the school was efficient or not efficient. If it was not it would get no grant; if it was it would get a grant, distributed by a capitation allowance on the average attendance, and there would be the same capitation allowance for all schools that were efficient. Undoubtedly this recommendation favours the poor schools.

It is for the poor, indeed, that I am pleading to-night. My scheme would give assistance where it is most needed; it applies the State resources just where they would be most useful. If a school was not efficient it would receive warning. Notice would be served upon the school that unless it rendered itself efficient within a certain time it would lose the grant altogether. That is the right system. A Report of this character would have great importance, and the managers of a school that received such a warning must have an opportunity of showing cause against the Report by means of an appeal from it to another authority. If an Assistant Inspector made the unfavourable Report there should be an appeal to the Chief Inspector; and if the managers were still dissatisfied they should have an appeal to my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council (Sir W. Hart Dyke), who would send down a special official to verify the Report. The Report will be a very real and serious affair, and that ought to be the case, because it will be based on full and complete information. I am aware that those who differ from me will say that under the system I propose there would be no incentive to the teacher to excel, because his school receives the capitation grant upon efficiency, without variation, according to the degrees of that efficiency. I maintain, on the contrary, that the teacher would have more incentive than he ever has had yet, because his professional prospects will depend upon this Report, which embraces not the instruction only, but everything relating to the institution. The anxiety of teachers with regard to the Inspector's Report is already intense, and this anxiety would be still further intensified when the Report is wider and more searching than heretofore. Nothing can be more vain than to say that the teachers will have no incentive. Under our plan they will be spurred on to greater efforts. It might be said, perhaps, that if a school finds that it can get a good grant without coming up to more than average efficiency it will have no motive for improvement. If, however, the Inspector has allowed a poor struggling school to be classed as efficient and to receive the grant, in order that it may have the means of improving itself, and yet the school does not improve, the Inspector will make an unfavourable Report, and will give it to understand that if it does not improve within a certain time the grant will be withdrawn. I admit that this throws the onus on the Inspectors. That is as it should be. I have great confidence in the Inspectors. I know their worth, and I think the proper plan is to put the responsibility upon them. The existing plan keeps in a bad state schools that are poor by virtually withholding from them the grant which they need for rendering themselves efficient. It is not too much to say that the present system establishes inefficiency. Our plan would alter that altogether. It would give those schools that are poor such a good grant as would enable them to improve, and, by means of Her Majesty's Inspectors, we should take care they did improve, and that they made good use of the bounty of the State. I have only to deal with one point more in this part of my subject. I propose to abolish the system of individual examination as regards the elementary subjects and the class subjects. The elementary subjects are the three R's; the class subjects are those which are taught to a whole class at once, such as geography and simple English literature; hence its name, "class subject." There is a third set of subjects, called specific, which relate to certain sections of science, certain departments of foreign literature, and certain branches of art. These are subjects undertaken only by a few selected from the school classes, and with respect to them I propose to keep up the system of individual examination. Upon these the examiners may work their will to their hearts' content. I now come, Sir, to the second part of my subject, which is absolute freedom of classification. The present rigid system of classification is a direct consequence of the system of individual examination. If we have the present system of payment by results, we must have a corresponding system of classification. If we have a system of individual examination, the tendency must be that the children will go on yearly from standard to standard. It does not necessarily follow that the children are classed according to age. But the tendency runs strongly in that direction. Now, nothing can be more fallacious than to put children seven or eight years old from Whitechapel in the same category with children of the same age from Pimlico. Children having been put at seven years of age to Standard I. must, whether fit to do so or not, go on to the Second Standard the following year, because the grant cannot be obtained two years running in the same standard. In fact, he had better stay in the First for a while. Perhaps a child gets from the First to the Second Standard with difficulty, and with still greater difficulty in to the Third; and the difficulty increases with every standard to which he passes. Thus he lags behind, or is over-pressed throughout his career. But if there were not individual examination the teacher would keep the child in the same standard as long as it was good for him. I admit that if a scholar shows marked ability it is possible for him to advance from the First Standard to the Third at once, skipping over the Second; but in practice it rarely, or never, happens. Supposing a teacher has promoted a scholar over one standard and that he fails to pass in the next or higher standard, the grant is lost. Then the teacher will be blamed for having incurred the responsibility of putting the scholar forward, and the consequence is that no teacher will undertake to do it. Furthermore, as the six Standards are arranged according to the years between the ages of six and seven, the skipping over one standard is apt to disarrange the career for the remaining years. The consequence of the present system is that children are pushed on year after year without any regard to their fitness or capacity, and that while some children are backward and overpressed, others are forward, and yet have to be kept back in company with their fellows, as the teachers say "simply to mark time." What is the result upon the classes? There is evidence of the result in the Library of this House. In any particular class about 25 per cent. of the children are too good for it, another 25 per cent. are not good enough, the remaining 50 per cent. being on the level of the class. That is not as it should be. That, too, is what I meant when, in the earlier part of my speech I, said that the system yokes unequal scholars together. The teacher in such a class has to adopt three methods of teaching in each class. He must have one plan for those who are not up to the mark, another for those who are above the mark, and a third for those who are equal to the average. The House will see that this greatly prejudices the system of instruction. Further, it is manifest that a particular scholar may be better in one subject and worse in another. Suppose he is very clever at figures, rather clumsy in handwriting, and with no taste for reading. Under a proper system of classification he would rise to a high standard in arithmetic, and be placed in a much inferior standard in handwriting and reading. Under the present system he must be kept back in his arithmetic because his writing is bad and his reading defective; or if he be put into a superior class owing to his proficiency in arithmetic, he must struggle on as he best can in the other two subjects. And the same remark applies equally to the class subjects which I have already described. What can possibly be the use in any rational system of instruction of such regulations as these? Yet this is the state of things that inevitably prevails, and the authorities say there is no remedy under the present system of a grant on a pass by each individual scholar in an examination in the three subjects. The whole affair comes to be regarded in a mercenary light—so many shillings for this, so many for that, and so forth—all which is unworthy of the cause of education. According to the existing rules that course cannot be altered, but if payment upon individual examination is abolished, that defective system of classification will be abolished with it, and the two evils will vanish simultaneously. Every scholar will be placed according to his aptitude in the class where he can get the teaching suitable for him, and there will be uniformity according to the rightness and fitness of things. Generally the scholars will be rightly classed, and not wrongly, as at present. They will be much of a muchness in each class, and there will be one method only in that class (instead of three plans) suited to all alike. The instruction then will be greatly facilitated. I beg the House to remember that our teachers are worthy of confidence, and may be depended upon to classify their scholars rightly. We have trained and certificated them to be what they are. We may be proud of what we have made them to be. I believe that no country in the world is better served than England is by her schoolmasters and schoolmistresses. If it be said that the motive or incentive for pushing the teachers, with all this freedom, will lack a scholars on—I reply that the parents will see to that! Every parent knows that unless his son or daughter can be pressed on, he or she will have to stay at school till the age of 12 or 13; whereas, if the child is well advanced and passes a superior standard, he or she can get away at 10 or 11 and at once become a wage-earner. Besides other and better motives the prospects of wage-earning makes the parent anxious about his child's progress. By intrusting greater freedom of classification of the children to a body of ladies and gentlemen who are thoroughly worthy of the national confidence, there is no danger of want of pressure being put upon the children. The parents put pressure upon the teacher, and that pressure we may be quite sure will be communicated from the teacher to the scholar. Then, lastly, it is desirable that this abolition of individual examination and this freedom of classification should be absolutely unconditional and unreserved. There should be a full and frank admission of the principle, and that admission should not be whittled away by various conditions, caveats, and reservations in the Code. I am not alluding to the New Code, but such limitations have happened, and may happen again. I ought to know the official mind, and I am sure that it is slow to part with control. When it has had for a series of years vast interests under its shackles, it is very unwilling that these fetters should be struck off. A despotism of this sort dies hard! Unless we have the thing as clear as noonday, so that all who run may read—master, scholar, and parent—then this House will not have done all that is desirable. Therefore, I am anxious to obtain the sanction of the House to an abstract principle which is clear and definite and which may be considered as not the abolition of payment by results, but as an improved system of payment by real results. Whether he sees his way to fully carry out the principle or not, I am sure my right hon. Friend will not dispute its justice. I hope he will carry it out unreservedly. He will thereby earn the gratitude of the educational world, and the blessing of tens of thousands of families all over the country. The recognition of this principle by the House to-night will gladden the hearts of multitudes; will bring peace to their minds, lighten their labours, sweeten their existence. Still more, it will help the schools of England to realise the ideal of what they ought to be—that is to say, the homes of national virtue, the abodes of practical culture, and the centres of honest effort. I beg to move the Motion standing in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the present system by results is injurious to Education and should therefore be abolished, and that the condition of a school should be tested not by the individual examination of every scholar, but by the general inspection of the institution as a whole, the grant being distributed as a capitation allowance on the average attendance, freedom being allowed to the teachers in classifying each scholar according to his aptitude and proficiency,"—(Sir Richard Temple.)

—instead thereof.

\*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I am very glad I have the honour of seconding the Motion, if only to show that there is no Party feeling upon this question. I cannot refrain from regretting, however, that it should have been necessary to bring it forward at this particular time, because to ascertain extent it interferes with the discussion of the Code, which we understand from the right hon. Gentleman will come on before Whitsuntide. But the right hon. Gentleman will, I feel sure, understand this, that those who take part in this Debate do so in no sense antagonistic to this Code. On the contrary, we congratulate him and thank him for the new departure he has taken. The term "payment by results" is usually applied to the system under which the individual examination of each child is taken as the basis of the payment of the grant; but it has come to include also the system of payment by the piece. Now, Sir, I am not ashamed to confess that, as a Member of the Royal Commission on Education, my views on this subject were very much modified by the overwhelming and almost unanimous nature of the evidence placed before us, not only by teachers and managers, but by all interested in elementary education. But in condemning the system of "payment by results" I am not prepared necessarily to condemn its original introduction thirty years ago. At that time the system of national education was so gross and so bad that it was necessary for the State, in extending its grants, to take care that it had some guarantee of good results for its money. At the same time, I blame those who succeeded Mr. Lowe as Vice President of the Council, for not having been able to distinguish between the use and the abuse of such a system, and for not having sooner appreciated the evils which followed its vast extension. It is highly probable, indeed, that the very name itself—"payment by results"—has had something to do with the long period during which the system has existed. Everyone desires payment by results; but, unfortunately, under the present system, we get results we do not want, and pay for results we do not get. My hon. Friend has dwelt at length on the evils which have followed from the existing system. It leads to overpressure and underpressure. It leads to cram instead of to thoroughness; and education that is not thorough does not last. I think we all feel that one of the great evils of our system is that children leave school at too early an age and soon forget all the instruction they have received. The whole system of education has become mechanical, uniform, and inelastic. One of its chief blots, moreover, is that, under it, the grant practically depends on one day's work instead of on the work of the whole year. The earning power of that day depends, moreover, on two variable quantities, the temper of the Inspector, and the temper of the clerk of the weather. The examination is necessarily somewhat perfunctory; and causes a vast variation in the amount of grant for exactly the same amount and goodness of work. The system is demoralising to the teachers and to the parents, as well as to the Department itself. The question is, How are we to replace this system? What other system can we put in its place, that will still give to the State a guarantee that its money was being properly expended? If we could start afresh I do not hesitate to say that the ideal system of national education would be that we should have strong representative Local Authorities, who should have the fullest possible power over the elementary schools in the districts, and should be responsible for the sufficiency and efficiency of those schools. The State, instead of dealing with individual schools, should distribute the grant not according to the needs or the results of the individual schools, but according to the needs and circumstances of each particular district. It should pay its grant direct to those Local Bodies, and make them fully responsible for the mode in which the money was expended. But that time was not yet. And, meanwhile, it is idle to compare what is going on abroad, or in our colonies, with our system at home, because, as my hon. Friend knows—for he is one of the chief props and ornaments of the voluntaryists—we have a dual system of School Board and voluntary education. The position is this. Three out of every five of our elementary schools are under practically irresponsible managers. This state of things was due, on the one hand, to the gross neglect of the State in the past; on the other, to the self-sacrifice and zealous endeavours of those who, when the State neglected its duty, took a part of that duty upon themselves. The result was that, when the State did at last realise its responsibility, it found the ground very much covered; and, ever since, in consequence of this dual system, the nation has been hampered on all questions of national education, because, unfortunately, both in and out of the House, they have to be looked at not only, or perhaps chiefly, from an educational, but from a political, an economical, and a sectarian point of view. The result of this state of things is that the Department pays every year something like £2,000,000 to these irresponsible managers, and that for every £1 these managers provide the State provides £3. Further, if we are going to have abolition of fees, upon which the House, I think, is pretty generally agreed, the proportion that these managers will provide will then be but as 1 to  $4\frac{1}{2}$  contributed by the State. This is a very serious point in the consideration of how far we can relax the present system. The Resolution moved by my hon. Friend seems to me to involve two principles with which I cordially agree. In the first place, it proposes to abolish altogether any system under which a grant paid to any school shall have as its basis the individual examination of every child in the school. Secondly, it proposes that the grant shall be, as far as possible, a fixed grant, to be paid, not in small pieces, but in one sum as a general fixed grant, dependent on the general efficiency of the school. With this principle I cordially concur. But I do not know that I quite go so far as my hon. Friend when he says that, in the practical carrying out of his proposition, this fixed grant should depend on the ascertained pecuniary needs of the school, and not on examination results. If that means that the educational results in the school are not to be taken into account in assessing the grant, I am afraid I can hardly agree with him; but if it means that educational results are not to be the only results that are to be taken into account in assessing the grant, then I cordially agree with him. I confess I could not quite go with my hon. Friend as to the system of inspection he proposes to substitute. He said that, under the ideal system, it would not be necessary for the Inspector to examine the children at all; but that he would be able to see how the children were taught, and ascertain the general efficiency of the school, by a series of visits. As regards the series of visits, I am entirely with my hon. Friend; but, I confess, that, in my opinion, under any system by which the State gives grants to these schools, certainly so long as Voluntary and Board schools exist side by side, we must have a thorough inspection and examination, not only of the moral tone of the school and the intelligence of the teachers, but also of the efficiency of the education which is given, especially as regards the three R's. But this does not in the least imply that a particular portion of the grant is to depend on a particular examination, or that the Inspectors are to examine individually all the children in the school in order to base the grant in any shape or form on a system of percentages—a system which we agree in condemning. But I do not see that we can entirely get rid of inspection and examination. It seems to me that the right principle—and there I agree with my hon. Friend—would be to get rid, as far as possible, of the whole system of percentages, and to give the largest possible fixed grant. In my opinion, it is better to have one large fixed grant rather than, as proposed in the Code of this and of last year, in the one case three and in the other two fixed grants. This grant should depend upon the general efficiency of the school, the suitability of the building, the sufficiency and efficiency of the teaching staff, and the suitability and character of the instruction given. Outside this grant, there must doubtless be certain special grants in addition. It is generally agreed that the specific subjects should be taught, and paid for separately. I am bound to say I think it might be expedient and necessary to give besides additional grants to schools teaching efficiently drawing and cookery, and giving manual instruction. I draw a very clear distinction between such subjects as these, and the three R's, together with the ordinary class subjects which should be placed entirely under the fixed grant. I would go further, and would cordially support the recommendation in the Minority Report of the Royal Commission, in desiring that, in addition, further special grants should be given to improve the efficiency of schools where the managers went to the expense of organising teachers, utilising drawing instructors, or science demonstrators; and, again, where they made special arrangements for the instruction of pupil teachers at centres otherwise. I think in all these matters there might be special grants outside and above the large fixed grant; they would have none of the evils of the old system by leading to cram, and over-pressure in special subjects, while they would do a great deal to encourage schools to improve and bring themselves up to the highest point of efficiency. One other point I would suggest in relation to the fixed grant, that it should be variable in one sense—if the bull may be allowed—so as to give encouragement to the schools at which the poorer class of children attend, and be an inducement to schools in a better position to reduce their fees, namely, by an addition to the fixed grant where the fees were below the average, and by a reduction from the fixed grant where the fees were high. I cordially agree with my hon. Friend that along with this fixed grant the fullest possible liberty should be given to teachers in the classification of children, the choice of subjects, and the methods of teaching. As Mr. Alderson, late one of our Inspectors, has well said, in the attempt to classify children we take what may be called an “average abstract child,” and try to classify all other children on the procrustean basis of that particular abstract child. The whole system of classification has turned, as my hon. Friend says, on the matter of age, whereas the matter of age in elementary schools is, perhaps, the last factor that should be taken into account when we desire to classify children for instruction according to their abilities and attainments. I agree with my hon. Friend that we have reached, and, indeed, I think we have long past, the time when we may place the fullest possible trust in the loyalty honour, and discretion of our teachers. They are very different now as a class to what they were when the Duke of Newcastle's Commission reported. The whole nation has been educated to a higher standard, and our teachers are much better educated, better trained, and far better fitted to carry on school work than they were thirty or forty years ago. I agree with my hon. Friend, and speak from considerable personal experience, when I say that there is no class of men or women in the kingdom more entitled to our thanks and praise for the way in which they have conducted their work. Very arduous and difficult their work is, and the influence and exertions of our teachers, often to their own personal detriment, have done much to mitigate and diminish the evils of our present cast-iron system of payments by results. To them is due, in very great measure, the improvement in the condition of our schools. Just one other point in connection with the fixed grant, and it is one upon which I lay very great stress indeed, namely, that it is essential, if we are going to pay this fixed grant for the “efficiency” of a school that the minimum requirement of efficiency should be increased, and that we should have a more liberal idea as to what should constitute a suitable school for the elementary education of our children. I regret that in the New Code—I am not going to discuss it now, but I cannot refrain from expressing a passing regret—the minimum requirements for our elementary schools have not been largely raised. We ought to have a higher ideal of structural suitability, and I do not think the minimum scale of accommodation on the basis of eight square feet, laid down by the Department, is anything like sufficient. We ought to have a much more liberal idea of what the staffing in our schools should be. The present minimum, and, indeed, the minimum laid down in the New Code, is ludicrously inadequate. Generally, too, we ought to have a higher ideal of what should constitute the minimum curriculum in our schools. Here, again, the New Code is most disappointingly inadequate. In short, if we are going to improve our system by substituting a fixed grant for payment by results, we must take a broader view of what should constitute suitability of building, staff, and curriculum than we have been content with in the past. One matter further, to which my hon. Friend has alluded. It will be essential, if we are to introduce the one grant system, that the Inspectors should visit the schools far oftener than they do at present. The system is perfectly absurd under which an Inspector judges the school upon one visit. By the introduction of the fixed grant, while the individual power of the Inspector would be diminished, his responsibility would be largely increased. He will be less of a machine, and more of a rational and responsible being. His responsibility would be increased, because upon the Report of the Inspector the Department must rely to keep the efficiency of a school up to the standard, and they must be strong enough to absolutely withdraw the grant if the school is at all non-efficient. A great deal, both under the New Code as well as under the proposals now made, will depend on how the Department put their powers into force. But I believe we may trust the Department, under the pressure of public opinion, to carry out such a system; we may trust, as my right hon. Friend has said, that they will keep the schools up to a state of efficiency, and that they will have strength of mind enough to refuse the grant if that state of efficiency is not maintained. I believe public opinion will support them in that respect, and that the pressure of the parents will do much also to bring about the consummation we desire. One point more, and it is the last. I must touch on the question of attendance. This fixed grant must depend on the average attendance, and I think our teachers have a great and material grievance in the manner in which compulsory attendance is carried out, or rather not carried out, in many parts of the kingdom. It is very disheartening to them when children do not properly attend school, and still more so when their efforts to secure attendance are not properly supported by the Local Authority. While I am quite sure that no one desires to carry out the system of compulsory attendance harshly, I believe that the parents, as a class, and the country at large, do desire that, when a school is provided, the children should be found in their places there. But, unfortunately, not only in too many cases are the School Board Authorities, or the School Attendance Committees, too lax in enforcing attendance, but also, and especially in London, as my hon. Friend knows very well, Magistrates are too fond of considering the interests of the parents rather than the interests of the children. They forget that, after all, the "child is father to the man," and let off many parents who ought to be convicted for gross neglect of their children's welfare, because it seems hard upon the parents to inflict a fine. The abolition of the fees will, doubtless, do much to improve attendance.

Regularity of attendance will be greatly assisted by the system we propose, under which teachers will have more freedom, greater power and inducement to introduce a more reasonable and more elastic methods of instruction, and to make school more attractive. I believe the House does desire to take a new departure, and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Department is entirely of that opinion. Our only desire is to carry on past progress with greater rapidity, and by improving the condition and the position of teachers in the schools to benefit the children, and, through the children, to benefit the nation at large.

*(10.20.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I very much fear that, in spite of the grave importance of the matter now under the cognisance of the House, my contribution to the Debate must be but small, and it will be obvious to the House why my observations are restricted. It is only some few weeks since I placed upon the Table a document dealing upon an entirely new basis with our elementary educational system, and although it is perfectly true, and I gladly accept your ruling, Sir, that this Motion is perfectly in order, because this new Code which it has been my duty to place before Parliament is not, strictly speaking, a legislative enactment, yet my position is, practically speaking, analogous to that of a Member who, within a short time of the occasion when he will have to move the Second Reading of a Bill, finds himself suddenly face to face with a Debate dealing not only with the principle, but absolutely the details, of his measure. I can assure the House, and I assure my hon. Friend, that I mention this not from any feeling in the nature of personal complaint—indeed, in political matters nowadays there is no greater mistake than to complain of anything—I make these remarks not in a spirit of complaint, but simply as a reason, and I hope the House will accept it as an adequate reason, why I am practically precluded from taking that part in an educational discussion I should desire, and which the nature of the subject would seem to require. Having said so much, I at once come to the point of what Her Majesty's Government are prepared to do in regard to this Motion. I say at once that, having laid on the Table of the House a Code, which, in a concrete form, embraces almost entirely the principle of the Motion now before us, I am prepared gladly to accept and endorse this Motion, but I must urge one or two points by way of qualification. First, I should like to mention a point dealt with by my hon. Friend who seconded the Motion in an excellent speech. He referred to the form of the Motion, and I will read the terms, because, although we may accept the broad principle, I am anxious to take a fair view of the situation, and that we should not commit ourselves to any dangerous consequence which may be involved. My hon. Friend (Sir R. Temple) suggests "That the present system of payment by results is injurious to education, and should, therefore, be abolished." Now, I think that in the House generally, and among those outside who take an interest in educational matters, the system of payment by results has been condemned, and, so far as I am concerned, not only in the House, but on more than one occasion outside, I have spoken in condemnation of the system, and can, therefore, accept the proposition without reserve. Then comes a further important point in the Motion—

"And that the condition of a school should be tested not by the individual examination of every scholar, but by the general inspection of the institution as a whole."

That, also, I accept, and I believe hon. Members who read the Report of the Royal Commission will find that is accepted in principle by the Majority and Minority Report. But now I come to a point where I find a discrepancy in the speeches of my hon. Friends who moved and seconded this Resolution, and that is in regard to the question whether the Motion involves the utter and complete abolition of individual examination of scholars. The hon. Baronet who moved the Resolution alluded to a system he would support of a kind of second-hand individual examination, but I think the hon. Member who seconded demanded that the Inspector should hear the children examined, and he, while seconding the Motion without reserve, would so far preserve the system of individual examination that it should be applicable in certain cases. Now, this is important, in view of the fact that within a few weeks I shall have to submit to the

Sir William Hart Dyke

House a Vote for £3,750,000 for purposes of elementary education. I think, therefore, it is most important that in voting for this Resolution the House of Commons should know the precise position in which it is placed. For myself, I support the Motion in the light of the speech of the hon. Member who seconded it, who demands that a certain system—not the present system—of individual examination should be preserved. Here I am supported by the authority of the hon. Member for Oxford University, who was also a Member of the Royal Commission. My hon. Friend is, I believe, one of several Members who signed one of these documents we find on our breakfast table in the morning, putting in the most alluring and enticing form a suggestion that we should put the closure upon our dinners and hasten down to make a House at 9 o'clock. He, I believe, is a supporter of this Motion; but I notice also that he signed the Report of the Commission containing this sentence—

"The distribution of the Parliamentary Grant cannot be wholly free from the present dependence on the results of examination without the risk of greater evils than those it is sought to cure."

The point, then, I would earnestly press on the House is this: that I accept the Motion in the spirit of the seconder of it, and in the sense in which I understand my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford University gives his support, with the reservation that I am in favour of a sufficient test of the efficiency of a school by individual examination being preserved up to a certain point.

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to explain that what I said, or what I meant to say, was that the Department should retain the power to examine individually, if necessary, in order to test efficiency; but that the grant should not depend on this examination. That I take to be the effect of the right hon. Gentleman's words.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: No doubt this explanation is demanded on account of the difficulty in which I am placed, that I cannot go further into this discussion. What I understand the hon. Member really wishes is to substitute for the present system of grants a fixed grant assessed and paid according to the efficiency of the school as a whole, and one important item to be taken into account in considering the grant will be the knowledge of the children in elementary subjects such as can only be tested by a certain amount of individual examination. There is one other point I should like to mention. I cordially adopt the last clause in the Motion which refers to the freedom to be allowed to teachers to classify scholars according to their aptitude. I wish to see that this freedom is liberally and properly administered ; but there must be a reservation that where the Inspector finds it is abused by those in charge of a school, he shall have power to step in. I have no further observations to add with regard to this Motion. I accept it with the reservations I have made. I hope the Debate will be conducted on fair and just lines. I am sure that no hon. Members wish to do me any injustice by prematurely discussing my proposals. Since I have had the honour of holding office I have received fair-play from all quarters, and I am sure that now I shall not appeal in vain for similar treatment. It will shortly be my duty to explain the proposals which the Government have to make, and till then I trust hon. Gentlemen will not attempt to discuss them. I regret that this very position of affairs has prevented me from doing justice to the Motion, which has not only my hearty sympathy, but my very best support.

(10.35.) MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I quite sympathise with the closing remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, for I hold that when a good thing has to be said, the sooner it is said the better. I thank the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham for having brought this Motion forward and for thus having exploded the vicious system of payment by results. I believe that the system of education which has, for the last 15 years, been fostered in this country and in Ireland has been injurious to the children and dishonouring to the teachers. It has been a system calculated to bring the teachers and parents into conflict. Now, I have not read the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council on Education ; but I must say I do not think that, in a matter of this kind which affects the education of the children of the community, the question of courtesy to the Minister ought to be made subservient to the necessities of the State. I have been glad to see a practical unanimity among hon. Members on this question. I have myself been looked upon as a strong politician, but still I have been pleased to see this subject approached from both sides of the House with an evident desire to eschew politics. I hope I shall not be understood as complaining of the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman has met us. I agree with him as to the importance of retaining the individual examination of children. If there is not an individual examination of the children in the schools for some purpose or other, the visitation of the Inspector will be of no use. I speak with practical experience, for, during 13 years of my life, I was connected with the primary education of children. It is very easy to dress up a school and to present a class to an Inspector, and above all, for a teacher to undertake the examination in the presence of the Inspector and to make a show class. These periodical examinations we all know of. I am strongly against the system of payment by results, and I want the Inspector to be brought more into individual contact with the individual children of the school. There is another thing. In all Departments under the control of the State, and which may be paid for by public money, I would have unexpected visits to be the rule rather than the exception. Now, it is all very well to talk of courtesy. It is a very nice thing for a Departmental gentleman to wire down to his friend and say, "I may possibly be found in such a place on such a day ;" but the primary thing is for a school to be always in such a state that the Inspector will find it in order at any hour or moment he may drop into it. I am talking of Irish experience principally. There any gentleman can come in and inspect the schools, but he has no privilege of examination without the permission of the teachers. I would have the Inspector in a position that he may drop in at any moment and claim the privilege of examining any class. That is really essential. The reason I am against the result system is this: I believe if you have a good, honest, intelligent teacher, he can do more for the children if he is unfettered than if he is crushed by this system, which is gradually driving up the standards. And then with regard to the standard of age. I do not follow the hon. Gentleman in his comparison between Whitechapel and Pimlico, but there are numbers of things to be taken into consideration. If he takes either Whitechapel or Pimlico, or if he takes a district in which Irish was the language of the children before they went to school, it would be very unfair to treat the latter children on the same standard as regards age as he would treat those children who, by constantly listening to their parents, have acquired a great deal of intelligence before being subjected to school teaching. These things have to be considered. The duty of the Inspector is to judge of the general proficiency of the school. Then the results of the payments would be regulated by general matters, such as the number of children attending the school and their average attendance. That would be very good; but there ought to be another thing. The hon. Gentleman ought to draw no hard and fast line, and he ought to take into consideration the difficulties of the very different situation of the schools. I think that there should be some elasticity in the rule which he formulates in the matter, and that in out-of-the-way places where there is no possibility of having a large attendance if the teacher is doing more than commensurate good, he should be more than commensurately rewarded. If a teacher in an outlandish district has proved himself by every standard capable of instructing these children, and capable of showing results which no one could have expected in that district, there should be some elasticity in the arrangement to enable the Government to give him increased payment. Regarding this Motion as aimed at the pernicious system of payment by results, I am strongly in its favour. I desire to see the primary teachers in this country and in Ireland properly recompensed. If a teacher has a natural aptitude for his profession, he takes an interest in the children under him, and he should be allowed, if he thinks it right, to keep a child a longer time in the lower classes than he is now allowed to do. In the elementary schools in Ireland the teachers are paid fees which are progressive according to the classes in which the children are placed; and if a teacher keeps a child back in its own interest, he does so at the loss to himself of the progressive fee, while the parent is down on him because his child is not so advanced as a neighbour's child may be. I am glad that a House was kept for the discussion of this Motion. I believe the Mover and Secunder have made out an irresistible case, and I do not think any hon. Member will get up and defend this vicious system of payment by results. It is our duty to see that we have the best possible system of education for our children.

*(10.50.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I do not wish to prolong the Debate, but desire to express the opinion that too much blame has been cast upon the present system of elementary education, which has not been so devoid of results as has been stated. The disappointment which it has caused is due partly to the early departure of children from school, and partly to the want of continuation schools in our national system. The evils that hon. Members have deplored will be greatly relieved by the Code which will shortly be laid on the Table by the Government, and the whole subject may then be fully discussed. I will not prolong the present Debate, and will only add that I believe no class of men and women are more worthy the confidence of the people and more desirous to properly discharge the duties entrusted to them than are the elementary teachers. I feel greatly rejoiced that the old system is ended. We bid farewell to it with gratitude for what it has accomplished in the past, and we look forward with hope to a better system.

(10.51.) MR. C. A. V. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Considering the position of what I may call suspended animation, in which I am, as a member of the London School Board, owing to the attack of the Chief Secretary on me last year, I may, perhaps, be regarded by some as having no claim to take part in a Debate on education. But I wish to emphasise one or two points which have come out in the course of the discussion.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,—

House adjourned at Eleven o'clock till Monday next.

THE NEW EDUCATION CODE.

OBSERVATION.

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, I do not intend to trouble your Lordships with any general discussion of the Education Code, but only to invite your serious consideration of the two features connected with the Code which are indicated in the notice I have given. The new Code is, I think, an improvement upon that which was introduced last year and withdrawn, and the two together constitute a very considerable improvement on the existing law. I have noticed the points in which, I think, a considerable improvement has been made; first in simplifying the method of estimating school work, and including in that, for the first time, discipline, good conduct, good manners, and moral training. More freedom has been given to the teachers, both in classifying scholars and subjects. Class and sample are substituted for individual examination. The proposed Code lightens and makes much less mechanical and impracticable the work of inspection, and it greatly improves the conditions both as to pupil teachers' apprenticeships, as to trained and untrained teachers, as to the staff, and as to the premises required for every school. The objections which I have to make to the Code are two: first, that it retains the system of piecemeal payment for education to a certain extent, and sufficiently, to continue the mischiefs of that mode of payment, and to vitiate the whole system. My other objection is that it positively stultifies itself when greatly enlarging the fixed grants in support of education, yet making them all variable. As to the piecemeal payment for education. That was a device adopted first in order to induce Parliament to undertake the elementary instruction which volunteers were inadequately giving by an apparent guarantee of a quid pro quo for every shilling voted for the purpose. Twenty years' experience has proved more completely, year by year, the futility and mischief of that mode of paying for national education, and it was condemned more completely in the House of Commons last Friday than it has ever been before. It was condemned generally in the House by all who spoke upon the Resolution moved by Sir Richard Temple, and more especially condemned by the Vice President of the Council. The evidence of the teachers taken before the Royal Commission, on whose Report this Code professes to be based, was unanimous as to the mischiefs which are produced by the mode of payment. The heads under which they divided their accusations of mischief were these: that it limits the curriculum of instruction and makes any special aptitude of teachers valueless; that it induces neglect of important parts of education to which no money value is attached; that it forces all concerned in the work to regard it in reference to their possible earnings on passes upon examination instead of looking to the general effect of the education; and that it substitutes mere cramming of the memory for real intellectual training. Very strangely the Commissioners drew the conclusion, from that unanimous condemnation by experts, that the Parliamentary grant for education cannot be wholly freed from dependence on results, and that Parliament could not be expected to make such large grants unless it could so satisfy itself that the quality of the education justified the expense. Both those conclusions are dependent on what is meant by results, and what may be the quality of the education which can be produced by such a system. But the Commissioners go, at all events, so far as to recommend its modification, as far as possible, and that it should be relaxed in the interests of the scholars, of the teachers, and of education itself. Those are their words; but they say that the total abandonment of the system might involve greater evils. What those evils were they gave not the slightest indication, nor is there any indication whatever of them in the evidence, whether in writing or orally. I tried to ascertain them by asking some of the highest authorities in the Department if they could indicate any source of evil in abandoning payment on results, but the best answer I got was that it was necessary, in order to stimulate teachers and keep them up to the mark by giving them a number of little prizes to earn beyond the fixed payment. So low an estimate of our teachers is scouted by all who are engaged in private schools throughout the country, although they see perfectly that their incomes will depend, as all working incomes must, upon excellence of results; but none of them would undertake to educate for an arbitrary and precarious payment for different items of instruction. Unfortunately, in this particular, the Code follows the recommendations of the Commissioners: It concludes that total abandonment of piece payment is impossible, and only recommends modification. It, therefore, retains such payments as these:—1s. for this, 1s. 6d. for that. Conceive, my Lords, a system under which, by way of education, the nation pays for six-pennyworth of discipline, or six-pennyworth of moral training! And let me say here, that religious instruction in the barest principles of Christianity is the only thing for which there is no payment. That constitutes the Index expurgatorius of our national schools, and religion, therefore, continues to be the one subject which is unpaid for and neglected. The other objection which I have to make to the Code is its anomaly of variable fixed grants. The Government has been so much engaged in Irish questions lately that they become somewhat Irish in their own ideas. This may account for the fact that in proposing fixed grants they have made them variable, with one exception, and that the only one which would have been better for some variation. The Merit Grant was tried a year or two ago, with the object of getting rid of the piecemeal mode of payment, and getting payments made generally according to merit, but the scale of merit "fair," "good," and "excellent," was absolutely found impracticable, and was only used as affording another mode of piecemeal payment. They found it was impossible to say exactly where the line was to be drawn between "fair" and "good" and "excellent" categories of schools, and the attempt to draw it was found to be most invidious, and was objected to by the country at large. But here we have a Merit Grant again in the very Code which professes to abandon it, only re-introduced under the cover of fixed grants. The variable fixed grants as proposed now I will state to your Lordships. The fixed grants for infants vary from 9s. to 7s. per head, according to the school equipment, and the age of the teacher—that is, according to the richer or poorer circumstances of the schools, giving the larger grants to the richer. There is also a sliding scale of payments of 6s., 4s., or 2s. a head to those schools, according to the Inspectors' opinion of the suitability of the instruction. Under the head of fixed grants to schools for older scholars, there is a variable grant of 12s. 6d. or 14s., according to the amount of intelligence exhibited, which intelligence is likely to be greater in the larger towns and amongst those who are best able to pay for education. That is the proposed appraisalment, and a very difficult appraisalment too. I should like to know how the Inspectors, who despaired of the working of the old Merit Grant, would draw a distinction between the category of schools deserving 12s. 6d. and 14s. a head. The only fixed grant that is invariable is 4s. for specific subjects, which are not taken up in any rural school. So much for this system of grants, which Mr. Sydney Buxton said, in the House of Commons, was a scheme for making the greatest possible variation of payment for exactly the same amount of labour in teaching. My Lords, I would only ask, in conclusion, is it impossible to escape entirely from this condemned system, which is fraught with so much mischief? What is done by every civilised nation in the world except ourselves is from a central fund for education to grant out to such local schools what each requires for its work, not competitively but actually.

Such Grants are made in Canada from provincial districts according to population and rateable value. In that way an adequate and certain income is given to enable local managers to carry out what the people want in the way of proper school tuition. Our own large School Boards have so severely felt the mischief of the present system that they have taken on themselves both the precarious receipts from detailed payments and the variableness of their aggregate amount, and have paid fixed salaries to their teachers, with a separate inspection of their own to watch the teachers' capacity for the work. If it is doubted whether we can fall back from a device adopted in order to induce Parliament to take up the subject, which device can no longer be required, because Parliament is now almost too profuse with grants for education, cannot we do that which all other nations do, and let the Treasury grant a capitation according to the requirements of every district, rural or urban, only seeing by inspection that the money they vote is bond fide appropriated for the purpose for which it is voted, leaving to the locality the arrangements with the school. Two of the most eminent authorities pointed out to the Commission how this could be done, only waiting for District Authorities to be formed. I know that I cannot get any alteration made in the Code now, but I simply desire to draw your Lordships' attention to two defects in the Code, in the hope that, through your Lordships' influence, they may both be remedied in the final and complete edition of the Code which the Government promise us next year. I am sure every one of your Lordships hope that they will put an end to this system of annual editions of it, which cause perpetual changes and uncertainty most embarrassing to managers and teachers, and to all who are interested in this important subject. Let us have a normal supply by Treasury grants, which will enable managers to work efficiently our schools throughout the country for moral and intellectual training, with a view to the best interest of education, and not hamper them by considerations of detailed earnings, and precarious incomes, dependent on periodical arbitrary examinations.

*THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, I congratulate the Government on having laid upon the Table of the House a new Education Code, which is decidedly in advance of the old one, and much more in line with the practical needs of the people. I think most of your Lordships will agree with me that Her Majesty's Government have done well in having dropped the subject which is called "English." I have never yet found any schoolmaster or schoolmistress who has been able to tell me that after all the "English" that has been taught to the children of the working classes, their actual speaking and writing has been very much improved. The practical needs of the people for their children's education have been better met in the present Code by the permissive introduction of manual instruction, suitable physical instruction, and laundry work; but I must express my regret that physical exercises and laundry work do not receive any direct encouragement in this Code. We think too much of the intellectual, and too little of the physical, needs of the children. I suppose it is now impossible to alter the Code, but I hope at some future time the subject of physical exercises will be brought more prominently forward. At present they are only permissive, but I should like to see them made compulsory. We are the only leading nation in Europe which has not physical instruction in its Educational Code. They have it in Germany, France, Sweden, and Switzerland. There is another point to which I should like to draw your Lordships' attention. The compulsory subjects are reading, writing, needlework, arithmetic, and drawing; but there is one subject which, although not included in this list, is practically compulsory, and that is recitation. At page 15 it is stated that no school shall receive the higher grant unless the Inspector reports that the scholars throughout the school are satisfactorily taught recitation. In the first standard the poor infants are bound, before the grant can be earned, to be able to recite 20 lines of poetry; in the second standard, 40 lines; in the third, 60 lines; and so on up to the sixth standard, where 150 lines of recitation are required. I ask whether this can be absolutely necessary. What advantage can there be in the children of, say, a labourer being able to recite 150 lines of Chaucer. It seems to me absolutely ridiculous that we should require a labourer's children to recite 150 lines of Chaucer when, as a matter of fact, the mass of the girls are not taught geography, and often not history—ininitely more important subjects for them. As your Lordships are doubtless aware, it is necessary that two class subjects should be chosen; they cannot choose more. If they choose needlework as one of the obligatory subjects they only get 1s.; but if they choose it as a class subject they get 2s.; consequently, as every manager is anxious to obtain the most money he can for his school, he will naturally take needlework as coming under the class subjects, and earn 2s. by it. They consequently lose one of those two important subjects, history or geography. Both those are subjects which our girls ought certainly to know something about. I would suggest that recitation should be entirely left out, and that some other subject should be put forward instead of it. My own feeling is that if we could change the curriculum of these children a little more, and insist upon the healthy ones going through some suitable physical exercises, it would be much better than teaching them to recite 150 lines of Chaucer. Sir Edwin Chadwick, in his Health of Nations, states that the receptivity of the minds of the great mass of children for instruction does not exceed three hours daily, and I think that is perfectly true, for it is confirmed by all the leading physiologists. But we give them four hours' instruction, and I think if there was half an hour, or even a quarter of an hour, devoted to physical exercises, the teachers would get a great deal more out of them than at present. In fact, the question of the health of the younger generation of our city population is, to my mind, a very serious one for England, and one which I hope this House will take into consideration within a very short space of time. We are an essentially urban nation, and are rapidly becoming more and more so. I cannot understand how anyone living in our large towns can doubt for a moment that our town children are degenerating. I know it is doubted, and it is a most difficult thing to prove; but almost everyone who has lived among the working-classes of our towns is of the opinion that the children of our working classes in towns are degenerating. The urban populations are rapidly increasing; there are two persons living in the town to one in the country, and therefore we must consider the health of the younger generation of our urban populations, for the standard of health and physique in our times will have an ever-increasing influence on the health standard of the nation. The power and energy of a nation depend upon the power and energy possessed by the units which constitute that nation. If your units are weak in health, your nation will be weak in strength of mind and body. How are we to hold our own in the world in future unless our population is of that healthy character which will make us a healthy as well as an intellectual nation? If there are those who say that the intellect of the nation has nothing to do with the health of the children, I venture to state that exactly the reverse is the case, and that unless the children are healthy you cannot get the highest intellectual work out of them. In fact, unless we take care, our country will have to take a lower rank among the hierarchy of nations, and I hope that before such an event occurs we shall set our house in order. It is a well-known axiom of hygienic science that, other things being equal, the health of a population is in inverse ratio to its density; the more people are crowded together the more unhealthy they are, and therefore the more our population is crowded into our towns, the more unhealthy they must become, unless we prevent this law taking effect. Physical exercises are not only good for strengthening the body and for strengthening the mind; but I assert that they are good also, inasmuch as they inculcate many moral qualities which are largely wanted among our people. They teach habits of order, discipline, the duty of obedience, attention to command, quickness to act upon order, and the power of co-operation in acting with each other. In 1884, out of 65,000 men who offered themselves as recruits for the Army, 430 per 1,000 were rejected for physical disability. I think your Lordships will agree that that is an enormous proportion; and when we consider that it is the most active and energetic, and consequently we must presume the most healthy, part of the population which seeks to follow the exciting life of a soldier, we can readily imagine what the physical condition of the great mass of our population must be. We must take into account also the number of those presenting themselves who were rejected simply for inferior physique. We have already passed a Bill for the national defence of this country, and I am thankful for it. I am thankful that we are spending these millions. But we may spend £50,000,000, aye, £100,000,000 in national defence in vain if we do not look after the bodily health of our children. If our children do not grow up healthy and strong and able to use the weapons and scientific appliances entrusted to them, we shall simply be throwing the money away. They will be unable to use these weapons, and all your efforts to defend the nation in time of war will be in vain. But it may be asked, why are we to include physical education in the Code? Why cannot we trust to games and sports? Well, even suppose the children of whom I am speaking could engage in sports and games it is not exactly the same thing. But the fact is, that in our large towns there are no places where the mass of the children can play. Sports are excellent for children to engage in; but there can be no doubt that for the purpose of which I am speaking, the sports of these children are not exactly what are required. They are crude and unspecialised, and, therefore, inadequate for the purpose of giving a national physical education. I am an ardent supporter of our national games of football and cricket; but I do say those are not exactly what we want. We want something more to give those qualities which are necessary to produce a thoroughly strong, healthy, and intelligent population. Then it may be asked—What do you propose? I would suggest that something similar to the Swedish drill should be established in all our schools. One of my reasons for saying this is that Swedish drill requires hardly any appliances and is consequently an inexpensive system. There is no better method which can be adopted for bringing out the physical powers of the children in all directions. That method is founded on the laws of Nature, and on the treatment of the bodily organism. I hope, therefore, that if not now, at all events at some future time, something will be done in this direction. If anyone shall answer—"We do not want robust health as much as intellectual attainment; the mortal body, being the lower organ, must take its chance, and be even sacrificed, if need be, to the higher organ—the immortal mind." To such I reply, with Charles Kingsley, that you cannot do it—

"The laws of Nature, which are the express will of God, laughs such attempts to scorn. Every organ of the body is formed out of the blood; and if the blood be vitiated, every organ suffers in proportion to its delicacy; and the brain, being the most delicate and highly specialised of all organs, suffers most of all, and soonest of all, as everyone knows who has tried to work his brain when his digestion was the least out of order. Nay, the very morals will suffer. From ill-filled lungs, which signify ill-repaired blood, causing year by year an amount not merely of disease, but of folly, temper, laziness, intemperance, madness, and, let me tell you fairly, crime—the sum of which will never be known till that great day when men shall be called to account for all deeds done in the body, whether they be good or evil."

Those are the words of Charles Kingsley, the apostle of muscular Christianity. One of the advantages of Swedish drill is that it is suitable for both girls and boys; and we may say for the girls, "If strong be the frames of the mothers the sons shall make laws for the people;" and the boys may make answer "Civium vires, civitatis vis."

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, I am pleased to find that so far no very serious exception has been taken to the Code which has been laid on your Lordships' Table, and I am happy that the same has been the case throughout the country. I do not suppose that a code will ever be introduced which will please all managers and teachers of Board Schools, and subscribers to voluntary schools. At the same time, I think your Lordships will see, recollecting what the Debates were last year, that every effort has been made in this Code to meet the objections which were then brought forward, and as far as possible to bring the Code into conformity with the general opinion that prevails in the country, and at the same time to fulfil as far as possible the wishes of that eminent body of gentlemen who sat upon the Royal Commission, and who, in carrying out the laborious duty which they undertook, came to conclusions which, I think, ought to be a thing which the children particularly take to, and from the youngest upwards, they are quite ready to learn a certain number of verses suitable to their capacity. It is not so difficult for them as learning prose would be, and they take it up and do it with great readiness. I think you will find from the Reports of the Inspectors how great an improvement it makes in the reading power and intelligence of the children. It enables them to read with much more intelligence. From the explanations which have to be given to them they are enabled to read with much more intelligence and to become better acquainted with whatever they find in the books placed in their hands. Without recitation no school will be able to get the 14s. 6d. grant. Supposing there are two schools, which are both in very good condition, yet that one of them is not in a condition to take up this subject of recitation, and has, therefore, put it aside, that school would doubtless not receive the same grant as the other; but, as a general rule, the 14s. 6d. would be given to schools of a superior character, and which can show that the instruction given in each school is carried on with adequate means and an efficient staff—with all the means which would enable the teachers to impart fitting instruction to their pupils. My noble Friend on the Cross Benches says he thinks the children should have something more to do in the way of physical training. I am not quite sure that anything more could be got in during the four hours allotted for school time.

*THE EARL OF MEATH: I am sorry to interrupt the noble Viscount, but that was not what I said. My point was that the four hours for mere school teaching was a great deal too long a time, and I wanted to take something out and give the time to physical training.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: That is exactly so; the noble Earl did say that. He says that the four hours are too long, but he apparently forgets that in almost all schools there is an adjournment for a quarter of an hour or something of that kind, which gives one class of children an interval of play while another is at work, and so on, but I doubt very much that it will not be found when you only take out four hours from the 24 that you have done more than is advisable or necessary to do, and that when the children have to be in school so short a time with intervals of rest the time should be occupied in teaching. During the four hours there are alleviations from book work, such as musical drill and other things, while the children are in school. But it must be remembered that besides that in the greater part of the country the children have plenty of exercise and amusement during the hours when they are outside the schools and I think it will be found unnecessary, therefore, to force physical instruction upon the children more than is done now. At the present time they have drill, which certainly does a great deal, as any one may see, in setting up the children, and better fitting them for labour, and is in itself a most advantageous thing, as I believe the noble Earl will agree. But he wants something more to be done, and I quite concur that it would be a great advantage for many children to have more physical instruction, but I doubt whether that can be done in school hours with all the subjects which are included, besides the book learning, drawing, and other things. The whole time is not given to dry lessons, but the children are afforded intervals for other kinds of pursuits. I think, with regard to the Merit Grant, there is really very little to be said. When my noble Friend was talking of his own mode of inspection, he said it must be according to the merit of the school. I do not know by what means you are to carry on inspection, or how an Inspector is to go about his duties without seeing that one school is conducted in a totally different way, and is on a totally different footing from another—that one school is carried on upon a better system than another. But there is nothing which is obtainable by one school which is not obtainable by another. They will all be put on one footing if they will deserve it by attention to their duties, and they can all get the 14s. 6d. grant by taking care that the scholars are properly instructed, and that the organisation is properly cared for, and put on a right footing. I believe, my Lords, I have now spoken of all the subjects which have been brought before your Lordships. I do not want to go into the whole question of the Code, because that is not at present before us. I cannot help thinking that my noble Friend's speech was a sufficient indication that he was, upon the whole, satisfied with the Code, though he looked forward to next year. There have been shadowed forth many matters which will require the attention of Parliament next year, and I should have been glad if some of them could have been dealt with in the present Session; but your Lordships will see that controversial questions occupy the ground between now and the end of the Session, and that it would be inadvisable to bring forward other controversial questions at present. But I will say that these questions will be dealt with during next year; that they will not be shirked by the Government, but that Her Majesty's Government will address themselves to them, and that they will endeavour to deal with them without doing injustice to voluntary schools. Larger support is being offered day by day to voluntary schools, which are kept up to a very high standard, although, undoubtedly, they cannot always contend with those which have unlimited resources at their back. I cannot help thinking that the people of the country will begin to ask themselves before long whether they are not paying too much for education, when it is observed that a very useful and efficient education can be obtained for £1 16s. 6d. per head in some cases, while in others it costs over £3 per head, and is growing in amount. All those things require a great deal of consideration. I know that in London education always must cost more than in the country, owing to the greater cost of sites and buildings; but when we have an elevenpenny rate in London it makes us look about and ask what is the cost of education elsewhere. I find that in West Ham, which is almost a part of London, children are educated in the Board schools for something over £2 whilst in London, closely adjacent, it is something over £3 a head. I cannot myself see why there should be that difference between London and what is practically one of its suburbs.

*LORD NORTON: Is the noble Viscount speaking of voluntary schools?

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: No; I am speaking of Board schools. In London I think the average of voluntary schools is over £2, and over £3 per head in the Board schools. I mention these things because the question is one which may well occupy the attention of Parliament as soon as possible. Among the questions to be considered are assisted education in connection with the compulsory clauses, whether the grant from the Government should be limited or extended, and, if extended, in what way and under what conditions; and whether you should have, as in Scotland, the power of making grants to schools suitable to the population using them. Then, with regard to paying rates. Last year I ventured to say that I was myself personally in favour of exemption, and the question is whether, where no profit is made out of schools, it is reasonable they should pay rates. The Board schools, in addition to being furnished with rates for the purpose of education, are furnished with rates for the purpose of paying rates. That appears to me to work unfairly towards the voluntary schools. All those subjects are in the minds of the Government. I hope your Lordships will be able to deal with them satisfactorily in the legislation which we contemplate, and that the measures which may be introduced next year will meet with your Lordships' approbation.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY: My Lords, as I last year had the pleasure of proposing a draft Code, I hope I may be pardoned for rising for a moment or two to say how much we are indebted to the noble Viscount the Lord President for the care which he has bestowed upon this very difficult subject since Parliament last met. I think it will be obvious to everyone that a very great improvement has been effected. With regard to the effect of the New Code I cannot help thinking that education must be very much benefitted by it in the schools. We must rejoice at the prospect the noble Viscount has held out that the subject will be yet further considered, but still, educationally, I think the New Code promises to be a good one. How far the burdens borne still press upon those who are supporting schools voluntarily carried on, and who are really relieved by the New Code, time alone will show. I wish they would subscribe even more largely; but I think all are agreed, as the Royal Commission has admitted, that as the State a thing which the children particularly take to, and from the youngest upwards, they are quite ready to learn a certain number of verses suitable to their capacity. It is not so difficult for them as learning prose would be, and they take it up and do it with great readiness. THE EARL OF HARROWBY : My Lords, as I last year had the pleasure of proposing a draft Code, I hope I may be pardoned for rising for a moment or two to say how much we are indebted to the noble Viscount the Lord President for the care which he has bestowed upon this very difficult subject since Parliament last met. I think it will be obvious to everyone that a very great improvement has been effected. With regard to the effect of the New Code I cannot help thinking that education must be very much benefitted by it in the schools. We must rejoice at the prospect the noble Viscount has held out that the subject will be yet further considered, but still, educationally, I think the New Code promises to be a good one. How far the burdens borne still press upon those who are supporting schools voluntarily carried on, and who are really relieved by the New Code, time alone will show. I wish they would subscribe even more largely; but I think all are agreed, as the Royal Commission has admitted, that as the State has pushed up the requirements of education very much more of later years, it is only fair, seeing the burdens which press upon the voluntary schools, that they should not be overpressed. It seems to me that the New Code is likely to work in such a way that it will bring back the schools to very much the same condition they were in in the very best times of the first enthusiasm for national education. I think it will require very much more educational zeal on the part of the masters than the existing Code. There will be more thought required, and a great deal less routine work; and I think it will probably necessitate a considerable change in the teaching staffs in the schools. Beyond that, as to inspection, it is clear that more thorough inspection will be necessary. You will require a much longer period for inspection; and, also, that thoughtful instructions shall be given for directing the Inspectors of 30 years ago. I think their minds have been cramped by a narrow system, and that this new system will require to be worked by Inspectors with more time at their disposal, and who are able to give more thought and care to the good of the schools. It should be kept steadily in mind that that must be the result. The main feature of the New Code is that in future the State will not acknowledge any school that is not thoroughly good. I think that is a good point, for the moment you compel parents to send their children to school it is absolutely necessary to ensure that no bad schools shall exist. Then the year's warning will act as a great help to school managers in this way. Hitherto, they have been hampered by teachers who are not up to the mark; but, if now schools are in danger of being extinguished the managers will, without any inhumanity, be able to say to their inefficient teachers "Really you are not up to the mark; our school will die unless we get a more skilled master or masters, and we must therefore part with you." I think great help will be given to managers of schools in that way. With regard to rural schools, as far as I can judge, the careful provisions which my noble Friend has made will prevent their being overburdened by the new requirements which will at the start press heavily upon those schools. It must always be remembered that the requirements as to staff will press heavily upon them, and I doubt whether the new grants will meet the monetary demands upon them by those requirements. The case of the poorer urban schools is rather an anxious one, and I do not think the conditions of good schools in poor urban districts is sufficiently met. Very often there is only a dead level of poor population with no subscribers and no people in a better position to help. Yet many of the schools in such districts have been very good indeed. I think those are schools which require to be more considered than any others, with regard to obtaining assistance from the public. I must confess that I do not think there is a very great deal in what my noble Friend on the Cross Benches said with regard to the necessity for increasing physical education. We all want to bring up the boys as healthy and strong as possible, but I think he has overlooked the amount of military drill, or other physical exercises, that is given in the schools; and, considering that the hours of instruction are really short, and that you have within that space of time all sorts and varieties of instruction, I think we must be careful how we encroach on those four hours, which constitute the school time on five days in the week. Then I think we should be careful in shutting out recitation. Nothing is more popular, I believe, among parents than the recitations taught in the schools. When the noble Earl spoke of 150 lines of Chaucer having to be learnt by the scholars, I think he can hardly have visited many of the schools, because the recitations are really little patriotic pieces and songs which tend to brighten not only the school-life of the children but the homes of the parents, who more thoroughly enjoy the recitation of bits of poetry by their children than anything else in the school teaching. With regard to the question of fixed grants, I own that there, I think, there is some danger lurking. By Clause 92 the door is left quite open to upsetting the whole of the fixedness of the grants. There is no doubt that under that clause, though I am sure my noble Friend would not think of doing so, any future President of the Council could upset the whole system of the fixed grants if he disliked it; and I hope my noble Friend will consider that clause with very great care, as it certainly excites the gravest apprehensions in one's mind, and seems to be wholly inconsistent with the character of what is called a fixed grant. It is a fixed grant which is not fixed, and I think it may lead to very great danger and very great disappointment. There is another point for which we owe our thanks, and that is the giving an appeal to the Chief Inspector in all these matters. That is a point of great importance to managers of schools. On one point, as I am referring to the Code, I should like to say a few words. It is a point which presses rather unfairly upon school teachers. I see that in the instructions to Inspectors my noble Friend urges the teachers to avoid corporal punishment. I think that the position of teachers is a very hard one in this respect. The State has always shirked saying what punishment may be awarded, what amount, or for what offences, and we see teachers constantly brought before the Magistrates for inflicting trifling punishment. Some Magistrates dislike corporal punishment, and treat the teachers harshly, while in other cases it is the reverse. I think that the State ought to say what punishment is justifiable, and what the amount of the punishment shall be, and for what offences it should be administered. That, I think, is a point which everybody has overlooked. I rejoice that the tone of the instructions to Inspectors is very decided on the subject of the discipline of schools. The moral training of the children is a matter of the gravest importance to the State, and though it may be said that an Inspector would not be able to judge on this point from a single visit on one afternoon, a great service will be done to the State by means of such Inspectors, and making some effort to see that every precaution possible is taken for the moral training of the children. This is no trifling subject, and those who are acquainted with schools are well aware that the morals of the children, their habits, their demeanour to their parents, and so on, are matters which require watching. If the Inspectors look into these matters, great service will be done to the schools and to the State, and I think we again owe my noble Friend a great debt in that matter. With regard to night schools, I think we ought not to withhold a tribute of gratitude to my noble Friend for having endeavoured to make these schools more efficient, but I hope that next year the noble Lord will not forget the subject of what are called continuation schools, which do much service to the State, especially in the way of getting rid of the difficulty which exists in the confusion of instruction given in the day schools. Though we are grateful to the noble Lord, educationally, for this Code, and appreciate its clearness, I think that, financially regarded, it does not give sufficient pecuniary assistance to struggling schools, as to which I doubt very much whether they will be able to meet these new requirements. I hope the noble Lord will bear this in mind when next year's work begins. I was very glad to hear the noble Lord's declaration on behalf of the Government that Public Elementary Schools, Voluntary or Board, ought not to pay rates. And I rejoice at the pledge he has given with regard to voluntary schools, in reference to the other subjects to which we attach great importance, such as the doing away with the 17s. 6d. limit, which he has shadowed forth in his speech. For what he has so far done, and for the great service he has rendered in these matters, I beg again to thank him.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I do not wish to detain the House for many moments. A great deal of what can be said upon this New Code has been very well said by the noble Earl who has just sat down, and I do not want to go over the same ground again. But I think it well to make a few remarks about the working of the Code as now introduced, and upon some of the objections made to it by the noble Lord who began the Debate. It is objected that the whole character of the Code is minute, that it goes into very small particulars, and that the Inspector's rod will be over all those different matters; and it is asked, how is the Inspector to estimate them, how much is he to give to morality, and how much to grammar? My Lords, there is always more difficulty in inspection if you go into very minute sub-divisions than if you go generally into any one particular matter. If you make your grants depend upon examination in one particular matter, and say that you will give one grant for excellent moral training and a lower grant for good moral training, and a lower grant still for fair moral training, the Inspector will then be in a great difficulty, because he finds it is difficult to draw those lines. When you are dealing with one subject it is better that your sub-divisions should be as few as possible, and that you should call upon the Inspector to say whether the school in regard to that particular item is well taught or not, and that, if so, it shall have a certain grant; but in case there is something markedly excellent, then let it be rewarded by something higher, if bad, let it be marked for something lower. The exceptions in that case would be few. But it is a positive aid to an Inspector, and necessary in order to ensure proper inspection, that the different subjects of examination should be specific; because if you tell the Inspector to look at the matter as a whole his judgment will, unconsciously to himself, vary very much indeed, and will be very different to what it would be if he were examining into each subject separately. You should put down that he is to look at the moral training and examine into that; put down that he is to look into the discipline and mark its value; put down for him each separate thing that he is to look at. That will be a real guide to him, and the greatest possible guide in the inspection. It is the same thing with regard to examination. It is a good thing, I am certain, to examine every single child in a school; but I think it was a mistake to make the old grants so absolutely dependent upon the examination of the individual children as they were, and I think it is quite reasonable, in justice to the schoolmaster, that the Inspector should be told he is to examine a certain number so as to do justice to the schoolmaster, but to examine if he wishes it every child, and that he should form his judgment, after that examination, without going into precise details of how every child, separately, passed through it. And so all through his work. It is a good thing to call his attention to definite points, and to ask him to look at definite points, and then let him make his Report upon those definite points. You will in that way get a more thorough inspection. Then you will require more time, I think, to be given than you have at present allowed for the inspection. At present the inspection is rather hurried, and the judgment exercised upon it becomes very mechanical. I think the Department will have to pay regard to that matter, and to allow the Inspectors more time than they have hitherto allowed them. But I do think that the Rules made for the Inspectors as they now stand are a very great improvement upon the old Rules. I hope, in our desire to set the schools at greater freedom, we shall not put forward a mere loose general command to the Inspectors to report that such a school is a good one, and that another one is not a good school; because I am quite sure that if we do so we shall not do real justice. Whether we should apply the grants to the precise points of the inspection is a disputed matter. But it is a question whether you do not need all this for the large body of teachers, many of whom are distinctly not of the highest powers of body or mind, and are not first-rate teachers, a great many of them requiring to be very closely looked after. It is a matter of question whether you can safely deal with them in any other way than by saying that they shall be paid according to their work. That is a question which admits of some little difference of opinion; but I confess, as things go at present, I think that the Government have gone as far in the direction of setting them free as it would be safe to go. I think it is right to take care that the payments which we make shall be justified by the results we obtain, and that, on the whole, we could not adopt a better mode of obtaining those results than that which is here laid down. There are, however, some things with regard to the grants which I think the Government might do. I confess I do not feel very happy about Article 92, and I wish that we had not in the Code somewhat ambiguous language used, and calling a payment a fixed grant which is not fixed after all, because ambiguous language of that kind is a trouble to managers, and it would be a good thing if when the word "fixed" is used we knew that there would be no variation at all. The noble Viscount the Lord President has explained that where the grant is reduced it will only be in exceptional cases ; but exceptional cases have a tendency to give rise to difficulty, and it would be much better that the language should be clear, in order to prevent any kind of mistake being made in this matter. Then with regard to the subjects which are to be taught, I venture to differ most strongly from the proposal that recitation should not be included. It is very easy to pick out an example of so many lines from Chaucer, and say, "What an absurdity it is to give such a recitation" ; but it depends where you take the lines from Chaucer. There are some lines in Chaucer which you might make children thoroughly understand without any difficulty. But the Code does not limit teachers to Chaucer, and the real requirement is that there shall be recitation of poetry. Amongst the subjects that children like best there are few which have more effect in really elevating and cultivating their minds than the recitation of good poetry. It does a great deal more for them than merely to awaken their intelligence, because it awakens their intelligence in a way which places them altogether higher in the scale of humanity. It is, in fact, like teaching children singing, and it is of the utmost value in schools. It is of the most real importance in its effect. Everything which tends to remove the children in the schools from brutality and grossness, from what lowers man or woman or child in the scale of humanity, and everything which tends to elevate them, is of the utmost value morally, whatever you may say about its value intellectually ; but those who have actually themselves taught in schools will tell you that the intellectual effect of it is very much greater than you would suppose beforehand. I fully admit the value of geography and the value of history ; but I would venture to say, nevertheless, that geography is not as important to these children as the amount of recitation which is required, and that history is distinctly below it in value to them. History belongs altogether to a later period for them, when their age will afford some possibility of their comprehending political movements and the life of a nation, which young children are not able to comprehend at all. With regard to the proposal that we should introduce physical instruction,

I really think that the best provision of that kind for the children is to give them the opportunity of playing at games in the playgrounds ; that to alter the course of the school teaching is not necessary ; and that a good playground for every school would be very much more valuable. There is immense value in the naturalness of children's ordinary sports and games ; and the drill and physical exercises which they now get in school is quite sufficient for the purpose of guiding them and regulating the use of their bodies. If you give them the opportunity of playing among themselves they will guide one another, and strengthen themselves, I believe, more than by any instruction you can give them under a master. The teaching they get in the schools is not, I am afraid, more than is just sufficient at present for their needs ; and if you very largely curtail it for the purpose of getting in physical exercises I think you will lose a great deal more than you will gain. There is one other point with regard to the Code which I wish to bring to the attention of the Government, and that is with reference to the rural schools. The conditions laid down for procuring a proper staff for rural schools will, I think, press rather hardly on a good many of them. I think the Government will have to look particularly to the possibility that the demand for such teachers as will be necessary in order to secure these grants is a demand which it will be very difficult to meet, not because the managers of schools will not try to meet it, but simply because the supply is not sufficient, and I do not think the Educational Department have looked carefully enough at that side of the matter. It would be very hard on the rural schools if they could not obtain the advantages held out to them, not because they are not willing to get better masters, but because the masters do not exist in sufficient numbers. I rejoice to think that the Government have under consideration the propriety of dealing with the question of rates. Many schools are subjected to enormous pressure from this one cause. In some schools, I believe, the rates amount to as much as 4s. a head. That will make a very large hole, indeed, in the grant ; and if there is no other way of providing for them, I think it would be well if the Government would pay the rates on behalf of such schools. I think that would be a very good thing.

*EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, before coming to the question which my noble Friend originally started, I would venture at once, for fear of forgetting it, to say a few words in support of my noble relative's appeal in reference to teachers being armed with something in the shape of authoritative instructions in regard to the punishment they may or may not administer to children. I was very much struck by one case of a teacher who was prosecuted for corporally punishing a boy. There was no question of its being a cruel or excessive punishment. It was simply a case of slight corporal punishment for writing filthy words on the walls of the school and on some of the school books, which had been seen by the Inspector, and which procured a bad report of the school. I would ask your Lordships, could anything be more unjust or more unfair than the position of a teacher who is prevented from punishing, and even punishing pretty severely, a boy guilty of a moral offence which brings disrepute and a bad report upon a school? I hope that in due time some rule, or some sort of authoritative direction, may be furnished to teachers upon the point which I have mentioned. As one of those who objected very much to the Code proposed last year, though I agree with my noble Friend that the present Code is very far from perfect, either in its general outline or in its details, I feel bound to add my acknowledgments to those which have been already expressed for the very great improvement observable in this Code over all its predecessors. In the first place, it has recognised at last the simple truth long proclaimed in vain to the Education Department, that children are not machines, and, therefore, that the same process, regardless of any pains that may be taken by the teacher or even by the child itself, will not produce the same results in the different branches of study. The Department for years insisted that the standard assigned to the child by the Inspector should be that in which it was to be instructed in all its branches of study; and yet the subjects of arithmetic, reading, and writing—the first two making a demand on different mental faculties, the last on manual neatness and dexterity—have nothing in them which would a priori lead anyone to expect that a number of different children, each with his own distinct individual and hereditary mental and physical faculties, would arrive at precisely an equal amount of proficiency in those different branches of study. It seems to me that the relief given to both teachers and children by this Code, in the permission given for the first time to instruct children in different branches of study in the classes properly assigned to them by the masters in proportion to their proficiency or backwardness in such studies, is an enormous boon, and will very greatly facilitate the work of the teachers and the progress of the children. I must venture to say that this is a great justification of some of us who have had the audacity in past times to criticise the Education Department, because, comprising, as it unquestionably did, a number of officials of high culture, of large attainments and experience, and great ability, it yet never seemed to understand much of human nature, and particularly of child nature. Now, in this Code I am sorry to see grammar still holding its place as an object of study for children in the First and Second Standards as well as the Third. If there is any one point more than another on which all the authorities on the successive development of the different mental faculties in children are agreed, it is that the faculties of observation and memory are developed earlier than that of abstract reasoning or of abstract conception; and yet anything more entirely abstract than the rules of grammar can hardly be conceived. And how little the children, taught grammar at a very early age, practically apply, even when grown up, the rules which they have learned and the principles of which have been painfully drilled into them, may be judged by the ungrammatical shouts which one may hear proceeding from the children when let out of school, just after going, perhaps, through a regular course of lessons in grammar and parsing. I do not agree with my noble Friend Lord Meath in deprecating recitation. I believe that familiarity with the works of good authors have a more powerful tendency than any lessons in grammar to improve the vocabulary and the habitual grammatical use of the English language. The noble thoughts of great writers are through life a precious possession for any one who has the privilege of having them stored in his memory. I really believe that in that respect the Code recognises a study which is of great value to children, and thoroughly appreciated by their parents and themselves. I agree with a good deal of what my noble Friend said about physical education, and I think that the right rev. Prelate, who took up some of the points, spoke very reasonably. The fact is, that in towns where children have not to go long distances to and from school, as is the case in many rural districts, they may very advantageously have a larger amount of physical exercise given them in school; but in some cases, particularly with regard to the younger ones, where they have to go, as I know a great many of them do, two miles and more to school, I think it would be inadvisable to impose upon them too much physical exercise in addition. As to the value of drill, there was some remarkable evidence given about its actual money value in the case of workmen—I forget at this moment whether by Sir Joseph Whitworth or by his foreman—to the effect that a man was worth at least 1s. 6d. a week more who had been drilled, because he had not only the will but the power of moving smartly at the word of command; and he particularly dwelt on his experience in his own workshop where sometimes very heavy weights had to be moved. He said that they sometimes preferred moving heavy weights with an almost inadequate number of hands as incurring a lesser risk compared with the danger of being encumbered by the assistance of more men also perfectly willing and anxious to do their best, but incapable from the want of previous drill to move promptly and to promptly stop moving at the word of command. I have repeatedly expressed my opinion both in your Lordships' House and elsewhere that all boys ought to be drilled, from the Duke's son at a public school to the pauper boy in the workhouse. Most remarkable evidence has been given, too, of its benefit in education and its moral effect in establishing the habit of prompt obedience and forming habits of order and method, which are in any walk of life and for any future work of the utmost value. I cannot conclude without once more thanking the noble Lord President for what is certainly a great advance upon the previous Codes; though I hope when the larger questions which are announced for next year are taken up, that, among other recommendations of that very able Commission in its valuable Report, the Government will not forget one, and that is with respect to defining the limits of elementary education and of secondary education, so as not to include as parts of elementary education what my right rev. Friend has very happily described to me as non-elementary education in the shape of German, Latin, and so on, which I think everyone must fairly recognise as branches of secondary and not of primary education.

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I shall beg to be allowed to say a very few words of gratitude to several noble Lords for what has been said this afternoon on behalf of the voluntary schools. I am anxious that the New Code should go to those schools unprejudiced, and not only unprejudiced, but freed from the sense of nervousness which might hang about it from what was done last year. I feel that the explanations which have been given here, as well as much that has passed elsewhere, ought to remove anything of that kind. The New Code comes before us distinctly to secure a higher standard of efficiency, and it is the desire of the voluntary schools to proceed as fast as they possibly can, consistently with safety, along that path. The commencement of voluntary education, and the advances in it up to the time when the Government took the matter in hand, were due to the voluntary schools, and I trust they will never feel that a day has come when they may say that the education demanded is so good that they cannot undertake to give it. The possibility of reaching the higher standard of efficiency seems almost secured by three of the most important branches of the Code. First of all, the greater simplicity of the arrangements, the deliverance of the teachers from a great deal of almost useless clerical work, which bears very hardly upon their time, and the greater freedom given to managers and teachers, will all tend to increased efficiency. No one can have seen much of the interior working of schools without knowing that at present anxieties press very heavily on many teachers on account of the strain after payment by individual results. Not only do they press upon the teachers, but they greatly affect the efficiency of the schools. A good many children have to spend time in practising the goose step, while teachers are trying to bring on feeble children who are not now classified according to their abilities or their acquirements. It is not money only, but reputation that depends on the least satisfactory efforts. All that will now be ended. A second great means of promoting a higher standard of efficiency will be the assistance given to weak schools. Much will depend on the amount of assistance which proves to be obtainable by those schools. Some must be severely hit, but I hope that an amount of help will be given to most of them which will make those schools efficient. There is one point to which I hope the Government will direct their attention. I am not quite clear that weak hamlet schools, of which I have many in my diocese, will be capable of receiving this increased assistance. I have to day received a letter from Canon Wingfield, who is a well-known educational authority. He fears, as I fear, that some hamlet schools at a distance from the central schools will not receive the grants at all. If I understand Clauses 104 and 105 correctly, they intend to provide for grants to all schools of that kind, but the wording seems not to include cases in which over the border, but within two miles, there is a population. Canon Wingfield says he speaks feelingly on this matter, because he has some in his own parish and others near him; that many with a rich squire and small parish and not many difficulties will get the extra £10 or £15, but that they who have to keep up a struggling school in a remote hamlet with 100 or 200 people near it in the next parish, cannot get the help. If the hamlet having, say, 400 children, were a separate small parish, it would be well cared for, but under the clause, as it stands, I cannot say that that will always be so. That is a detail of importance

if it operates widely, and I hope that attention will be directed to it. Thirdly, the efficiency of the schools will, undoubtedly, be promoted by the requirement that discipline and moral training are to be looked to and reported upon. Of course, they have a paramount value of their own. The whole work and object of a school is really to turn out good young citizens well disciplined and trained morally; but beyond that they will have a strong reflex action upon the intellectual training of the schools, and I am sure that the Inspector who has time to observe will be able to form a very distinct opinion as to the moral tone and order of the schools. Experienced in educational matters, as they are in the highest degree, they will not walk about, talk to managers and teachers, and observe the children, without being able to send the Department a very distinct Report on those points, and I believe it, therefore, to be a provision of the highest value. Perhaps enough has been said upon the subject of recitation, but I happen to be just fresh from the subject, because, on my way here, I paid a visit to a Board school where there are 1,400 children, and as I passed quickly through one of the class-rooms the teacher said the children would be much disappointed if I did not hear their recitation. I stayed, therefore, and heard 30 or 40 lines, which were about a fourth or fifth of what is required. They were not lines from Chaucer, as my noble Friend said, but they related the history of a quarrel between a needle and a pin, out of which an extremely good moral was drawn. I had sufficient time to observe the children, and I can say that, apparently, nothing could have given them more pleasure, and that they entered into the spirit as well as the words of the story. I do not think it can be said the time occupied in that recitation was wasted. My Lords, those seem to me to be the three great broad branches of improvement by which an increased standard of efficiency may be reached, and certainly I believe it will. On the other hand, the cost of the school teaching will be increased. As the voluntary schools have spent magnificent sums in the past, I believe they will rise to the occasion now. They have never wished to stint in doing what they could hitherto, and they must keep the lead which fairly belongs to them in the judgment of fair students of the history of education. They must do their best with that aim, nor do I believe they will be unwilling to pay more for a better product. There will be considerable difficulty at first with regard to the staff required to be employed for the larger curriculum, and to the higher qualifications required in the teachers all round. But I cannot but believe that the Department will be merciful in recognising the difficulties which my right reverend Brother has stated arising from the fact that the present supply of trained teachers is inadequate. Markets, however, have a way of supplying demands and filling up deficiencies, and I believe that, before the end of the year, we shall see a great development in that respect. There are, I am perfectly assured, abundant reasons why the question of the full amount of the grant being received, and the rating question have been postponed for the present. That it will come under consideration when it is possible I have no doubt. It is only fair to the schools that the limitation of the 17s. 6d. grant should be removed; and it seems a simple matter of justice that if one set of schools is supplied with money to pay its rates, the voluntary schools which run with them should not have to find the rates in addition to what they volunteer. I hope that the voluntary schools will enter upon this New Code with gratitude and a good heart.

LORD LINGEN: I will detain the House for a very few minutes, for I have but very few observations to make upon the subject of debate. I do not propose to enter at all upon the contents of the Code, but merely to touch upon the machinery by which this, like every other Code, must be carried into effect. There has been no difference of opinion expressed in this Debate, but we are all agreed that the State must be informed and satisfied, by its own responsible officers, of the efficiency and character of each school to which public aid is extended, and in this respect we must consider, not merely the school, but the scholars. I would venture to point out to the House that when we speak of the schools we must not exclude the scholars from our consideration. For myself I believe that, prior to 1860, the best voluntary schools were far too few, no doubt, to make a due impression upon the country, but still, so far as those schools went, in their tone, discipline, and all that could favourably impress an Inspector or visitor, they ranked, and deservedly ranked, very high. But the Duke of Newcastle's Commission undoubtedly brought to light a state of things which had been somewhat overlooked in the previous years, namely, that, even in the best of those schools, instruction was very imperfectly diffused among the scholars generally. I would impress upon your Lordships that the great reason and justification why the State, at vast expenditure, should have interfered with the thorny subject of education was the importance to the State that the bulk of its people should receive those elements of education which would enable them to deal satisfactorily with their own problems of life, and will not be secured by inspection simply; this object can only be secured by some system of examination, though not necessarily the examination of every individual child, but I do say that unless examination forms a substantial part of the official supervision in every school the political reasons for interfering with schools at all will not be answered. Examinations should, at any rate, be a substantial part of every system of inspection. Unless this is done there will be no adequate security that the object which the State has in view will be carried out. I do not think that full justice has been done to the revised Code of 1860 in this respect. That Code is often spoken of as if its object had been to confine the education of children in elementary schools to those subjects which are popularly known as "the three R's." But if any one will refer to the documents of that time, which is now somewhat distant, he will find that that charge is not well founded. The instructions to the Inspectors under that Code show that as much distinction was drawn then between inspection and examination as has been insisted on by the Lord President this evening. That Code was framed with a view of securing that, whatever else was taught in the schools, the bulk of the children should be able to read with such ease and intelligence as would encourage them to read in after life, to write and spell sufficiently well to be able to write a letter to their own family, or to their employers on business, and to know enough arithmetic to be able to keep common accounts, such as items of expenditure, quantities of goods, receipts, or wages—that, however simple the accounts they might keep might be, they should be able to do that much at all events. The object of that Code was to secure that the elements of education were carried away by every one of the children from the elementary schools. Judging by the speech of the Lord President, such appeared to be his intention also in regard to the present Code. I do not think, after listening to his speech this evening that he has any other intention. Very different language was used in “another place” the other evening, and I am exceedingly glad to find that it has met with no echo in this House. I do not, however, pretend to believe that this Code, however carefully it may be revised, contains the final settlement of the education question, or that that settlement will come next year, or perhaps even the year after. In the meantime, it is of the utmost importance to see what the scope of this Code will be; and I venture to insist that, however valuable inspection may be as a test of the character of the education, it ought to have side by side with it a system of examination of the scholars which will prove, not only that the means of education have been afforded, but that the scholars have been so guided as to be able to take advantage of those means.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, the only point I wish to refer to is the question of drill in education. I sympathise most thoroughly with my noble Friend's remarks upon the importance of that subject, especially in towns. In towns it ought, I think, to be made compulsory. As regards the value of drill to children in schools, and in their work in after-life, had it not been that my noble Friend has anticipated me, I should myself have referred to the testimony given by Sir Joseph Whitworth upon that point. Many years ago I heard the opinion expressed by Sir Joseph Whitworth which my noble Friend has stated to your Lordships as to the increased value given to labour by previous drill. I may be allowed, perhaps, to say that as my noble Friend did not like to trouble your Lordships with too many details, he is anxious that I should give your Lordships some figures from a paper he has handed to me affording statistics of the drill and gymnastic training given to 12 boys in the Much Wenlock National School, from August 21st, 1871, to February 21st, 1872. Of the 12 boys drilled six were put under simple drill, and the other six were drilled in connection with gymnastic training for six months. The result was that those who were simply drilled were greatly improved in appearance, and their chest measurements were augmented half-an-inch; but where the drill was combined with gymnastics their chest measurements had increased some two inches in the same time.

OPEN SPACES BILL.—(No. 76.)

House in Committee (on re-commitment) (according to order).

*THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, in Clause 3 the Irish Office have drafted a few words which they desire should be inserted in line 5, page 2, after “England and Wales.” The words are “as respects Ireland, the Commissioners and Trustees of Charitable Donations and Bequests in Ireland.” The alteration is only for the purpose of extending the operation of the clause to Ireland, inasmuch as the Charity Commissioners have no jurisdiction in that country.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I presume the noble Lord has consulted those Members of the Committee who are interested in Ireland, and that he has obtained their consent to the insertion of words applying the clause to Ireland. I think we ought to have the whole clause read. I fully expect to find that it is quite satisfactory. It was understood in the Committee that some clause of this kind would be moved; but as no notice has been given of it, I think it would be better for the clause to be read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I think there is a little misapprehension about the nature of this clause. The Bill extends to Ireland already. It was pointed out in the Committee that there was no such body as that which is referred to in the Bill as being the guiding authority in Ireland; and the noble Lord who has charge of the Bill was recommended to find out who were the corresponding authorities in Ireland, and when he had obtained the necessary information from the Irish Office the name of the proper body to be inserted should be substituted. In substance, I think the noble Lord has exactly carried out that request.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Entirely.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I merely wish to say, before we part with the Bill, that I think my noble Friend will have to look through it before another stage is reached, because I feel certain that other words will be required to make it right. The clause which has been referred to is perfectly right, but I think it will require the addition of further words.

QUESTIONS.

THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF INDIA.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to give notice that on Thursday next I intend to present a Petition from inhabitants of Jessore, in the Presidency of Bengal, complaining of a present personal grievance, in regard to which they say there is urgent necessity for providing an immediate remedy. As the Under Secretary for India, in answer to a question from me, refused to make inquiry into this grievance, I shall, in pursuance of the Standing Order No. 80, move the House to discuss forthwith the matter contained in such Petition.

Subsequently,

MR. BRADLAUGH said: I wish to put a question to the First Lord of the Treasury in reference to the Order which stands number 3 on the Paper to-night (Indian Councils Bill). I wish to know whether it is likely to be taken before Whitsuntide?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I should like to take it before Whitsuntide, if possible, but I am afraid that it will not be possible.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Will the right hon. Gentleman say that it will not be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid that will be so.

THE INDIAN FACTORY ACT.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, inasmuch as the Indian Factory Act does not apply to the Native States, he will consider the advisability of urging upon their rulers the necessity of introducing legislation for the protection of women and children employed in the manufactories of those States, and who now work from dawn to sunset?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The policy of the Indian Government is to interfere as little as possible in the internal affairs of Native States, so long as the rulers govern justly. But the Secretary of State will bring this question to the notice of the Government of India, with a view to their advising Native States containing factories to follow the Factory Legislation of British India.

POSTAGE RATES TO INDIA AND AUSTRALIA.

Mr. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the estimated loss to the Revenue by the reduction of the postage rates to Australia and to India from 6d. and 5d. to 2½d. in each case; what is the estimated additional loss to the Revenue if the postage rates to Australia and to India were reduced from 2½d. to 1d.; and what is the further estimated loss if the postage rates to all the colonies and to India were reduced to 1d.?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): The additional loss over and above that now incurred which will result from reducing the postages on letters sent from this country to India and Australia to 2½d. is estimated at £88,400 a year. A further loss of £42,000 a year would be the result of making the rate 1d. instead of 2½d. And a still further loss of £50,000 would follow a reduction of postage rates to all the colonies and India to 1d. The hon. Member will see that the total of these reductions by bringing the rate down to 1d. generally would come to £180,400.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING IN BELGRAVIA.

Mr. LEVESON GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board of Trade has rejected the application of the Vestry of St. George's, Hanover Square, for the admission of electric current for the purpose of lighting, which is now available close to the western boundary of Belgravia, and is being generally used in the adjoining streets; whether he is aware that numerous residents in Belgravia have urged the Vestry to take action in the matter, in consequence of the two Electric Light Companies to whom Provisional Orders were granted last year having made no apparent progress in Belgravia; and whether there is any valid reason why the Vestry, who are bound to meet the requirements of the ratepayers, should not be allowed to obtain a supply from a third company, which is in a position to furnish it without further delay?

Sir J. Gorst

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have been urged by the Vestry of St. George, Hanover Square, to grant a Provisional Order allowing a third company to supply electrical energy in the parish, in addition to the two companies already possessing such powers. I am not, however, prepared to interfere with the arrangements made in the Metropolis last year, after prolonged inquiry, until the companies to whom powers were then granted have been allowed a reasonable time for proving their ability to discharge their obligations, this arrangement was supported by the London County Council. I have, however, informed the companies in question, whose applications, I may state, were last year supported by the Local Authority, that I should not be disposed to adopt this course another year unless they can then prove that they are in a position to supply energy in the district.

OFFICERS' PENSIONS.

Mr. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, as it appears from the statement in the United Service Gazette of April last, that a mistake occurred in the actuarial calculations to fix the pension of one officer, at least, why is not each officer informed of the data upon which the calculations are made in his own case?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The hon. Member has been already informed why these Actuarial Reports cannot be published. As the mistake referred to in the newspaper did not occur the present question falls to the ground.

CRIME IN ARBROATH.

Mr. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he can state the number of persons apprehended or cited for crimes and offences in the burgh of Arbroath during the years 1887, 1888, and 1889, and at what hours the public houses were closed during those years?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I am informed that, in the three years named, there were 597, 527, and 495 apprehensions, and that up to Whit Sunday, 1888, the closing hour was 11; since then it has been 10 o'clock.

THE WARWICK BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that in May, 1889, Mr. Joseph Broadfoot, of Barford, near Warwick, who was then one of the overseers of that parish, sent in his name to the clerk to the Warwick Board of Guardians, applying for the post of assistant overseer and collector of Poor Rates; that the clerk replied (in conformity with the provisions of the 29 and 30 Vic. c. 113, s. 10), that Mr. Broadfoot, being an overseer, was not legally eligible for the post for which he applied; and that on the 3rd of May, 1890, Mr. Thomas Sheasby, one of the overseers of Barford, was elected collector of Poor Rates by the Warwick Board of Guardians, subject to the approval of the Local Government Board, notwithstanding that the clerk advised the Board that Mr. Sheasby was not legally eligible; and whether the election of Mr. Sheasby has been brought under the notice of the Local Government Board; and, if so, what action the Board have taken, or propose to take?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have no information as to the facts with regard to Mr. Broadfoot. The appointment of Mr. Sheasby has been reported to the Local Government Board by the Guardians of the Warwick Union, and the Board have informed the Guardians that they are advised that a person who holds the office of Overseer of the Poor cannot legally be appointed as Collector of Poor Rates for the same parish, the two offices being incompatible.

WORKING HOURS IN COLLIERIES.

MR. HOWORTH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that, while the adult colliers in the North of England, notably in the counties of Northumberland and Durham, have, by combination, secured for themselves a working day of from seven to eight hours, the boys under 14 who work with them have to work from 10 to 11 hours a day; and whether he will introduce any legislation to put an end to this state of things?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Inspectors of the two districts referred to (Northumberland and Durham) that the coal mines in those districts have always been, and still are, worked by two shifts of men and one shift of boys daily. The hours for boys have been shortened by the Acts of 1872 and 1887, and are now limited to 10 hours in any one day, and to 54 hours in the week. The hours of the men before those Acts and since have usually been eight hours' shifts, and are now in some cases reduced to seven hours. The boys, however, do not work at the face with the men. Their employment is to bring away the coal from the face to the pit bottom; it is not physically severe, and is not nearly so laborious as that of the men, who work shorter hours. I am informed that to shorten the hours of the boys by working them in two shifts would cause dissatisfaction.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

SIR JOHN KINLOCH (Perth, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Government will consider the expediency of allowing the importation of store cattle into this country from the State of Virginia, a State which has always been free from pleuro-pneumonia, and situated many hundred miles distant from infected districts, seeing also that the cattle can be shipped from that State for Great Britain without touching the soil of any other State?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I am informed that the statement that Virginia has always been free from pleuro-pneumonia, and that it is situated many hundred miles distant from infected districts, is inaccurate in both respects. The Report of the American Department of Agriculture for 1885 records the introduction of pleuro-pneumonia into Virginia in the summer of that year, and the Report of the American Department of Agriculture for 1887 and 1888 refers to another outbreak at the end of 1887. So lately as March 23 of the present year, a cargo of animals, in which pleuro-pneumonia existed, arrived at Deptford from Baltimore, Baltimore being, I believe, less than 50 miles from the State of Virginia. In view of these circumstances, and of the fact that the Government are now prosecuting a measure for the special purpose of trying to extirpate pleuro-pneumonia in this country, it would seem to me most unwise to admit store cattle, as suggested by the hon. Member.

ROAD REPAIR IN SCOTLAND.

MR. ASQUITH (Fife, E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the proceedings and resolutions of a Conference of Representatives of Police Burghs, held at Glasgow on the 16th April last, on the subject of the management and repair of roads and streets; whether it is a fact that there are 88 Police Burghs in Scotland which are subject to the county road assessment, but in which the larger part of the roads and streets is not maintained or repaired by the County Road Authority; whether, in the case of many of these burghs, the sum raised by the county road assessment is much in excess of the expenditure incurred by the County Road Authority upon the highways within the burghs; and whether, having regard to the gravity and extent of the injustice inflicted upon ratepayers in police burghs by the present state of the law, Her Majesty's Government is prepared to take any, and what, steps to give effect to the resolutions of the Conference, or otherwise to remove the grievance complained of?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I must refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on the 28th of last month, to a question on the same subject. I observe, also, that the hon. Member for North Ayrshire has introduced a Bill dealing with the subject, which will in this way be brought under the consideration of Parliament.

SHANGHAI—THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ORDINANCE.

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a Contagious Diseases Ordinance exists in Shanghai; and, if so, whether he will lay it upon the Table of the House; whether it is the case that cards are given to the registered women, which are practically a licence by the Municipal Authority; whether girls under 15 years of age are registered as prostitutes; and whether, if the names of some such girls alleged to be under 15 years of age be given to him, he will cause inquiry into the truth of the allegation?

Mr. Chaplin

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR J. FER-GUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Shanghai is a Chinese city, and Her Majesty's Government are not responsible for the police regulations. The regulations for the management of the foreign settlements at Shanghai were agreed upon by the British, French, and American Consuls in 1866, confirmed by the Ministers of those countries at Peking, and approved by Order in Council. They contain no Contagious Diseases Ordinance.

HONG KONG—CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ORDINANCE.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, having regard to the fact that it took two years to pass the Contagious Diseases Ordinance of 1889, first ordered by the Secretary of State to be passed by the Hong Kong Legislature in his Despatch of 2nd July, 1887, repealing the system of compulsory examination of prostitutes then in force in that colony, he will take steps to secure that the Ordinance proposed for the amendment of the Ordinance of 1889 will be more expeditiously dealt with by the Colonial Legislature?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (BARON H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): A similar question was put to me on Friday last by the hon. Member for Scarborough, and I beg to refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply which I then gave.

CHORLTON-CUM-HARDY.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the population of Chorlton-cum-Hardy, which in 1881 was 2,332, is now about 6,000; whether the only public elementary school in the township is a national school with accommodation for 364 children; and whether the Education Department will at once take the necessary steps to secure the provision of sufficient school accommodation, in accordance with the Education Acts?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DIKE, Kent, Dartford): The population is now 4,500. The increase is, I am informed, due to the influx of a large class whose children either do not attend public elementary schools or go into Manchester to the Higher Grade Schools. There is no pressure upon the space afforded by the National Schools, and I have no reason to believe that there is any deficiency of accommodation, but if any new facts are brought under the Department's notice, the proper steps will be taken.

METROPOLITAN POLICE RATE.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in event of the assignment of an annual sum of £150,000 to the Receiver of the Metropolitan Police District, in aid of the Police Superannuation Fund for the Metropolitan Police Force, this sum will be in addition to the sum equal to a 9d. rate on the Metropolis at present authorised to be spent for the maintenance of the Metropolitan Police, or whether it will go to the reduction of that rate?

MR. MATTHEWS: As the hon. Member is aware, the Police Fund, made up by the 9d. rate, is liable to make good any deficiencies in the Superannuation Fund, and, therefore, a Government contribution of £150,000 towards superannuation will reduce the liabilities of the Police Fund by that amount. Whether any reduction of the rate will be possible must, however, depend on the income and expenditure on the one hand of the Police Fund, and on the other of the Superannuation Fund. Looking to the recent necessary increase of the Metropolitan force, I see no prospect at present of reducing the rate below 9d.

MR. STUART: I beg to give notice that when the Bill under which this sum is to be voted comes on for consideration I shall move that the £150,000 be applied towards the reduction of the rate.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): When will the Police Superannuation Bill be introduced?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid I cannot fix a day, but I shall lose no time in bringing the measure before the House.

SECOND DIVISION CLERKS.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is to be understood that Heads of Departments can recommend to the Treasury meritorious writers, who are performing work of a higher order than mere copying, for appointment to a special class of an order lower than that of the Second Division; and, if so, will the Treasury, after due deliberation, give effect to such recommendation?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am afraid that I cannot add to the answer which I gave to a somewhat similar question on Thursday last.

H.M.S. SULTAN.

VISCOUNT CURZON (Bucks, Wycombe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state what was the total amount paid to the salvors of the Sultan, the total cost incurred in navigating the Sultan to England, and the estimated cost for repairing and refitting that vessel.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The total amount paid to the salvors of the Sultan was £50,000, besides the sum of £5,036, paid for the hire of salvage steamers during the first unsuccessful attempt to raise the vessel. The cost of repairing the Sultan, so as to enable her to come home, was estimated at £10,000, and the total cost of navigating her to England was, roughly, £1,000. No estimate has yet been made of the cost of repairing and refitting the Sultan for service, as that has been postponed until the re-engining and re-armament of the vessel can be combined with the repairs of the hull.

THE SCOTCH COURT OF SESSIONS.

*MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, in view of the unusually large number of cases in both the First and Second Divisions of the Court of Session waiting hearing in the summer Session, and of the large accumulation of business in the Outer House, so that new cases brought in be-between May and July have no prospect of being heard till the winter sittings, any arrangements are in contemplation for obviating, in future, the inconvenience to suitors caused by such delays?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I understand that a representation on the matter referred to has been made to the President of the Court of Session, who informed the Memorialists that the subject would receive consideration when the Court met after the spring vacation. I may add that the sittings commence to-morrow.

THE WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, considering that for many important reasons it is advisable to expedite the consideration of the Western Australia Constitution Bill in its stages, he can now state at what date the printing and circulation of the evidence taken by the Select Committee will be completed; and when the next stage of the Bill can be taken?

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): May I ask the Under Secretary of State when the evidence taken before the Select Committee on the Western Australia Constitution Bill will be in the hands of Members?

BARON H. DE WORMS: In reply to my hon. Friend (Sir G. Baden-Powell), and also to the question standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for the Oswestry Division of Shropshire (Mr. S. Leighton), I am informed that the evidence will be in Members' hands about Tuesday week, the 20th instant. In answer to the concluding part of my hon. Friend's question, I can only refer him to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury on Thursday last.

3RD BRIGADE WELSH ROYAL ARTILLERY.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the training of the 3rd Brigade Welsh Division Royal Artillery, (lately the Royal Carmarthen Militia), has recently been suddenly changed from Carmarthen to Fort Popton; whether he will state the reason for such sudden change; and whether it is proposed to conduct the training in future at Carmarthen as heretofore?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: As the Royal Carmarthen Militia is a corps of Artillery, whose duties, if embodied, would be with heavy artillery, it is essential that the corps should, from time to time, be trained where such guns can be used, which is not the case at Carmarthen. It is not, however, proposed to entirely discontinue training at Carmarthen, although the ground there is not suitable for camping.

EQUIPMENT OF VOLUNTEERS.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what steps, if any, the Government propose to take to give practical effect to the Vote of this House of the 13th March last, declaring that the necessary equipment required to make the volunteers effective for service, in case of emergency, should be provided at the public expense; and what expectations he can hold out of those steps being taken at an early date?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have very carefully considered the best means of meeting the obligation under which we have come to provide certain necessary equipments for the Volunteer Force. I do not think it is necessary to make any provision for the equipment of the Metropolitan Volunteers, as the fund raised by the patriotic exertions of Sir James Whitehead has been sufficient to meet their case, and I put aside for separate treatment the case of the great-coats. But as regards all the other articles of equipment mentioned in Class I. of the Adjutant-General's Circular, and referred to in the Resolution adopted by this House, we propose to proceed as follows:—I think it would be exceedingly unfair to those corps who have actually equipped themselves completely, like that of Colonel Rocca, at Manchester, that their prudent administration of their funds should result in their getting no share of the grant. Accordingly, I propose to issue to all Infantry Volunteers outside the Metropolitan District either the necessary equipment, or else its estimated value, which is 12s. per man. To Artillery Volunteers, who do not require the whole equipment, the sum will only be 5s. In order to ensure the proper expenditure of these sums, a condition of the issue of the Capitation Grant will in future be that these stores must be found serviceable on inspection. The responsibility of maintaining them in an efficient state will rest absolutely with the Volunteers; but I shall be prepared to consider with the Treasury, before next year's Estimates, whether an additional annual grant of 1s. should not be made for this purpose. No other change will be made in the grant. But the whole future position of the Volunteer Force, in respect of equipment, has also been reconsidered; and the Government are prepared to bear the initial cost of all equipments, other than clothing, for any new corps or additional companies which may be formed. We hope in this way to settle the equipment question once for all. Greatcoats stand on a different footing; as a grant of 2s. is already paid for every greatcoat produced on inspection. And, in my opinion, there ought to have been no substantial difficulty in obtaining them. But it must be remembered that the use of these greatcoats is in many corps not limited to Volunteer occasions, but they are constantly worn in civil life. Accordingly, we propose to adhere to the system of grants, except that to all corps not now possessing greatcoats we shall be ready to issue them, suspending, of course, the 2s. grant to those corps till their value is repaid. The matter is of such general interest that the House will forgive the length of this reply. May I add a word as to the funds which have been, in certain counties and boroughs, raised or promised for the purposes of Volunteer equipment. Admitting that every case must be decided on its own merits, I hope that in all cases where Volunteer corps are still in debt, or are incurring special expenses for ranges or for drill halls, intending subscribers will be patriotic enough to allow their subscriptions to be applied to the relief of the funds of their local corps, so as, whenever possible, to put them on a sound financial basis.

CUSTOMS' OUTDOOR DEPARTMENT.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the following Circular has been issued by the Board of Customs:—

"Secretary, Customs,
No. 32,551, 1889.

Custom House, London,
25 Oct., 1889.

Return of Ages and Capacities.

The collectors and superintendents at the outports, and the inspector of the Outdoor Department in London, are directed to insert in their next Return of Ages and Capacities (i.e., for the current year only), against the names of all officers of the Outdoor Department under the rank of surveyor, the place of their birth, and the place of their residence during the three years immediately preceding their entry into the service.

By Order,

and, if so, for what purposes these inquiries are instituted?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Yes, the Circular was issued. Its object was to enable the Board to make arrangements in the interest of the Revenue, for stationing the officers at ports at which they would not be likely to have friends engaged in the shipping trade.

SHERIFF CLERK OF AYRSHIRE.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he can give an assurance that when the sheriff clerkship of Ayrshire is filled up the rule will be adhered to that the sheriff clerk is to be debarred from engaging in private practice?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: As I stated a few days ago, in recent appointments to office, similar to the one referred to in the question, the holder has been restricted from engaging in private practice. I do not at present see any reason to expect that exception will be made in this case, but the question of what salary is to be attached to the office is still under consideration.

PUBLIC HOUSE LICENCES.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board what is to become ultimately of the funds which will stand to the credit of a county whose County Council may refuse to expend them in paying compensation for the extinction of public house licences under the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill?

*MR. RITCHIE: The fund will remain to the credit of the county, until Parliament has decided that it shall be otherwise employed.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, upon consideration, he is now willing to grant a Return showing (a) the situation or address of each fully licensed house in the various licensing areas; (b) the name of the owner; (c) the name of the ostensible licensee?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Such a Return could be furnished, but it would involve very great labour, great expense, and a considerable amount of trouble.

AUSTRALIAN POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any loss to the Revenue is traceable to the Postal Service to Australia?

*MR. RAIKES: There is at present an estimated loss of £78,000 a year upon the Postal Service from this country to Australia.

"MITCHELL v. REGINA."

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Attorney General why the Crown has demanded costs against the suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina" (a test case), under Petition of Right Act, when he, by giving fiat, evidently considered that the suppliant had a fair case; and why costs have been pressed against suppliant in the same case, when it has been expressly stated, in the case of the "Crown v. the County Council," that the Crown did not ask for costs?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that the granting of a fiat in a Petition of Right has no bearing whatever upon the question of costs. The fiat is given where the Petition discloses prima facie grounds for relief. The question of costs is controlled by the Petition of Right Act. The case of the Yorkshire County Council, to which I presume the hon. Member refers, is of an entirely different character, and was a case stated to determine a question of law under Section 29 of the Local Government Act.

TELEGRAPH CABLES IN SCOTLAND.

MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the telegraph cables between Mossbank and Ulsta, and between Yell and Uist, in Shetland, have both been broken for some time, thereby causing much inconvenience; and whether he will have these cables repaired without delay, as the fishermen in the North Isles are now placed at great disadvantage, and owing to the spring fishing having begun, it is specially important that these cables should be in working order as soon as possible?

*MR. RAIKES: The cable ship of the Post Office has had to go into dock for certain necessary repairs, but I trust she will be able to proceed to the Shetlands next week. No time shall be lost in restoring telegraphic communication between the islands mentioned by the hon. Member.

THE MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Attorney General if, having regard to the view he expressed last Session that offences against "The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887," come without fresh legislation under the provisions of "The Prosecution of Offences Act, 1879," he will authorise the Director of Public Prosecutions to take legal charge of any special case brought by a responsible body under his cognisance, in which the ends of justice and of commercial morality are otherwise likely to be defeated either from lack of funds or other causes?

SIR R. WEBSTER: In reply to my hon. and learned Friend, it is not possible for me to give a general undertaking of the kind indicated in his question. The conditions under which prosecutions are undertaken by the Public Prosecutor are prescribed by Acts of Parliament and the rules made thereunder. If a case is one in which a prosecution is required in the public interest I should certainly consider the question of giving directions for the Director of Public Prosecutions to undertake it; but every case must depend upon the particular circumstance.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now fix a date for the Second Reading of the Employers' Liability Bill; and, if not, whether he will definitely postpone the Bill till after Whitsuntide?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Bill cannot be taken before Whitsuntide.

RIGHTS OF WAY (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will assent to the Second Reading of the Rights of Way (Scotland) Bill, the object of which is to carry into legislation the Resolution of the House passed on 18th March?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There are two Bills now before the House dealing with this subject. The Government approve, and will be prepared to support, that of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Sir C. Dalrymple). Looking at the present state of public business, I am unable to offer any facilities for the discussion of the measure.

IRELAND—THE LATE DR. CROSS.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland what verdict, if any, has been returned by the Coroner's Jury in the case of Dr. Cross, alleged to have been hanged in Cork Gaol about two years ago for poisoning his wife?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): The General Prisons Board report that the convict Dr. Cross was executed within the precincts of Cork Prison on January 10, 1888. On the same morning an inquest was held by the coroner in the usual manner. No verdict, however, was returned by the jury, the coroner having declined to close the inquest without the production of the executioner.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask if the death of the criminal has been registered?

*MR. MADDEN: I rather think so, under the provisions of the Act; but if the hon. Member will repeat the question I will answer it.

MR. SEXTON: Could the death be legally registered, except upon the certificate of the jury?

*MR. MADDEN: I believe that it could under the provisions of the Act, but I do not like to give a positive answer without referring to the Act.

MR. SEXTON: I will repeat the question to-morrow.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): Some of my constituents do not believe that Dr. Cross was hanged at all.

IRISH LAND BILL.

MR. H. VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if the purchasers of land under the Land Purchase Bill will be granted a clean title from the Crown, all previous documents being withdrawn; and if the holdings will be subsequently transferable by a system of registration similar to that in force in Australia under the Torrens Act?

*MR. MADDEN: The effect of the provisions in the Land Purchase Bill as to the operation of the vesting order, and in regard to the redemption of head rents, is to place the purchasing tenant in the same position, substantially if not technically, as if he held under grant from the Crown. I have long been of opinion that a system of registration such as that indicated in the second paragraph of the question is a necessary adjunct to any general system of peasant proprietorship, and I have devoted a good deal of time to the preparation of a Bill providing for Ireland a cheap and readily accessible system of local registration of titles. I introduced this Bill late last Session, with a view to having its provisions discussed and criticised by those who are interested in the subject, and I am now engaged in embodying in the Bill of last Session some valuable suggestions which I have received. I shall be able to re-introduce the Bill in a few days; and I hope that I shall have the assistance of hon. Members on both sides of the House in carrying out what I regard as a practical reform of considerable importance.

POOR REMOVAL.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that between 15 and 20 per cent. of the inmates of Stranorlar Union in Donegal have been removed from Great Britain to that Union, although some of them had actually been born, or had spent most of their lives, in the former country?

*MR. MADDEN: From the Report received from the clerk of the Stranorlar Union it appears that there are at present 63 inmates in the workhouse, and that of these there are nine who have been removed from Great Britain; also that it is alleged that the circumstances connected with these nine cases are as indicated in the concluding portion of the question.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that the wife of James M'Cormick, with their children, two of whom were born in Glasgow, were last month sent, under a Scotch removal warrant, to Stranorlar Union Workhouse, although the father was, and was known to the Scotch Poor Law Authorities to be, in good employment at steel works at Rotherham, in England?

*MR. MADDEN: The removal of the woman referred to, and her three children, was made under a warrant dated 24th December last, she having been deserted by her husband six weeks before the removal took place. There is no information to show whether the Scotch Poor Law Authorities were aware that the husband was employed in England. He has, however, since been arrested at the instance of the Stranorlar Board of Guardians, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment for not maintaining his family.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the existing anomaly in the law relating to removal of the poor between Great Britain and Ireland; and whether he proposes to take any, and what, steps to relieve the Irish Unions of the burden now thrown upon them?

*MR. MADDEN: My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary is aware of the grievance referred to; but fears that he can add nothing to his reply to a similar question put by the hon. Member for South Londonderry on 22nd March, 1889.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

CHARGE AGAINST THE POLICE IN DONEGAL.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, about the end of 1886, Bridget M'Ginley, tenant of a farm at Meenacladdy, County Donegal, let her dwelling-house to the police, under an agreement by which occupancy was to terminate on three months' notice in writing by either party; whether J. S. Milling, County Inspector of Constabulary, gave such notice in writing on the 15th of January last to Mrs. Bridget M'Ginley that he would attend at the house on the 30th of April, at noon, to pay her the rent payable up to that day, and to quit and give up possession; whether Mrs. M'Ginley accordingly attended there on the day and at the hour appointed for the purpose stated, but, after waiting a considerable time, was told by District Inspector Hill to leave the place, and whether, when she refused to "leave her own house," retired to an inner room and closed the door, District Inspector Hill, Sergeant James Maher, Constable Stephen Duffy, and Constable Patrick Burke, first tried to break in the door by using a barrack form as a battering-ram, and then broke down a partition, dragged Mrs. M'Ginley into the kitchen, kicked her, and eventually threw her outside the door of the house in a fainting condition; whether Mrs. M'Ginley has since been ill, and attended by a doctor and priest; whether the police had removed their furniture and effects before the attack on Mrs. M'Ginley, and, after it, evacuated the house; whether the rent due to Mrs. M'Ginley, and which the County Inspector, by his notice, promised to pay on the day in question, is still unpaid; and what the Irish Executive have done with reference to the case?

*MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that the facts are as stated in the first paragraph; but that Mrs. M'Ginley's interest having been evicted in October, 1889, a copy of the notice of surrender served by them on the landlord's agent was merely sent to her as a matter of precaution in the event of her setting up any claim to the premises. Mrs. Ginley did refuse to leave the premises, and was removed by the police without using any unnecessary force. She was neither kicked nor thrown out, as alleged in the question. The police have no evidence as to the alleged illness of the woman. The police had removed their furniture. The rent was paid to the landlord's agent, and the premises were also legally handed over to him.

MR. SLATTERY AND MR. T. BARRY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. John Slattery, T.C., President of the South of Ireland Cattle Trade Association, and Mr. Thomas Barry, Poor Law Guardian, at present bail prisoners in Cork Gaol, are required to receive visits in what is known as "the cage," the place used by convicted criminals; whether bail prisoners, like first-class misdemeanants, are entitled to see their friends in a different sort of reception room; and, if so, why the gentlemen named are differently treated; and will he order that they are provided with a suitable place to see their visitors?

MR. MADDEN: As already stated in reply to previous questions, the bail prisoners mentioned receive their visitors in the ordinary visiting room, which is a comfortable one in all respects. The General Prisons Board report that neither untried nor bail prisoners are entitled, under the rules, to the privilege enjoyed by first-class misdemeanants referred to in the second paragraph. As regards the inquiry in the last paragraph, the matter is one exclusively for the Prisons Board, who must be guided by their Rules.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the fact that the Chief Secretary, in answer to a question on this subject last August, stated that all bail prisoners under the Crimes Act would be treated as first-class misdemeanants?

MR. MADDEN: I am not aware that he made that statement.

DR. TANNER: I must correct the statement. What the right hon. Gentleman said was the bail prisoners would be better treated than first-class misdemeanants.

MR. MADDEN: I believe that in some respects they are.

DR. TANNER: Has Mr. John Slattery been treated in the same manner that I was when I was a bail prisoner last year?

MR. MADDEN: The prison officials must be guided by the rules laid down, which rules are prescribed by the Prisons Board.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL POSTAL SERVICES.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether by far the greater proportion of the loss to the Revenue of £254,000 per annum on the Foreign and Colonial Postal Services is due to the East and West Indian Packet Services; and whether, down to the year 1858, this portion of the loss to the Revenue was charged upon the Admiralty Vote?

*MR. RAIKES: The loss of £254,000 per annum, referred to in my recent answer to the hon. Member for Huddersfield, is upon the Colonial Packet Service only, not upon the Foreign and Colonial Postal Services combined. Of that loss £167,000 relates to the East and West Indian Packet Services. Prior to the year 1860-61, the whole cost of the Packet Service was charged to the Admiralty, and consequently any loss that was then incurred for sea conveyance fell upon the Admiralty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER'S SPEECH AT RAWTENSTALL.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question, of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether he is correctly reported in the Times to have said in his speech at Rawtenstall the other night—

"When Mr. Dillon spoke he denounced our proposals root and branch, and he tells us plainly enough that whatever we may offer will not be accepted, because it has not been passed by the Irish leaders."

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, Sir; that is a fairly accurate report of what I believe to be quite an accurate statement. The hon. Member would, perhaps, have been more just to me if he had noticed the sentences that went before and the sentences which came after the one he had quoted, which showed that what I was speaking of were our proposals with reference to the congested districts. I consider that the hon. Member did denounce them, for he stated in the most emphatic manner—and he went even further than my remarks would imply, for he not only said that unless our proposals were passed by the Irish Nationalist Party—which I take to mean unless they were endorsed by them—but also unless they had a preponderating voice on the Boards of Management, our proposals would end in considerable failure. The hon. Member also said that if the Government do not do this—that is, accept the views that the hon. Member put forward as to the persons by whom those proposals are to be worked—then our scheme is foredoomed to failure, and that it would be useless to waste the time of the House in discussing the Bill. A second time he used the words, “Our scheme was foredoomed to failure.” I thought, under these circumstances, that what I said was rather a weak paraphrase of the very violent philippic of the hon. Member.

MR. DILLON: I claim the right to say that the words of the right hon. Gentleman are a gross mis-statement of what I said. What I said was that Irish Members, who spoke for all the electors in the congested districts, should have a fair share in the constitution of the Board; and I went on to say that if the Nationalists were allowed to nominate a majority of the Board they would find men who would work honestly and endeavour to make the scheme a success.

MR. GOSCHEN: Read on.

MR. DILLON: The statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is absolutely untrue. It is a gross misrepresentation of the spirit of the words I used, and I consider it utterly unworthy of a political Leader to make such mis-statements.

MR. GOSCHEN: I shall be more courteous to the hon. Member than he has been to me. I maintain that no one could have heard his speech without considering that my words were a perfectly fair comment upon it. The hon. Member, by taking out that particular sentence, would wish to give the impression that I was speaking of any proposals, whereas it is perfectly patent that I was speaking of the proposals with regard to the congested districts; and I consider that the words which I have used, and at which the hon. Member stopped short in his statement just now, go further, in that they are in favour of the passing and administering of the Bill by the Irish leaders, and state that, unless that is provided for, the proposals in the Bill are foredoomed to failure. Under these circumstances, I regret that the hon. Member considers that I have gone beyond the limits of political controversy. I candidly state that I believed then, and I believe now, that I was giving an accurate representation of the words of the hon. Member.

CIVIL BILLS (COUNTY COURTS) IRELAND.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I have given notice of my intention to move for a Return of the number of Civil Bills in the County Courts (Ireland), and appeals therefrom, on the Common Law and Equity Side, from June, 1885, till the present date, showing the number of Appeals actually heard, the number withdrawn, and the number of cases where the decrees of the Court below were affirmed, or varied, or reversed. May I ask if the Motion will be unopposed?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone the Motion. I have not yet received a Report in reference to the subject.

MR. MAC NEILL: I will postpone it until to-morrow.

THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): Will the First Lord of the Treasury kindly say what the arrangements are for Business to-morrow? Is it proposed to continue the Debate on the first Order of to-day?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The understanding is, I believe, that, if necessary, the Debate shall be continued to-morrow; but I hope it will close to-night.

THE SUGAR BOUNTIES.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): May I ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the statement in to-day's Standard is correct, that the German Government have received information that it is not the intention of the British Government to proceed this year with the Sugar Bounties Treaty; and whether it is also true that the German Government is about to proceed upon its own account in the matter?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will please to put down the question.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to exempt certain letters of hypothecation from the operation of 'The Bills of Sale Act, 1882.'" [Bills of Sale Bill [Lords.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL—(No. 244.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(4.20.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Bill which I am now about to ask the House to read a second time divides itself naturally into two parts, one part dealing with local finances, more especially so-called, and the other part dealing with the question of the purchase, the extinction, and the diminution of licences. The opposition which is threatened to the Bill is directed mainly, if not altogether, to the latter of those two portions; but the House will understand that the provisions in the first part of the Bill are of an extremely important character, which make it necessary that I should trouble the House with some details connected with them. But naturally my observations will be mainly directed to that part of the Bill against which the attack of the hon. Member for Barrow is intended to be made. The County Councils have, with practical unanimity, urged upon the Government that they should provide them in some way or other with the money of which, as they allege, they have been deprived by the dropping of the Horse and Van Tax. It is not necessary for me to say whether those expectations were altogether justified, or whether there is that obligation resting on the Government which they allege to exist. But I must say, on the part of the Government, that the amount which they originally expected to receive from the Local Government Bill in aid of local finance was considerably diminished by the failure to pass the Horse and Van Tax. We are,

and have been, extremely anxious to meet the wishes of the County Councils, and to make up for the deficiency which has been caused in their finances. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has, I know, been exercising all the resources of ingenuity for some time past with a view to finding some source from which these funds may be legitimately derived. The proposal which is now before the House is a proposal to distribute the money which will be provided, as we hope, by the extra duties upon beer and spirits. Whatever may be the opinion of hon. Members from Scotland and Ireland as to the portion which has been allotted to them from this additional taxation, I think there will be a general concurrence that the source from which the revenue is derived is in itself open to little or no objection from any quarter. [Cries of "No, no!"] I know there is an objection on the part of Irish and Scotch Members, not so much to the tax as to its distribution, but that is a matter which it is not necessary for me to deal with here. The question then arises, how is the money to be distributed? The total amount which it is expected will be raised by this new tax is £1,304,000. If we deduct the amount, which I shall refer to later, for the extinction of licences, namely, £440,000, the net available balance amounts to £864,000; and I think that all interested in local and county finance will admit that this is a discharge in full of any obligations which may rest upon the Government. We propose to allot this money under certain conditions. The first condition, as far as England and Scotland are concerned, is that a certain portion of the money shall be appropriated for police superannuation purposes. It is not necessary that money should be specially set apart for this purpose in Ireland, because the Irish Constabulary is provided for out of the Imperial Exchequer, and no other provision is necessary. With reference to the question of police superannuation in England and Scotland, the House will admit that the matter is one of the very highest importance. It is important not only that the matter should be dealt with, but that it should be dealt with speedily; and the Government are justified in making it one of the first conditions of granting this money in aid. I cannot speak too highly of the Police Forces of this country. They have performed always difficult, often arduous, and sometimes dangerous duties, and they have performed those duties in a manner which meets with universal approbation. That being so, I am sure it is not necessary for me to appeal at any length to Parliament on their behalf, or assert my firm conviction that Parliament will readily listen to and deal with their just complaints. There can be no doubt that the position of the police at the present time, with reference to superannuation, is highly unsatisfactory. There is made from the whole Police Force of England a deduction of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. from their wages which is supposed to be allocated for purposes of superannuation. But it is a matter of astonishment, this being so, that pensions are not universal throughout the country; and I am told that there are no less than 40 or 50 police forces in England in which deductions are made from pay, while no superannuation allowances are given. Although the deductions are compulsory, the pensions are in the discretion of the Governing Bodies. In London the conditions are different, and pensions are demanded by the police force as a matter of right. There is another feature in connection with this matter. Notwithstanding the payments that have been made to Superannuation Funds during many years, in a very large number of cases in the country the Superannuation Funds are in a state of almost hopeless bankruptcy. I am told that the annual deficiency in the County and Borough Police Funds amounts to £40,000 or £50,000. In London the annual charge for police superannuation is far in excess of receipts for that purpose. A Committee which sat in 1875, and reported in 1877, went very fully into the whole question of superannuation, and listened very carefully to the complaints made. The Committee came to the conclusion that the complaints were not unreasonable, and that they ought to be remedied. Several Bills on the subject were introduced into this House. There were Bills in 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886, and 1887, though none was passed. The first two Bills were brought in by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and the Bill of 1885 was introduced by the right hon.

Mr. Ritchie

Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. The other two Bills came from this side of the House, but none passed into law, mainly because of financial difficulties. The finance is what we now propose to supply; and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will introduce a Bill in which provisions will be made, so that by aid of the money which we give—£300,000 to England and £40,000 to Scotland—all the just grievances of the police forces in London, and throughout the country will be removed. There is in England, after providing the £300,000 for superannuation, a sum of £393,200 left. We propose that this shall be distributed in the same manner as the Probate Duty in the counties and county boroughs, and in case of dispute we propose to place the allocation in the hands of the Commissioners under the Local Government Act. It is highly satisfactory to know that, notwithstanding the great intricacies of many points which might require to be settled by the Commissioners, the whole of the arrangements between the counties and the county boroughs—at least as far as the temporary arrangements are concerned—have been made without the intervention of the Commissioners being necessary at all. With reference to Scotland, after providing the £40,000 for police superannuation, we have left £53,440. It is the desire of Scotch Members that a further sum should be allocated and added to the amount which, in deference to their wishes, was given for educational purposes last year. It is proposed by the Bill to allocate £40,000 for that purpose, which we believe will be amply sufficient.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): How is it to be allocated?

*MR. RITCHIE: I cannot deal with that subject in a Second Reading speech. The remaining £13,440 is to be available for any demands made by pleuro-pneumonia, and the balance—if there be any—is to go to the salaries of Medical Officers of Health and Sanitary Inspectors. In Ireland the whole £77,360 has been dealt with, or is to be dealt with, first, by providing funds for the payment of national school teachers; and this proposal finds, I believe, complete favour with hon. Members from Ireland. But the House will remember that although the whole of this amount is made available for national school teachers, a considerable portion of it will go towards the relief of local taxation. Now, Sir, I pass from those portions of the Bill, which will certainly not raise much controversy, and I come to the part of the Bill at which a deadly blow is levelled by the hon. Member for Barrow. It is well to remind the House that if they are in favour of the proposals I have just sketched they would do well not to support the hon. Gentleman, because, unquestionably, if the hon. Member for Barrow is successful in his onslaught the whole Bill will have to go—a view which evidently meets with favour in some quarters—and none of these allocations for purposes which I think are universally approved will go into the hands of the Local Authorities. I am afraid that the latter portion of our proposals, the Licensing Clauses, will be met with a very considerable amount of strenuous opposition. It will be our duty, of course, to meet that opposition as best we can; but I can assure hon. Gentlemen we consider our case so strong and so good a one that we shall resist all onslaughts on that portion of our Bill, and with the aid of the House we shall press forward our proposals with every hope and belief that we shall succeed in passing them into law. We believe that our proposals are equitable and that they are desirable, and, further, we believe that a very large portion of the opposition which has been directed against these proposals is owing to a misunderstanding of the objects and purposes of the Government. Although the question is one of great and burning importance and of considerable controversy, I hope we may approach the subject in a fair and candid manner, and that no prejudice on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite, however advanced they may be in the matter of temperance legislation, will prevent their giving to our proposals a fair and candid consideration. Whatever may be the belief of some hon. Gentlemen opposite, I assure the House that the sole object which the Government had in view in making their proposals was to promote temperance and to help those who are endeavouring, and who have so long endeavoured, to battle against intemperance. I know there are people who pretend to see some secret purpose of ours in this proposal to Parliament ["Hear, hear!"] I do not know from whom that "Hear, hear" came. Is it the hon. Member for Barrow who thinks that what I have said is not accurate.

MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness): No.

*MR. RITCHIE: What I said was that our sole purpose was to promote temperance. We had no other aim or object, and if he or others think that under cover of attempting to help temperance reform we have endeavoured to set up, as in his opinion perhaps, a great scheme of compensation, I can assure him he is utterly wrong.

MR. CAINE: I hope the right hon. Gentleman does not think I had any desire to question his intentions.

*MR. RITCHIE: What I have said is that the operation of our proposals is in the direction of temperance, even although their effect may be but small. In my opinion, matters of this kind are not to be dealt with satisfactorily by leaps and bounds. In my opinion, it is only by steps and stages that you will be able to deal with this question, and that large and heroic measures are not the best for promoting the cause he has at heart. The annual grant we place at the disposal of the Local Authorities for the purpose is not a large one, but I believe it will be sufficient to enable them to deal with a large number of the smaller fry of public houses. I will point out that there is a provision in the Bill by which the annual income can be capitalised for three years if it be desirable to deal more largely with them. I am prepared to say we are not disposed, if good arguments can be shown to the contrary, to adhere to the term of three years, and we shall be prepared to consider any extension of that period which may commend itself to us, so that although the beginnings may be small, we may ultimately do great things. But we do not claim for our proposals that they are of an extensive and sweeping character. Our view is, and always has been, that when this question comes to be dealt with as a whole, the control of licences must be transferred to Local Authorities, to County Councils, and to Town Councils. This is the idea we embodied in the Local Government Bill. This is the idea we have now; but meanwhile, and until this is done, we desire to take a step, although it be but a small one, in the direction of temperance. One word with reference to the money which is to be raised for this purpose. It has been spoken of in many quarters as if it were some kind of a residue of a tax which the Government had resolved to put on for other purposes. I want the House clearly to understand, for whatever it may be worth, that that is not a correct statement of the course the Government have pursued. The Government, whether rightly or wrongly, deliberately placed an extra duty upon alcoholic liquors for this express purpose. It was not a question of money being left over, and that then it occurred to the Government that with the balance we might do something in this direction. It was fully and carefully considered, and it was deliberately arranged by the Government that this extra tax to yield between £400,000 and £500,000, should be put on for this express purpose. I cannot understand how any great objection can be raised to the proposal even by the extreme Temperance Party. The question of where the money for the purchase and extinction of these licences comes from, is, I think, not immaterial. It must be remembered, whether our purposes be good or bad, our details right or wrong, this money is raised from drink for the purpose of diminishing the sale of drink. [Laughter.] I do not see why hon. Gentlemen should see grounds for laughter in that statement. It is a matter which can hardly be denied. I think that all will acknowledge that, for the purposes of our Bill, money raised from that source is legitimately raised. Before dealing with our proposals as to the purchase and extinction of licences, may I point out that this is not the only step we have taken to meet the wishes and desires of the Temperance Party. I do not see much about it in the literature of the extreme section of the Temperance Party, but one very important feature in our proposals is the suspension of the issue of new licences. That is a matter which temperance reformers have been constantly urging upon all Governments, and at any rate, so far as that provision is concerned, I am sure it commends itself to the hon. Member for Barrow and to all temperance reformers, however extreme or advanced they may be, and that they regard it as a matter of the very greatest importance. At any rate, it is a provision which gives satisfaction to the Temperance Party. There are certain exceptional circumstances under which we provide that new licences may be granted. Several criticisms have been addressed to us with reference to our proposals for exceptions. I say there, again, we shall be quite prepared in Committee to consider any objections which may be legitimately raised with reference to the exceptional provisions which we insert. There is one important feature in connection with this matter which, I think, will commend itself very strongly to a number of temperance reformers in the House—that is, the valuable recognition which we give to the opinion of the County Council as to whether, even in a new neighbourhood, or a developing neighbourhood, a licence should be granted, providing, as we do, that on any application for a new licence under circumstances such as I have described, it can only be granted by the Justices if approved by the County Council. There are also some safeguards which we insert in the Bill. For instance, we provide that no additional value shall be given to any existing licence in consequence of any of the provisions of this Bill. We also take care that new licences stand on a very different footing from old licences. Certain suggestions have been made to us, notably by the Church of England Temperance Society, which, perhaps, has done as much good in the cause of temperance as any other society, and which has the cause of temperance at heart fully as much as any other Temperance Association. One of that society's suggestions was that no privilege of removal should be accorded to new licences, and that we are prepared to provide for. They are also anxious that, in the dealing with the granting of new licences, what are understood by grocers' licences—off licences—shall be dealt with, and that they should be brought under the clause which prevents new licences being issued. There, again, the Government are prepared to consider the suggestion that has been made. By Sub-section 4 of Clause 8 we provide that new licences shall be refusable by the Justices at their unqualified discretion. It has been pointed out that this might seem to imply that we desired to say that they had not unqualified discretion now. We have not, and we never had, any desire to interfere with the existing rights of Justices, whatever they are; and we shall be perfectly prepared in Committee to move words to make that plain. So much for that part of our proposal, which I believe to be acceptable to all sections of temperance reformers—[Mr. CONYBEARE: "No!"]—except one. I now propose to lay before the House the provisions we desire to make with regard to existing licences. It is admitted on all hands that they are much too numerous, and social reformers will agree that they ought to be reduced in number. How is a reduction to be effected? The hon. Members for Barrow and Cocker mouth would say by popular veto; but they have not yet succeeded in converting the country to their opinion. The popular veto embraces the possibility of sweeping away entirely all the public houses in any particular locality without the slightest regard to any interests which may be possessed by the holders of licences, and the effect of that would be to reduce a large number of persons to beggary and destitution. If we are to wait for a reduction of licences until that reform takes place we should possibly have to wait even now for a very long time. It is said that magistrates may refuse to renew. That process, I contend, is also a slow one. Even assuming that they have an absolutely uncontrolled power of refusing renewal, nevertheless magistrates, in exercising their discretion, do regard the position of a publican, and the claim he has after a long course of renewals to a belief that his renewal will again take place. But we desire to quicken the process. We do not desire to wait till the great reforms to which I have referred are carried out, and so we give to the representatives of the ratepayers the power to diminish the number of licences, and we give them the means out of which they can fulfil that object. I would point out, first of all, that hon. Gentlemen who imagine that by the action of the County Councils they would do something extremely detrimental to the principles which are advocated by the extreme section of the Temperance Party—those hon. Gentlemen seem to have very little faith in popular representation. In giving this money to the County Councils we impose upon them no obligation to diminish licences if they do not think it desirable to do so or if they are unable to make terms which they consider favourable. Secondly, no one is to be taxed against his will for this particular purpose. I am not prepared to argue whether this money comes from the makers, the sellers, or the consumers of drink; I am content with this fact, which no one can gainsay, that it comes out of the drink somewhere or other, and I imagine that hon. Gentlemen will not be prepared to say that it is not a legitimate source from which taxation should come to this purpose. It is said that we are instituting a great scheme of compensation. I utterly and absolutely deny anything of the kind. As I said the other day, compensation is a word which might possibly be applied to any bargain which is made between two persons. A man buys a hat and he leaves with the hatter in compensation whatever may be the price of it. Well, that is exactly what we are proposing to do—nothing more and nothing less; and although in a sense it is compensation, because value is received, I deny that it is compensation in the ordinary sense of the term. I assert that the word "compensation" is ordinarily applied to transactions in which at least one of the persons concerned is not a free agent. In purchasing under this Bill it is undoubtedly recognised that licences have a market value. They are recognised for all commercial purposes as having a goodwill attached to them. The fact that they are marketable commodities is recognised by the business community, by the State, and by the Local Authorities. The Chancellor of the Exchequer the other day showed completely that for Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duty the goodwill of a public house is taxed on its capital value. It is the practice of the Inland Revenue to estimate at so many years the value of the profits made in a public house, although the licence is annually renewable.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): How many years?

*MR. RITCHIE: Three years, I think. I am not, however, certain about that, and I would rather the right hon. Gentleman did not take it from me. It is sufficient for me to know that the value of the licence is taken for more than one year. If the Inland Revenue are not satisfied with the value which is placed upon the interest in a public house they can, and frequently do, require an outside valuer, such as the publican himself would have engaged, to value the interest in the house and to supply them with proofs as to its value, and upon that value the tax is raised. Again, the Local Authorities have always recognised the value of a goodwill, both in public houses and all other houses which they take for public improvements. The London County Council have bought up and cancelled valuable licences out of the rates, and that is the very thing which we are blamed for giving to Local Authorities throughout the country the power of doing, only there is this advantage in our proposal, that, instead of having recourse to the rates, we provide funds for them, coming not out of the rates but out of the drink itself. It has been stated, as an objection to our proposals, that we are committing Parliament to certain bases of compensation. That I utterly deny. I maintain that we are not doing half as much by this Bill to set up bases of compensation as has been done for years past, both by the State and by the Local Authorities. I would make an appeal to the extreme Temperance Party, as represented by the hon. Member for Barrow. Do they think they will ever, in a reasonable time—in their lives—be able to deal with this question without recognising existing facts, such as those I have enumerated? I assert that it will not be possible to deal with this question properly, when it has to be dealt with comprehensively, without recognising existing facts, and that you cannot reduce to ruin and beggary persons who have been carrying on a legitimate business with no fault. Whatever may be the legal position of licence holders, the business has been carried on under the sanction of the law, and with an assurance fully warranted by practice of the renewal of the licence. I do not believe that public opinion will tolerate any such action as that contemplated by the hon. Member and the extreme Temperance Party. On the contrary, I believe that public opinion would revolt against the iniquity of depriving men, women, and children, of their livelihood by such a process as that which is favoured by the hon. Gentleman, and those who think with him; and, further, if you transfer this licensing to Local Authorities to-morrow, unless you were to provide some means, upon some basis or other, by which the interests in these premises should be recognised, I do not believe you would ever get any Local Authority to put the law into operation. I believe public opinion would be too strong against it. In the first place, there was the question of Army purchase, and that of the over-regulation prices, which were certainly not legal. But in that case Parliament recognised existing facts, and spent several millions of money. I assert that in regard to those over-regulation prices there had been an illegal traffic, which had grown up contrary to the will of Parliament and against the law; yet, when Parliament saw that it was necessary for the public good to deal with the matter, money was provided out of which the status of those who had paid for commissions was recognised, and payment in compensation was made. Another illustration is that which was afforded by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) in 1883, when he proposed to diminish the work performed by local collectors of taxes. Those appointments were only held from year to year, and there was no claim to renewal; but there was a reasonable expectation of re-appointment, and my right hon. Friend proposed in his Bill to compensate the collectors, and, as far as I recollect, there was not a single voice raised against it at the time. So also with regard to our public men. From one time to another they have given strong expression to their views that this matter cannot be dealt with without recognising the proper claims to compensation put forward. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone)—and I should be surprised if he held any other sentiments—has expressed similar opinions. At Dalkeith, in 1879, he said—

“But I must also add that, I think, if it be necessary, if Parliament should think it wise, to introduce any radical change in the working of the liquor law in such a way as to break down the fair expectations of persons who have grown up, whether rightly or wrongly, it is not their fault—it is our fault—under the shadow of those laws, their fair claim to compensation ought, if they can make good their case, to be considered, as all such claims have been considered, by the wisdom and liberality of the British Parliament."

Again, the right hon. Gentleman said, on the 5th of March, 1880, speaking on the Local Option Resolution of the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson):—

"We ought not to allow our prejudices with regard to this particular trade, or our sense of the enormous mischiefs associated with its working, to cause us to deviate by one hair's breadth from the principle on which Parliament has always acted in analogous circumstances—namely, that where a vested interest has been allowed to grow up, the question of compensation should be considered when such vested interests were proposed to be interfered with by Act of Parliament. What I am prepared to say is neither more nor less than this—that the licensed victualler has the same right to fair consideration that is enjoyed by persons following every other trade or calling which is interfered with by Act of Parliament, and to whom compensation is awarded owing to such interference. We must not allow—I need not say that Gentlemen on this side of the House will not allow—any political feeling or prejudice to interfere with the rectitude of our judgment, or to prevent us from giving the same measure of justice or indulgence to licensed victuallers that we should give to any other class in the community. If that be so, I am inclined to think that this Resolution, which is to be regarded as a sort of charter, laying down the lines of our future conduct, ought to contain at least an allusion to the question of compensation. When Parliament enacted negro emancipation it was preceded by a preliminary Resolution, in which the principle of compensation was recognised. My hon. Friend says we must wait till a claim for compensation is made. Parliament does not act on that principle. Where the facts presented the possibility of such a claim, the recognition of the possibility has, I think, taken place in the original proceedings of Parliament."

These are the statements made at different times by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and I should be very much surprised if he is now prepared to depart from the principle he has laid down. I do not wish to weary the House, but I should like to quote a few words spoken by the late Mr. Bright in the Debate on the Local Option Resolution of the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth. On the 14th of June, 1881, Mr. Bright said:—

"The other difficulty is the question which has been referred to by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Daly), the question of compensation in case public houses were suppressed where there had been no breach of the law. I think the hon. Baronet would, on further consideration —in fact, I gathered from what he said that this is so—not think it absolutely wrong for Parliament to provide some mode by which men who are now engaged in a lawful business should not be deprived of that business without some sort of compensation."

Then, Sir, there is the hon. Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson) himself. I may bring him forward as a witness against his own proposals, although the House will not expect that he said anything very warm and sympathetic on the subject of compensation. The hon. Baronet said:—

"Hon. Members tell me that there ought to be something about compensation in my Resolution. If I would only do that they would find it in their hearts to vote for me. Now, I do not want to condemn compensation; but it is not the question which is before the House. The question is whether it is right to force these houses upon an unwilling neighbourhood, and if it cannot be done without compensation, let us have compensation. I am quite sure that if ever my Resolution is crystallised into an Act of Parliament this House will never refuse a fair demand from any body of men."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) has also given expression to the opinion that in dealing largely and broadly with this question, the just right to compensation on the part of people deprived of their licences by an alteration in the law should and ought to be considered. I may say that I have to-day read a pamphlet which has been sent to me containing a speech made by Mr. Bright before a temperance audience in 1883, in which he laid down the exact lines upon which we now proceed as being, in his opinion, the right lines upon which the question should be dealt with. I have already said that the opposition to our proposals is formidable, if we are to judge by the number of resolutions and telegrams that have been received. Hon. Members will recollect that one day last week the floor of the House was brown with the envelopes of telegrams sent to hon. Members conveying resolutions from all quarters of the country. I have something to say about these resolutions. A large proportion of them bear intrinsic evidence of proceeding from the same source. There has been a handle turned, and they have come out all ready made in incredible numbers. But there are some which appear to be spontaneous, and about those I should like to say a word. Occasionally they go wrong. One resolution is very formidable, being couched in strong language and evidently intended to be directed against the proposals of the Government. It says—

"We totally and entirely and absolutely dissent from the licensing proposals of Lord Randolph Churchill."

But my noble Friend's Bill is evidently not the Bill against which this resolution was directed, because there is no compensation clause in that Bill at all. So that here this resolution very clearly went wrong. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: They meant his speech.] They may have meant his speech, but they said his Bill. I will give another illustration. Here is a resolution—

"That the proposal in the Budget to give £350,000 to the County Councils as a fund from which to compensate publicans whose licence 'for one year and no longer' may not again be granted is a dangerous innovation."

That shows clearly that the individuals who were considering this resolution thought that by our proposals we were providing a fund for the compensation of those licences which were not renewed by the Magistrates. Nothing can be more contrary to our intention—nothing can be more ludicrous. I have one or two more cases. Here is one from Wales—

"That this meeting protests most emphatically against the renewed proposal of the Government to compensate publicans whose licences may not be renewed."

There, again, the evident idea in the minds of these people is that we are endeavouring to compensate men who are deprived of their licences by the Magistrates. Another resolution is from the Portsmouth Band of Hope and Abstainers' Union, and it says—

"The Portsmouth Band of Hope and Abstainers' Union—consisting of 36 societies, with a membership of over 7,000—protests most strongly against the giving of compensation to publicans in case of non-renewal of licence."

Here is a resolution the idea of which cannot be mistaken. The idea is that our proposal for dealing with the question is that we are compensating the publican in case of the non-renewal of his licence. I am glad, however, to think that there are some temperance reformers who take a different view of our proposals. Here is a letter from a member of the Southwark Band of Hope Union. It says—

Mr. Ritchie

"Though an ardent supporter of total abstinence, I deeply regret the position which the temperance party are taking up in connection with the Government Bill. Whilst I certainly object very much to any indiscriminate form of compensation, I think the advantages to be gained from the Bill to be introduced on Monday are far more than commensurate with its defects, and I shall be very grieved indeed if the Government give way by allowing the whole Bill to drop. Most moderate men would, I think, be better pleased if they could see their way clear to adopting the Church of England Temperance Society's plan—namely, ten years' limit."

[Cries of "Name."] It is not a letter addressed to me, so I am afraid I cannot give the name. Here is a cutting which has been sent to me from a newspaper in Hull. It concludes by saying—

"I cannot but think, Sir, that the unseemly attitude of the would-be leaders of the temperance party give the lie direct to all the sentiment that has emanated from the temperance platforms for the last half-century. Opponents of the scheme would cajole us into believing that it is to the compensation clauses only that they object; but how they can expect any man of common sense to swallow such utter rubbish passes my comprehension altogether, seeing that the compensation is purely permissive, and that the scheme if carried in its entirety would practically give to the people that very local option which temperance reformers have worked and striven and prayed for for years, and amongst those who have looked to this as an earnest of victory for our cause may be numbered many of those who to-day so madly denounce it, for the miserable dog-in-the-manger reason that it comes from the wrong side of the House."

[Cries of "Name."] It is signed "A Good Templar." I have one more extract to give. It is taken from the speech of a gentleman once well known in this House, chairman of the Essex County Council, and who has been for many years intimately associated with all temperance movements in the country—I refer to Mr. Andrew Johnston. ["A Liberal Unionist."] That does not detract from the importance of the statement—

"They had the most temperance Budget that had ever been brought in. It suggested a system for reducing the number of public houses in London in a way that all could agree with, but the full-blown Radical could not agree with shutting up public houses unless at the same time he ruined the publicans. He wanted practical reforms, for he was quite as ardent a reformer as ever; but he did not wish to bring them about in the same harassing way as the Radicals."

I have one more illustration to give of the support which we are likely to receive from the Temperance Party in connection with this question. It is from the Church of England Temperance Society. Let us contrast what their conduct has been in this matter with the conduct of some other societies, which shall be nameless. This society waited upon me as a deputation to discuss the proposals of the Bill. They recognised that, whatever might be said to the contrary by the opponents of the Government and of the Bill, it was an honest and well-intended attempt to deal with this great question of intemperance, and they put before me certain suggestions which they said required to be considered in connection with this matter by the Government. They desired to represent to the Government that the existing powers of Magistrates, while not in any way set aside by the Bill, should be recognised as existing in express terms in the wording of the Bill. To that I saw not the smallest objection. We have not the least intention of interfering with any powers now possessed by Licensing Magistrates, and we shall be glad to introduce words in order to make this plain. Then the deputation dealt with grocers' licences, and urged that no privileges of removal should attach to conditional licences. I am also prepared to deal with those licences. They also set out that the bases of the arrangement under which agreement for the purchase and sale should be made under the Bill should not be considered as necessary to be adopted by Parliament when it came to deal with the whole question; and to that also I see no objection. [Sir W. HARCOURT: Why not?] Subject to these reservations, the Government have been able to obtain the support of this great Temperance Society. It has not been content simply with giving the Government a negative support in this matter. It recognises the attempt we are making, and it has gone the length of advising its friends to support the Government in the proposals they have made. I have felt it to be of supreme importance that we should have an opportunity of putting before the House and the country the details of our proposals, because I believe the more widely the proposals we are making are known the more we are likely to obtain support from all classes of the community. I confess that we are disappointed at the way in which we have been met by some Temperance Associations in this matter, and by some of those who advocate the cause of temperance in this House. But I earnestly hope that a fuller consideration of our proposals may enable them somewhat to alter their position towards us. However that may be, I ask the House and the country to believe that our sole object has been to help temperance reformers and to promote the cause of temperance; and we appeal to the House to give us their assistance in the carrying out of an object which I believe we all have at heart. I move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

*(5.22.). MR. CAINE: I am sorry to say that neither the appeal with which the right hon. Gentleman concluded, nor the able and clear speech he has delivered, nor the arguments he has adduced in the course of that speech, have any effect whatever in inducing me to withdraw the Amendment which I am about to move—

"That this House declines to assent to a Bill which provides by payment out of public moneys for the extinction of annual licences in the manner provided in the said Bill."

The right hon. Gentleman said that the proposals which the Bill contains are equitable and desirable, and that the opposition brought forward is owing to a misunderstanding of their nature. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill itself is exceedingly easy to understand. The difficulties which I and my Friends experience have not been in understanding the clauses of the Bill, but in understanding the various explanations which Ministers have given with regard to them. The right hon. Gentleman also spoke of the Bill as being brought forward from a desire to help those who are battling with intemperance. Well, Sir, those of us who oppose the Bill have been for years past battling with intemperance, and we can see nothing in this measure, taken as a whole, which is at all likely to promote the cause we have at heart. On the contrary, we believe that it will seriously injure it; and, therefore, we feel compelled from the initial steps of these proposals to oppose them to the utmost of our power in every legitimate way. I beg to assure my right hon. Friend that I do not in the least doubt his good intentions, especially towards the liquor trade; but it is the method by which he proposes to carry out those good intentions that we object to. It would appear as though right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite cannot do anything for the Temperance Party without doing something at the same time for the liquor trade. Whilst offering 6d. to meet the demand of the Temperance Party they give a good round sovereign to those engaged in the trade. I will not follow the right hon. Gentleman into all the ridicule he has endeavoured to cast upon the expressions of public opinion which have been elicited by this Bill. It is perfectly natural, if hon. Members who are opposed to the principle of this measure, and have put down notices of opposition are supposed by its authors to misunderstand the principles of the Bill—it is perfectly natural that humble individuals up and down the country who are not here to follow the intricacies of legislation should also be under some misunderstanding. But I will endeavour to show that some of the “misunderstandings” on which he has poured ridicule are very natural and legitimate conclusions to draw, and that the country is justified in supposing that the proposals of the Bill are only a re-introduction of the proposals of 1888. The right hon. Gentleman referred to a very old friend of mine—Mr. Andrew Johnston—as being in favour of this Bill, but this gentleman is certainly strongly opposed to any money compensation being given out of the rates or taxes to publicans who may have lost their licences. Mr. Johnston took the chair for me, in 1888, at a meeting in Essex, called for the purpose of denouncing the proposals brought forward by the Government at that time. The right hon. Gentleman claims that he has secured the support of the Church of England Temperance Society. But I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he has only secured, if at all, the assent and support of one of the committees of that organisation. I have no hesitation in saying, from the intimate knowledge I have of that association, being myself a vice-president and on its Parliamentary Committee, that its main body would probably repudiate any such compromise as has been arrived at by the committee. Let us know the exact truth of the case. Canon Ellison, chairman of the Church of England Temperance Society, has issued to the Members of this House a document in which he expresses the hope that support will be given on the conditions contained in an enclosed communication which appeared in the Times. What are those proposals? This is one them—that in any such Bill as the present the Church of England Temperance Society will maintain that the licence-holder is the only person whom the law recognizes that he has no legal but only an equitable claim to compensation; if there are other interests behind, as are claimed, it must be a matter of agreement between themselves; that compensation shall be on the limited basis put forward by the Church of England Temperance Society, and shall be restricted to the period of 10 years from the passing of the Act. We have heard from the right hon. Gentleman a detailed account of the concessions which the Government are prepared to make to the Church of England Temperance Society. Will any purchase made under the Bill be on the lines thus laid down?

*MR. RITCHIE: If the hon. Gentleman will read further on he will see the suggestions which have been made by the Government for the alteration of the Bill.

*MR. CAINE: The suggestions are there, but I take my stand on the Bill itself. It is a suggestion contained in a letter to the Times which I am quoting, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is going to insert in this Bill a clause directing that when the County Council and the publican agree with regard to the price, that price shall not be higher than the equivalent of 10 years after the passing of the Act? If the right hon. Gentleman puts that in he will largely modify his proposal, for 10 years hence the whole objectionable features of the Bill will have passed away. The fact of the matter is—that if Members opposite who are members of the Church of England Temperance Society are going to take any notice of this whip, I claim their votes for my Amendment without hesitation, unless, of course, they get a concession of the conditions contained in the communications I have already referred to. I cannot understand how the Church of England Temperance Society could have accepted such paltry concessions as those made by the Ministers in charge of this Bill. I may point out, however, that this is the action of one of the committees only of a society which has ramifications all over the country. The Liverpool Diocesan Church of England Temperance Society, for which I claim as much respect as any other Temperance Society, passed at its annual meeting, last Thursday, resolutions which, while approving the proposals further to tax spirits, to continue the increased duty on beer, to reduce the duty on tea, and to prohibit the issue of additional licences, strongly disapproves of the proposal to authorise County Councils to purchase liquor licences, on the ground that they are only held from year to year, and are not proper subjects for compensation. The resolutions go on to invite all Members of Parliament representing Divisions in the diocese to use every effort to secure the rejection of this part of the Bill. I have still further evidence on this point. On the 9th May a meeting of the Liverpool Temperance Federation, conspicuous in which is the Church of England Temperance Society, was held. A resolution was unanimously adopted by that federation in favour of the Government Bill so far as it restricts the issue of future licences, but strongly disapproving the proposal to pay compensation for liquor licences. The total abstinence branch of the Church of England Temperance Society, which contains two-thirds of the members, and all the energy of the Church of England Temperance organisation, also at its annual meeting on the 13th passed a resolution which strongly opposed the Bill and urged their members to vote against it. At the meeting last referred to the Chairman made a speech in which he called attention to the fact that on the preceding night I had asserted in the House of Commons that the Temperance Party would go solid against any proposal for giving compensation to publicans. At that statement there was long continued cheering, the audience rising like one man, and this completely discomfited the chairman, who had himself previously spoken in favour of some sort of compensation, and had suggested that the British nation would not desire to ruin the publicans. I can assure the committee of the Church of England Temperance Society that they have not heard the last of the whip which they have sent out. Now I come to the Bill itself. The right hon. Gentleman said that if we were successful in carrying my Amendment the whole of the Bill must go. But why should the whole of the Bill go? It contains four distinct provisions, namely, (1) Police superannuation; (2) Conferring a vested interest on publicans; (3) Suspending the issue of new licences; and (4) Free education for Scotland. The Educational, Superannuation, and Suspensory Clauses, to which I believe no opposition will be raised, are the sugar that coats the compensation pill. The principle of the Bill is, undoubtedly, contained in the attempt to create for the first time a legal vested interest in a public house licence. The acceptance by the House of my Amendment will only withdraw from the Bill three clauses out of 14; three sub-sections out of the balance. If these disappear the suspending of licences and the superannuation of the police and the education proposal for Scotland will, I think, meet with little serious opposition. And why should we not carry them without consenting to this bribe to the publican's interest. I am greatly surprised that the Government should again raise this thorny question during the present Parliament. When the President of the Local Government Board was introducing the Local Government Bill, in 1888, he said, on the Compensation Clauses—

"We have determined, therefore, to make some proposal to the House which we believe fair and equitable, and it is for the House to say whether it is acceptable to it or not. We shall make a proposal which we hope the House will accept. If the House does not, our duty will have ceased."

Well, Sir, the House and the country repudiated the proposal. It cost the Government two seats—Southampton, where their majority of 668 was turned into a minority of 885; and Ayr Boroughs, where a Unionist majority of 1,175 was turned into a minority of 63. And be it remembered that in the latter constituency the seat was recovered when this compensation question was out of the way. History will repeat itself if the Government persevere. A warning has already come from Bristol, and the country will repudiate this latter proposal as vigorously as in 1888, and all the more because it is sought to bring it in by a back door. The President of the Local Government Board objects to the word "compensation" being used as regards this Bill. I am not surprised at it; it is a word of ill omen to him. I have not used it in the Resolution which I have to move, but it lurks behind, and neither he nor I can keep it out of Debate, if we would. This Bill is intended, under cover of some small concessions to temperance reformers, to establish a money value in licences granted for 12 months only; so that, whenever the question of a large extinction of licences may come up in the future, the principle of compensation shall be found to be fully established. We have a statue in St. Stephen's Hall to John Hampden, and he earned it by his resistance to ship money. The sum was but small on each county; but there was the principle, and it was to the principle that Hampden objected. In his speech last Wednesday to a deputation from the Church of England Temperance Society the President of the Local Government Board said—

"The word 'compensation' never appears in the Bill, and I assert, that in doing what we have done, we do not lay the basis of compensation. . . . I assert that we do not desire by our proposals to lay down any lines upon which compensation is to proceed when Parliament comes to deal with the whole question of licensing."

I am sure my right hon. Friend is sincere in this declaration, and yet I differ with him in toto. The Bill has not been so understood by the Temperance Party in country, or by the leaders of the Liquor Trade; nor has it been so understood by the Conservative Press. What does the Standard say? The Standard speaks of the Bill as,

"A measure which assumes that County Councils might think it right to purchase instead of confiscating rights in licensed premises."

It proposes to enable

"Local bodies that are desirous of making a positive and immediate reduction to do so by offering fair terms to the publican."

Surely, "to purchase instead of confiscating (so-called) rights in licensed premises" will "lay down lines upon which compensation will proceed" in future legislation. But I commend to the President of the Local Government Board the following remarks of the Birmingham Daily Mail—an organ most devoted to the interests of the Government. They are as follows:—

"We scarcely think Mr. Ritchie is smoothing the passage of the Government licensing measure by quibbling over the meaning of the word 'compensation.' There is no reason why he should not at once admit that the Bill which comes before the House of Commons for Second Reading on Monday next does establish the principle of compensation. All the hair-splitting in the world, and the strictest insistence on verbal accuracy, will not get over that fact. We take Mr. Ritchie's contention to be this—that the payments of money authorised by the Bill are for the purpose of extinguishing licences, and not for enriching the outgoing publicans. Well, what is that but compensation? Why cannot Mr. Ritchie frankly say that with certain reservations the principle of compensation must be conceded. Why beat about the bush and give the Temperance Party the impression that the Government shrink from the responsibility of urging that a licence-holder has in equity, if not in law, a claim to compensation."

Now, there is a refreshing frankness about the Morning Advertiser and the St. James' Gazette that the President of the Local Government Board would do well to imitate. The trade understands it as we do. What does the Morning Advertiser say? The Morning Advertiser says—

"The trade in both its departments are prepared to give an unanimous support to legislation which, however defective in regard of their interests, proposes to give them a certain measure of protection. They have the assurance that the Government have, at all events, put their foot down against plunder, and asserted the principle that the suppression of a licence through no misconduct on the part of its holder shall be effected by payment for its extinction. Once this principle is established by Parliament it cannot be revoked off-hand when Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his friends chance to find themselves on the Treasury Bench or behind it. They will have to respect the action of their predecessors, they will have to assume an honesty if they have it not, and it is because the Licensing Bill of the Government will—among other things—provide a safeguard in the future that it invites the approval and support of the trade."

What does the St. James' Gazette say—

"The Government has successfully asserted the principle that the extinction of a licence (not forfeited by misbehaviour) shall be accompanied by compensation. And once established in an Act of Parliament, and once set at work, the principle cannot well be thrown over when the Radicals come into power. They may kick and complain, but they would scarcely venture to treat the remaining licences with less honesty than those whom their predecessors had bought out."

Let me go to a Conservative paper of quite a different character. The Rock, a Church of England family newspaper, says, in a leading article (April 25th, 1890)—

"The blot in the plan, the fly in the ointment, is the renewal by a side-wind, of that old idea of compensating publican for the non-renewal of licences. Their licences are for the first time to be treated as vested interests. Next Sunday is the Church of England Temperance Society's Sunday in London. We trust that powerful and prudent Society will weigh the insidious drift of this suggestion about County Councils buying up licences. It is the thin end of the wedge for much more extensive demands, and it will be the first time the English law has admitted that inn-keepers had vested rights in their licences."

But now I wish to call my right hon. Friend's attention to the words of one of his own colleagues. The President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach), speaking at Bristol on Primrose Day, said—

"The brewer and the publican may surely not feel dissatisfied at the important recognition of the principle of compensation for licences taken away without any default of their holders."

I might go on ad nauseam with such quotations. It is idle for the Government to pretend that the Bill does not set up the principle of compensation. If it becomes law, the first County Council that buys up a licence with a view to extinction confirms and legalises the principle that there is a money value in a public house licence granted for 12 months, and no longer. The principle contained in this Bill, therefore, is, that no public house licence shall be extinguished without money compensation, except for offences against the law, and it is that principle the Temperance Party intend to resist to the bitter end. In his speech to the Church of England Temperance Society, the President of the Local Government Board, said—

"I am very glad of the opportunity of saying that if they are driven to argue it, the Government will argue this question of compensation, and will maintain that in order to deal with this question effectually, the question of compensation must be recognised."

Well, Sir, the Government have brought the argument on themselves, and it is now necessary that I should remind the House of what are the views of the Government on compensation.

We are not left in doubt on that point. The President of the Local Government Board during the Debate on the Bill of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) made it perfectly clear that the compensation to be laid down in any future measure the Government may introduce, with a view to a settlement of the licensing question, will be identical with that proposed in 1888 in the Licensing Clauses of the Local Government Bill for England. What were the proposals of the English Local Government Bill? In introducing that measure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) said—

"The question of the measure of compensation shall be referred to an arbitrator who shall consider what is the difference in the value of the particular house with the licence and of the house without the licence at the time of the passing of the Bill."

The Division on this Amendment will be a clear enough issue. Those who vote with me will declare that they cannot consent to a proposal which will confer a freehold interest in a licence granted for 12 months and no longer. That is all I ask the House to do. If we are defeated and these clauses become law, it will become impossible to extinguish a single licence without a money payment, "equal to the difference in the value of the particular house with the licence and of the house without the licence." This will become evident the moment a possible transaction is considered. A section of the public want to get rid of a public house. I will take a well known case in Liverpool as an illustration. Five or six years ago a large gin palace was built opposite the gates of the principal dock for American liners. The application for a licence was opposed by all the steamship owners using the dock, and by all the stevedores loading the vessels. It was, however, granted. The house cost £8,000, and in 1888 the owner refused £20,000 for it. If this Bill becomes law immediate pressure will at once be put on the County Council to extinguish this licence on account of the mischief it is doing to the workpeople in the docks. The County Council will try to come to terms with the owner, who has just refused £20,000. The house is of no use for any trade but that of a public house, or that of a coffee palace. The first thing the owner would do would be to go to Peter Walker & Sons, or some other great monopolist. Any of the great monopolist brewers would jump at the chance of acquiring such a house. Having made his bargain with them, the owner would use it for screwing up the Council. This licensed house, which is exactly of the kind that the public want to see closed, could not be bought up by the County Council under, at least, £20,000. Liverpool's share of the grant of £350,000 will be £7,000, so that they could only extinguish this house by exercising the borrowing powers of the Bill and taking three years' instalments. This transaction once through, the principle of compensation would be established for all time in Liverpool as well as the rest of the country. The transaction would be thundered forth from the opposite Benches as having established a principle from which Parliament could not depart. In considering this Bill we must use our own common sense and the knowledge of our own districts, as to what effect it will have if it became law. The right hon. Gentleman says—

"The money we desire to appropriate would enable Local Authorities to get rid of a considerable number of comparatively valueless public houses which are probably doing much more harm than more valuable public houses; especially in the rural parts of the country."

He said he hoped to be able to do that without raising the burning question of compensation. He has found out his mistake by now. He has raised that question. The principle which, I contend, would be legally established by the purchase of the great Liverpool gin palace, would be quite as successfully established by the buying up of the little rural public house. Let me take a case of which I have some personal experience. I am a partner in a mining company at Millom. There was a small house on a freehold which we do not own, but over which we have royalties. It came into the market, and we sent an agent to buy it at any price. He bid up to £390, and the house was bought over our heads for £400. When asked why he had not bid higher, he said the value of the house was only £200. A licence was removed to the house, and a man began to make money by demoralising our miners. There came a time when we had to take the minerals from under the house, and we had to pay £2,200 for it. If this Bill had been passed we should have tried to get the County Council to buy it. Millom's share of the £350,000 will be £80. I contend that this Bill, whether viewed from the standpoint of the Government, or the Opposition, or the Liquor Trade, or the Temperance Party, must inevitably set up the principle that a 12 months' licence is a freehold. I turn now from the consideration of the principle to that of the methods by which the Bill proposes to carry it out. The measure contains no scheme for reducing the number of public houses throughout the country, no principle to guide Licensing Authorities in awarding compensation. It leaves the County Council to make its own bargain with the publican whose licence is to be extinguished. It is a Compensation Bill for publicans without a scrap of machinery to carry it out. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman has submitted his scheme to the Chairmen of the County Councils and got their opinions upon them. I shall be greatly mistaken if, before the Bill gets through Committee, the County Councils do not make it abundantly clear that they will have no such powers conferred on them with their goodwill and consent. I have heard only to-day that the Cardiganshire County Council have passed a resolution condemning the proposal to pay compensation. I should like to read a letter I received this morning, which I am sure will have great weight with hon. Members, especially Lancashire Members. It is from Mr. John Fell, Chairman of the Quarter Sessions of Lancaster, and who, I think, has been Chairman of the Licensing Committee for some years. Mr. Fell who, I may add, is a supporter of the present Government, writes to me:—

"I think you are thoroughly in the right in opposing the recognition of any vested interest in public houses to be acquired in any sense by public funds. As you know, for many years I have, as a magistrate, held the view that renewals were absolutely discretionary, subject, of course, to the preliminary notices required by Statute and the right of appeal. In my 30 years' experience as a magistrate no new licence has been granted, except on the ground of apparently sufficient public requirement to justify it, proved on oath by witnesses, generally representing localities. If the reasons which induced the magistrates to grant to any individual the exercise of a privilege and limited monopoly in the sale of drink have passed away, the cause for the licence has also passed away. Why should anyone be compensated because in a pure trade venture in which he has simply invested adequate funds to carry out his enterprise, the surrounding circumstances have changed? The applicant for the licence, if he misconstrued the bearing of the law, has been unfortunate—so is everyone else who commits the same mistake, but it has always seemed to me monstrous that we, the general public, should have anything strained to recognise a vested interest in any licensing venture, as if the licensee had been a public benefactor and heroic. I could tell you of many a modified fraud which has been practised on Licensing Justices to secure a licence; but I am merely writing, as one of your constituents, to say I thoroughly approve resistance to the principle of compensation in any form. I hope Mr. Goschen will withdraw his plan. With the knowledge now well realised of the licence being only renewable from year to year on adequate grounds, I fear there will be an ugly rush at the money provided for the extinguishment of licences in the hands of County Councils, possibly a good deal of jobbery to secure a share for the indifferent houses, whose fate is pretty well sealed at no distant date by surrounding causes."

I quote this because Mr. Fell's name is so well-known in the North of England, and because I am sure his opinions will have great weight with Members from the North of England. Now, I think the Government have no right to try to settle the compensation question apart from the whole subject of licensing reform. A Suspensary Act rather indicates an intention to deal comprehensively with the whole question; but if the Suspensary Clauses are only intended to buttress the principle of compensation, they will not be of any great value to the Temperance Party. But I want to call attention to the absurd situation which, in my judgment, this Bill will land us. The President of the Local Government Board has squared the Church of England Temperance Society, for the Second Reading, at any rate, by promising to insert words that shall make it clear—

"That nothing in this Act should be taken to interfere with the powers possessed by the present Licensing Authority to refuse the renewal of licences without payment."

I want the House to see the position that this promise sets up. If this Bill becomes law the County Council may give £1,000 for the extinction of a licence, and next week the Justices may refuse to renew a licence in the same street of the same town without any payment whatever. This shows the utter absurdity of attempting to settle the principle of compensation apart from a general and comprehensive settling of the whole licensing question. Again, I ask the House to consider for a moment the ridiculously inadequate amount of money allocated for the purpose of extinguishing licences. £350,000 is to be divided among 52 English and Welsh counties, £50,000 among 33 Scotch counties, and £40,000 among 32 Irish counties. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in one of his speeches on this subject, spoke of this money as a nest egg. If the right hon. Gentleman ever kept poultry he knows what a nest egg is; but, if he does not know, I will tell him what it is. It is a sham egg put into a sham nest to induce hens to lay real eggs. That is precisely the operation this Bill will have on the taxpayers of the country if they are foolish enough to allow it to pass into law. I have already suggested the inadequacy of the sum, but let me give London alone as an illustration. London's share of the grant cannot be more than £60,000. I have circulated to Members a pamphlet giving particulars of the valuations of public houses in the Metropolis in 1888, on the basis of the clauses of the Local Government Bill. They show that the lowest average valuation at which the 10,000 "on" licences of London can be estimated is £5,000 each. This is not my valuation; but that of two eminent firms of valuers in the City of London. The money allocated to London, therefore, will be enough to extinguish 12 houses in the whole Metropolis. But it will be found, if this Bill passes, that every district of the Metropolis will have public houses to be extinguished. For County Council purposes London is divided into 58 districts. Each will want its share, £1,000. Does the President of the Local Government Board believe that there is a single fully-licensed house in London that can be bought up for £1,000?

*MR. RITCHIE: Certainly.

*MR. CAINE: I advise the right hon. Gentleman to test it. I say, without any hesitation, that to close one house in each district the County Council must accumulate their share of the grant for five years. The right hon. Gentleman is under impression that lots of public houses can be extinguished for an old song. Let him build a public house, and go into the market to buy a licence up, and he will soon find out how mistaken he is. The restrictive policy of recent years pursued by magistrates under increasing pressure of public opinion and the keen competition of monopolist brewers have given a large speculative value to licences which never existed before. He now proposes to add a fresh competition to the market in the shape of all the County Councils in this country. What can be more ridiculous than a grant which gives £60,000 a year to extinguish licences among 4,000,000 of people? That gives to the mining counties of Cumberland and Cornwall £3,000 and £5,000 respectively. To Glasgow, £6,500; to Belfast, £1,500; to Huntingdonshire, £800; to Rutlandshire, £160, and to the vast County of Yorkshire, with its 2,500,000 of industrial population, £35,000 a year to extinguish annual licences which the Bill granting the money turns into perpetual Government leases. We have been told over and over again that the publicans will have to pay this compensation. We have an interest in the Revenue. We get the revenue from liquor, tea, Income Tax, property, and other sources. If this pernicious principle of taking taxes for the relief of rates continues, continual gaps will be made in our £85,000,000, which must be made up from other sources, and we draw upon our Reserve Fund, we draw upon the resources of the ratepayers just as much as if we raised taxes. I cannot admit for a moment that my interest in the tax raised from beer is any less than my interest in the tax raised from tea. We are taxed all round; the public house is a taxable article, and I am not going to be humbugged by the argument that the tax on drink is not a tax laid on the whole community. But I want to turn from the proposals of the Bill itself, which I think I have conclusively proved to contain the principle of compensation laid down by the Government in 1888, to the effect the acceptance of that principle will have upon the whole future of the Temperance Movement. That is the main reason why I have raised the opposition to the Bill. The declaration of the principle of compensation in the Local Government Bill of 1888, to which I have referred already, meets with the uncompromising hostility of every section of the Temperance Party, who believe that if it were once established, their difficulties would be increased ten-fold, and a solid wall of 200 million of sovereigns would be built across their path, which is now clear and unobstructed. We cannot entertain any proposal which gives anything but a 12 months' interest in the licence. We contend that the liquor trade is a peculiar one and differs in toto from other trades. If a man wants to start a public house, he has to go before a magistrate, and furnish evidence of good character. Unless he is a man of unsullied reputation, and unless a public house is required in the neighbourhood, the magistrates cannot give him a licence. When he has got a licence, he is placed under constant police supervision, and the trade is carried on under severe restrictions. A man who has been convicted of felony cannot keep a public house. When the Claimant, who called himself Roger Tichborne, came out of prison, his friends raised a subscription, and thought the best thing they could do for him was to put him in a snug public house. They applied for a licence, and the magistrates were about to grant him one, when the clerk said: "You cannot do it." "Why not?" they asked. "Because he has been convicted." A man once convicted cannot be entrusted with the trade. He may become a grocer, or a draper, or a minister of religion, or a Member of Parliament, but he cannot be a publican. Nothing can be clearer than that a licence is a permission given to a carefully selected individual to sell a dangerous article for 12 months, and that the State, by closely limiting the period, has always reserved to itself the right to withdraw the permission. A publican's licence is not held by him with the object of him making money out of it: it is held as subordinate to the public good and in fulfilment of a supposed public requirement. The holder of a licence for one year only has no legal claim to a licence for the next year. In 1882 the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) carried an Act through the House giving Justices the same discretion with "off" beer licences that they possessed in regard to public houses and "on" beer licences. Within two months of the passing of the Act the Darwen Justices, then represented by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), instructed the Chief Constable to prepare a map of the town to indicate positions of the holders of licences. The off-licenses had reached great proportions, and the Justices resolved to make an effective reduction by refusing licences to 34 out of 72 off beer licences, which, by act of Parliament, enjoyed the same privileges, and were held under the same discretionary power as on-licenses. These 34 selected one of their number to appeal to the Quarter Sessions. Quarter Sessions at Preston confirmed the decision of the Local Magistrates, as those who knew best what was good for the community. The publicans appealed to the Queen's Bench, and they confirmed the decision of the Quarter Sessions. Those 34 licences were extinguished without a single penny compensation. Mr. Justice Field rightly said, in the Court of Queen's Bench, in November, 1882, in giving final decision in the Darwen case, "In every case in every year there is a new licence granted. The Legislature recognises no vested right at all in any holder of a licence." It is, too, equally clear that these licences are not considered to be "property" in the sense of property which would pass to the holder's Trustee in Bankruptcy—for in a recent case in which such a Trustee took possession of a bankrupt publican's licence and opposed applications for its temporary transfer to the landlord of the house, the learned Chief Judge in Bankruptcy held that the Trustee had no right to the licence. The recent case of Sharp v. Wakefield shows that this view is held by Licensing Magistrates and sustained by County Quarter Sessions, Queen's Bench, and Court of Appeal—the latter finally deciding that the Justices had an unlimited judicial discretion in the matter, and might refuse to renew a publican's licence on other grounds than the want of qualification, bad character, or misconduct of the applicant. I contend this is proved and upheld by the authors of the Bill under discussion. It is therein stated expressly that new on-licenses shall only be granted, "at the free and unqualified discretion of the Licensing Authority," and President of the the Local Government Board stated, last Monday, that these words were inserted to make it clear that no right whatever should attach in the case of new licences. But every licence now in existence has been granted on precisely similar terms, and no rights whatever should, on the same grounds, attach to them. Let me call attention to a statement made over and over again by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and confirmed again and again by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Ritchie). The Chancellor of the Exchequer argues that because he and his predecessors have charged Probate Duty on licences, that, therefore, a vested interest has been created. There may be reason for refunding these unjustifiable imposts if they really amount to anything worth refunding; but we are entirely in the dark as to the details. I trust the Chancellor of the Exchequer may see his way to furnish the House with some specific details on this point. I have made inquiries from professional valuers. Here is what a very large firm wrote—

"We should not in valuing for probate the effects of a deceased publican, include anything on account of the licence beyond the proportion of its cost to the next date of payment."

I will ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer two questions on this point. Firstly, What is the largest amount ever paid, to his knowledge, in Probate Duties for the value to the estate of the deceased of an annual licence? and secondly, Can he give any case in which the amount paid has been larger than the proportion of its cost to the next date of payment? If this be all the Probate paid, I make him a present of his argument. No compensation ought in any case to be given for the extinction of a privileged monopoly at the end of the time for which the privilege has been granted, and for which nothing has been paid. Excise fees are required for taking up the licence, but neither certificate nor licence are in any sense paid for. Monopolies bar all claim for compensation, since they already confer what is equivalent to compensation in the advantage given by the monopoly. The position of the holder of a publican's licence is clear enough—he has special profits from the licence which restricts competition, while he risks the monopoly being withdrawn. But the contention of Gentlemen opposite is that these licences have changed hands at high prices, and that, therefore we have no right to refuse to renew them without substantial compensation equivalent to whatever loss the present holder may sustain. But to this I reply caveat emptor! ought the buyer to have injured the conditions. How have these enormous values been built up? I take the first case I come to, out of hundreds in my possession. A man built a house a short time ago, close to Burscough Junction, a country station near Ormskirk, in Lancashire. It cost him £400. He applied for and got a beer licence, then he got a spirit licence, then he sold the House for £4,000. He walked into Court worth £400, he walked out with a certificate, for which he paid nothing, worth £4,000. What did the brewer, who bought his house for £4,000, get? Bricks and mortar worth £400, and the purely speculative chance—I admit a good chance—of getting a 12 months' licence renewed. The trade of the place improves; he makes money, and sells it to some other brewer, or to the public, for £6,000. The new purchaser steps into his place, and again buys the purely speculative chance of a renewal of licence. And this is what has taken place, and is taking place, all over the country. Fictitious values have been created, and have been forced higher and higher by the greed of brewers for retail as well as wholesale profits, and by the greed of a section of the public for high rates of interest. The electors of this country will never consent to endow monopolist Brewery Companies with £200,000,000; they must stand the risk of the advance of temperance sentiments themselves. The Government now ask the House to turn this speculative and artificial value attached to the chances of renewal on an annual licence, into a State endowment, making shares in Brewery Companies as good as Consols. We may frankly admit that the liquor trade is the very good friend of the Conservative Party, but Gentlemen opposite will hardly succeed in getting such a plum for the trade as this. The top of the market in licences has been reached. In the gradual or rapid extinction of drinking facilities, to which now all politicians stand committed, the loss must be borne by the silly purchasers of speculative licences, and not by the British public. Now let us consider the effect the acceptance of the Government's proposal will have on future temperance legislation. Certain points both sides of the House are practically agreed upon. Firstly, the transfer of licensing powers to County Councils; and, secondly, that the tremendous facilities for drinking should be reduced speedily. This side of the House is prepared to accept the principle of the Direct Veto, and if the Liberal Party ever form another Government, it will be embodied in an Act of Parliament, unless my hon. Friends opposite anticipate them, as they done before. The acceptance of full compensation on the lines of the Government proposals will terribly increase the difficulty with temperance reform of all classes in all future legislation. Let us consider how it will affect these proposals, on which everybody is agreed, and suppose that County Councils and Municipalities have the power of granting and renewing public house licences. No one knows better than the President of the Local Government Board that if the present powers possessed by Magistrates were transferred to County Councils there would be a mighty quick clearing out of objectionable public houses without compensation, and that in many districts Councils would be elected who would reduce the number of licences by more than one half. It is to prevent this being done, without enormous burdens being laid on the ratepayers, that the Government now propose, to quote the Morning Advertiser—

"To provide a safeguard for the future and put their foot down against plunder, by asserting the principle that the suppression of a licence can only be effected by payment for its extinction."

The St. James's Gazette says—

"A principle once established in an Act of Parliament, and once set to work cannot be thrown out when the Radicals come into power."

I want to show the Temperance Party in the House how this will operate, by a supposed case, but one very likely to occur if Councils have a free hand given to them by legislation. In the Debate on the Bill introduced by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington, I referred to a recent sale of public house property in Liverpool; I will take it once more as an illustration. I do so the more readily, because a director of Peter Walker & Simkin is a member of this House, and I speak in the presence of other Members who know Liverpool as well as I do myself. This firm has, within the last few days, sold its business to the public for £3,000,000, the vendors showing their confidence in the price obtained by taking half the shares. This price was paid for three breweries, a bonded store and offices, stock, book debts, and 250 tyed public houses. There is no monopoly in a brewery, so if we estimate the three breweries to have cost £250,000 each and the bonded store to be worth £100,000, the book debts and stock being declared in the prospectus at £150,000, we get £1,000,000 from these three items, we have £2,000,000 left as the amount paid for 250 licensed public houses. No one who knows these public houses, as I do, and as many hon. Members do who hear me, would value them without the licences at more than £500,000, so that the difference in value under the terms of the Bill of 1888, which the Government still hold, and in principle seek to establish, would be just £1,500,000. These are fairly average public houses, neither very extensive nor very small, and I claim, therefore, without hesitation, that the average price of a licence in Liverpool is little short of £6,000. Now, supposing the Corporation of Liverpool were the Licensing Authority, it is no stretch of imagination to assume that they would receive instructions from their constituents to reduce the number of licences in Liverpool, now about 2,000, by one-eighth at least, probably more, and, under what the Government call equitable compensation, £1,500,000 would be required for the purpose. But this Bill only gives Liverpool £8,000 a year, and this cannot be capitalised beyond £24,000. Where must the rest of the money come from? Of course, it comes out of the pockets of the ratepayers, who would rightly refuse so large a sum for the dubious advantage of having only 1,750 public houses instead of the present number 2,000. In Bristol, where the public houses are not, on the average, more than a third of the rating of those in Liverpool, a large Brewery Company has one tyed house to each £4,870 of capital. In Newcastle, another has 215 tyed houses to each £3,260. In Plymouth, another has 146 tyed houses, representing one to £2,700 of capital. If the principle of compensation is right, by all means let the House accept it, but with their eyes open. If it is right, then the publicans are entitled to the full compensation proposed in 1888, or they are entitled to nothing. If the former, nothing short of £250,000,000 will pay for their entire extinction, with a proportionate sum for their partial extinction. The money can only be raised by an increase of national or local indebtedness, for the pretence that the trade itself can pay is too flimsy to be worth a moment's argument, and is in itself destructive of the whole principle of equitable compensation. There is a disposition on the part of advocates of compensation to rest their case upon precedent, and this is insisted upon in a clever pamphlet entitled Compensation: The Publicans' Case, by Mr. Charles Cazney, Barrister, who rests this part of his case on precedents, some of which have been mentioned in the House, afforded by the Acts for the Abolition of Slavery, for the Abolition of Purchase in the Army, and for the Disestablishment of the Irish Church. Now, I contend that none of these are analogous to this issue. The money paid to the West India Planters was paid by way of a bribe, and not as equitable compensation. The original proposal of the Government of the day was to advance to the West India body a loan to the amount of 10 years' purchase of the annual profit, amounting to £15,000,000. This was met by the Acting Committee of West India planters, by a demand for £20,000,000 compensation, and a loan of £10,000,000. Eventually, the £15,000,000 was extended to £20,000,000 to get rid finally of a question that threatened the allegiance of our West India Colonies, that had become strained beyond endurance. It was far more to save the colonies from absolute ruin than to compensate the slave owners that the loan was granted. It is quite true that this loan was never repaid, but in all the Debates on the subject—and I speak in the hearing of one right hon. Gentleman who took part in those Debates—it was referred to as a loan, the repayment of which, however, was never insisted upon. But the slaves were by law the property of their owners for life, bought and paid for, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian said during the Debates, property honestly and legally acquired. But if the planters had held a licence from the Government to enslave the blacks from the first of September next ensuing and no longer, and had had to come up every year to have an annual licence renewed, what compensation would Parliament have given? When the Slave Trade was abolished in 1808, not one penny of compensation was asked for, not one penny of compensation was paid. Then the abolition of purchase in the Army, which has been referred to, and as to whether this established a precedent for compensating publicans for loss of an annual licence, I think an answer was given by one or two interruptions from this side, and I do not suppose it will be pressed by any hon. Member speaking to precedent. In the Army Purchase Act, the compensation was given for money already paid by the officers, and not for a fictitious value created by competition. The commissions had been bought and paid for. I do not think this will be pressed as a precedent, but if it is, there are Members in the House who were responsible for the measure and who will, no doubt, disclaim and disprove the views that it forms any precedent for the present discussion. At any rate, it did not pass the House without strenuous opposition from the Radical Party of the day, led by my old friend Mr. Peter Rylands. The nearest precedent that can be quoted of the present claims of the publicans are the treatment of the collectors of taxes and of the Curates under the Irish Church Disestablishment Act, who, undoubtedly, had no freehold or life interest in their curacies. But these were not compensated out of the taxes, but out of the Irish Church Fund; a different thing altogether. They were not licensed for 12 months only, to conduct a trade that the State has always considered a danger to society, but they were servants of a Department of State, whose avowed object was the religious instruction of the people. There is no existing precedent which can reasonably be brought forward to justify the endowment of publicans with a freehold in the annual licences, to be paid for at full value if they are taken away in the interest of the community. It is because there is no precedent that the Government seek to set up a precedent. I am aware that the authors of this Bill deny any such intention. Speaking to the Church of England Temperance Society on May 7, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board said the Bill would

"Form no precedent for a general scheme when Parliament tackles the great question, as it must do."

Now, with all respect to the right hon. Gentleman, I must deny his conclusion. The Government may not desire to establish a precedent, but they can no more escape the logical issue of their acts on licensing than on free education, for instance. They declared last year that the grant of a sum of money for the payment of school fees in Scotland did not concede the principle of free education. But here in this very Bill is a further proposal to round the whole thing off. That they were mistaken then everybody admits to-day. They made the grant, and the principle is admitted all round. So it will be with compensation. Once lay down the law empowering Local Authorities to buy licences at the full market price, and put it in practice, and a similar result will follow. If we are to compensate publicans for refusal to renew licences, then, on the other hand, we ought to grant compensation to owners of property in every case when that property is injured by the granting of a public house licence. I have taken two districts of Liverpool, each consisting of a block of six streets. One is at Toxteth Park, on an estate owned by my hon. Friend the Member for Flint (Mr. S. Smith), and on this estate there is no public house whatever. In these six streets there are 443 houses. The poetical names of the streets are Elaine, Enid, Geraint, Gwendoline, Merlin, and Modred streets. The houses have each a five-yards frontage, and are built after a pattern which is popular in Liverpool, each having five rooms and a scullery. The income from these 443 houses last year was £8,744. Now, take the other block of streets at the other side of the city, at Everton, a pleasant district, a much healthier district than Toxteth Park, and a district very popular among the better working class. Here are 482 houses in six streets. I give the names, which are equally attractive, Bulwer, Coniston, Grassmere, Rydel, Ulswater, and Windermere streets. They are the same kind of houses, with five yards frontage, five rooms and a scullery. There is this difference, however, that there are eight public houses on the estate, and hence it is that we find the income from these 482 houses was last year £6,820, or taking 443 houses, for the sake of comparison, the income was £6,268; that is to say, a public house reduces rentals on 443 houses by £2,500 a year, 30 per cent. on the whole rental. What compensation is there for this? Sir, I remember very well, when Mr. Bruce's Bill was before the House, attending a meeting of owners and occupiers of public houses. The speakers thundered about compensation until at least one gentleman present rose and desired to put a question. I have, he said, four houses from which I derived £160 a year until a public house being opened close by, since which my rents have fallen to £90. Who is going to compensate me? Well, Sir, the chairman ruled him out of order. Now, I want to warn the Government that if they persevere with these clauses of their measure we shall be bound to put down Amendments in this direction, that if publicans claim compensation from the rates owners must claim compensation for injury to property from public houses. I do not wish to press this any further at present. We are taunted with obstructing temperance legislation, and of depriving the police of benefits—this may be conferred by our opposition to the Bill. I do not agree with this at all. There is no difficulty about police superannuation. If the Government think it is a good thing, I call upon them, whatever may be the fate of the rest of the Bill, to go on with that, but not to bracket it with proposals the Temperance Party cannot accept, and which would ruin their movement for long years to come. We may be charged with obstructing temperance legislation, but we take the responsibility of that without the slightest fear or hesitation, knowing what public opinion will be. Then we are asked to propose a compromise. There is a section of the Temperance Party which has made a proposal for compensation and agree to pay solid black mail to the trade in the shape of 10 years' lease of life. Now, will the Government accept that as a final settlement of the controversy? I do not offer it, but I tell the Government if they choose to bring in a Bill on the lines of compensation proposed by the Church of England Temperance Society, neither I nor anyone else could prevent it coming on the Statute Book. I only say this as a word of friendly advice. I make one last appeal to the Government to find some way out of the mess they have got into. I have shown no enmity to the Government, except in 1888 and again to-day; but I tell them frankly that if, by this Resolution, I could turn them out, turn them out I would with the greatest pleasure; for I consider their proposals are fraught with such danger to the whole community that I would run any risk on any other subject and rather than allow them to pass into law. You may make jokes at expressions of public opinion, but I challenge Members on the Treasury Bench to take a test of public opinion. Let them go into the streets in any district where working men live, take 100 men, and, having separated from these every teetotaller, from the remainder take an opinion whether they would consent to a farthing of the people's money being paid as compensation to publicans. I do hope the Government may accept the Amendment I bring forward. I do not see why they should not. Let them take this question out of the Bill, and keep it back until they are prepared to deal with the whole question of licensing. I am puzzled and bewildered by the action of the Government. What do they hope to get by thus dragging a furious controversy on to the back of an already overloaded Session? Do they think they can carry this Bill, the Tithes Bill, and the Irish Land Purchase Bill? Are they going to give up remedial legislation for Ireland to compensate publicans in England? If they think they can gain popularity by such a proceeding, I give very little for their judgment. Are they going to please the Church of England Temperance Society by throwing over the Tithes Bill in favour of this measure? The best thing the Government can do is to frankly avow they have committed a blunder. Other Governments have committed blunders before. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby will have something to say if they withdraw these clauses, but never mind him. His past career is not altogether free from such blunders, and he will be ready to admit that. Withdraw this Bill. Nobody wants it. I fail to find that the Government are under any trade pressure and certainly they are under none from the Temperance Party. No doubt it is an honest, bond fide attempt on the part of the Government to give effect to certain qualms of conscience awakened in them on account of the increased consumption of liquor, and I am glad their conscience is pricking them; but let them "bring forth works meet for repentance," let them withdraw the Bill or accept my Amendment, taking these clauses out and to the rest of their proposals they will find no opposition that they cannot overcome. Take these clauses out and it is a good Bill. I did at one time put down an Amendment attacking the whole Bill. I have thought better of that, and now simply attack these clauses alone. Any Member of the House can vote for my Amendment without committing himself to more than the Compensation Clauses as here drawn. I do not condemn by my Amendment any form of compensation except that contained in this Bill. We are determined to get rid of it if we can; and if we cannot, we shall open an agitation for the repeal of the measure—an agitation which will be supported not only by the Temperance Party, but by the Church of England, the Nonconformists, and every person in the community who cares for the welfare of humanity.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out all the words after the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "this House declines to assent to a Bill which provides by payment out of public moneys for the extinction of annual licences in the manner provided in the said Bill,"—(Mr. Cairns.)

—instead thereof.

(6.45.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): My hon. Friend has spoken as a teetotalter and as the acknowledged mouthpiece of the teetotalters; but I address myself to this subject from a different standpoint, for I am not a

teetotalter. Now, Mr. Speaker, apart from the owners of public houses, whom this Bill proposes to compensate, I think the people of this country may be divided into three classes—a main army and two wings. There is the first wing composed of those whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer classed as tipplers and drunkards, and I propose to leave the Government, whose coffers these gentlemen have filled, to speak for them; there is the second wing composed of the teetotalters, and for them my hon. Friend has spoken. Sir, I shall venture to speak, or, at any rate, I shall claim to speak—I do not know whether my claim will be allowed—for the great body of sober, respectable people in this country, who are not teetotalters, to whose stomachs wine is a comfort and the pleasures of Guinness's stout and Islay whisky not unknown, and yet who are so permeated with a sense of the enormous evils springing from drink traffic under our licensing system that they are prepared to march long and march far with their teetotal brethren in the path of licensing reform. Now, I said my hon. Friend is the mouthpiece of the teetotalters, and I must say, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been present during the speech, he would have complimented him upon being one of those whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer loves, for, like the right hon. Gentleman's correspondent whom he quoted in reference to the Budget, he is a patriot, although he is a Radical. My hon. Friend's views upon the Union proclaim his patriotism and his action to-day, the threats he has held out to the Government, have convinced us—some of us did not need convincing—that upon this as upon many other points my hon. Friend is a Radical still. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board spoke kindly and fairly of teetotalters in this matter, and though I am not one, and I will venture to say the majority of hon. Members are not teetotalters, I am sure the wish of the House is that the habits and practice of the right hon. Gentleman were imitated by supporters of the Government outside. For instance, I read in the Spectator for Saturday, that ancient and rather antiquated organ of philosophic Liberalism which now supports the Government—

"This effort like every other reasonable effort of the kind, is hotly opposed by temperance fanatics. Their hatred of publicans is far in excess of their love for sobriety or compassion for the drunkard, and they hope, by getting rid of the Bill, to have opportunities of gratifying their hatred in the future."

Now, Sir, is it not time that these ridiculous libels against a noble body of men should be relegated to the limbo of forgetfulness? I am not a teetotaler, as I have said; but ought we not all to recognise that these are men who take this for their principle: "If meat maketh my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." If these men are right, they are nobly right; if they are wrong, surely they are magnificently wrong. But I claim to speak as I have said for the non-teetotalers, and I shall exhibit, and I feel, no hatred for publicans, and I shall not deny to the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues recognition of the claim they make that they are making an honest effort to do something to diminish the evils of drunkenness. In the short space in which I shall address the House I shall go from the ordinary ratepayer's point of view—the ordinary citizen's point of view—straight to the point, and to my contention that this Bill is vicious in principle, and woefully insufficient for the end proposed. For my part, I think we ought, as the Americans say, to get down to "bed rock" principles in this matter. I have no desire to see public houses perish from the land. I do not want to see the day when there will be no more public houses in the country. If we could imitate the simplicity of Eastern manners, when every man away from home could go to the first tent, enter, and claim by right the hospitality of the owner, why then we could, perhaps, do without public houses; but in the present state of civilisation there must be public houses, and all that the State can do is to see that these houses are suitable for their purpose. Now, what were the public houses conceived by Parliament, and as supported by Parliament? The public house conceived by Parliament was a place of public entertainment for man and beast, where a man could take not only his liquor, but such other food as he requires, and other than alcoholic drinks; where, if he needed it, he could get a decent bed for himself and his family. Is that the public house as it exists to-day? I admit freely that there are hotels in London in large numbers answering to this description, and I admit also that in some of our large towns you can find a few such hotels; and scattered up and down among our smaller towns and villages you may find admirable public houses still fulfilling this ancient purpose of their being. But what in great majority are public houses in London and in such towns as that I represent? Instead of comfortable attendance, rest and refreshment for man and beast, you find a flaunting gin palace or a glaring long bar, where the servants who ought to be ministering to the wants of decent people stand and dispense liquors and nothing else; where the ostler and boots, whose duty in ancient times was to make travellers comfortable, are now employed as "chuckers out" when customers become unruly. I welcome any reform that may bring the public house back to its original position. I would not have public houses abolished. I would have them places of entertainment, and the sale of intoxicating liquor is not at all a necessary adjunct of the institution. You may have a multitude of public houses, in no sense of the word places for the sale of intoxicating liquors. Who is the publican now and who was he formerly? He used to be what, in a limited number of cases, he still is—a man living on the premises with his wife and family, interested to have as few unpleasantnesses as possible in his trade. His presence, with his family, was a bond for the business being properly conducted. But what is the publican now? He lives away from the mischief the public house creates, in his villa, or, it may be, in his castle, and the business is carried on by a servant—a bond-slave who does the dirty work by which his master lives, and who deserves compensation more than the man who does no work at all. The 6th clause of this Bill is extremely peculiar—

"The County Council may either, on the application of any Urban or Rural Authority, &c., enter into such agreement with persons having any interest in the premises."

Who has the interest? There is the nominal licensee. I asked the First Lord of the Treasury last week for the names of the real owners and the names of the nominal licencees. He told me he could not give them, and that it would be very expensive, costly, and inconvenient. But I can give the right hon. Gentleman some information about the town which I represent—Sunderland. It has a population of 150,000, and it is a very fair sample of the large boroughs of the country. I find that in Sunderland we have 254 fully licensed houses—I omit the houses "off" for the present. Ten firms, or 10 persons only, own no less than 154 of the 254 public houses—that is to say, three-fifths of the whole. These houses, as a rule, are big houses; for it is your fashionable brewer, who lives in his villa, who takes care to get the best houses with his accursed capital, because that capital is accursed which goes to the creation of these long bars and gin palaces. And if you proceed to compensate, four-fifths of the spoil will go to these gentlemen. As a matter of fact, in one township of Sunderland, there are 37 public houses, 28 of which are owned by two persons only. Whom do the Government propose to compensate? The clause says they will compensate the persons interested in the premises. Take these 150 public houses belonging to brewers, who live away from them. These men are the real licensees, but they put in persons who are tenants-at-will, and who can be turned out by the brewer at a moment's notice. It is very evident that the tenant-at-will cannot have any interest in the premises. It is the brewer or the owner of the house who has the interest. Therefore, this is not a Bill to compensate the poor man who does the work of the brewer for a small pittance; it is a scheme to compensate the owners of the public houses at the expense of the public at large. I am not disposed to agree to any such compensation as that. I can understand that there would be some hardships in the case of those who have invested their money in and really keep the public houses, who have been brought up to the trade, probably, all their lives, and know none other—persons who have some country village inn—if we suddenly put an end to their means of living. I would come, with such holders of public houses, to some reasonable arrangement by which time would be allowed them to convert their drinking shops into reasonable places of entertainment. There are many moderate Members on this side of the House who would not object to such a proposal as that. But there is no proposal to compensate such persons except they are owners. Inasmuch as the great majority of houses, especially in the North, are held by monopolists, who do not subject themselves to the unpleasantnesses of the trade, and who make money out of other men's labour, and the foolish arrangements of the law, I am not, for my part, disposed to agree to the compensation scheme of the Government. Who is to pay this money? It has been said that this is a compensation to be paid by drink to the sellers of drink. I dispute entirely that any portion of this money is to be paid by drink. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, on the 18th April, that if the gigantic drink bill of the nation is responsible for the police work and the pauperism, then it is certainly not out of place that the consumer of spirits should contribute in some slight degree to the cost for local purposes. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says because A B C D E and F drink that which makes them drunk and cause mischief, therefore G H J K down to Z should be asked to contribute towards the cost of the police to keep the others in order. He went a little further. He said the Customs and Excise expected some decrease in the consumption, not perhaps in the total amount of revenue by measure, but because further watering may take place in consequence of the increased duty. Am I not right in saying that it is not drink which is going to pay, but that you are going to charge people like me for extra water in order to provide a fund to compensate publicans that are bought out? My hon. Friend the Member for Barrow referred to the entire inadequacy of this Bill for the purpose in view. I find the 254 public houses in Sunderland are rated at some £21,000 a year. If you take half that rateable value as the difference between the value of the house when it is licensed and the value of the house when it is not, you get the rateable value of £10,000 a year; and if you apply the rule of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington of giving a publican 24 years' purchase, you get a total sum for Sunderland of £240,000. Assume that we should agree to extinguish half of the public houses of Sunderland, we should have to find a sum of nearly £120,000. How much does the right hon. Gentleman give us to perform this magnificent operation with? If ever we get the money, I have ascertained that it will amount to £1,233 per annum, so that the people of Sunderland would have to wait 100 years before they could get rid of one-half of the public houses of Sunderland. So inadequate is the Bill that I do not believe the right hon. Gentleman ever proposed it for the purpose of passing it into law. I believe it has been sent out as a sort of pilot vessel to ascertain the state of the weather. Finding a dark sky and a rough sea, the sooner the right hon. Gentleman gets his small vessel into harbour again the better it will be for him and his Government. The hon. Member for Burrow seemed to think there were valuable clauses in the Bill. I do not think there is a valuable clause in it. I think the principle of subventions to County Councils is so vicious in itself as to make the grant an evil, rather than a good, thing. But who says that the County Councils want grants? Why, the mining county of Durham to which I belong is so favourably circumstanced that we have not a county rate at all. Owing to the money we have borrowed, we have only a small police rate of 2d. Or take Hampshire, an agricultural county. The County Council there is so rich with subventions that they do not propose to have any rate this year—simply a small police rate of 1½d. in the £1. I am opposed to subventions out of public money, which, in my opinion, are used for the purpose of unfairly relieving property in counties of charges. It is said that the clause relating to police superannuation is an important matter. It may be as regards the counties; but as regards the boroughs we do not want this money, and we are competent and ready to take care of ourselves. The Bill is said to contain a proposal for suspending the granting of further licences. Does it? Does it contain anything more than we have at present? The right hon. Gentleman says he is going to bring in a Bill providing that no new licences are to be granted other than for removals, or transfers, except in the case of hotels, refreshment houses, and so on. But I ask the right hon. Gentleman will he tell me of a single place in the country where this is not practically the law at the present moment? For several years in the borough of Sunderland no new licences have been granted. The voice of the people of Sunderland has been so dead against the multiplication of licences that the Magistrates have been glad to adopt this course. In fact, I do not know a town or country district in which for several years past it has been the habit to grant new licences unless in the exceptional cases that have been referred to. But if the right hon. Gentleman knew as much about the North of England as he does about London, he would understand how this proposal makes the Bill offensive in my eyes. He tells us that no new licences are to be granted except by way of removal or transfer; but I say that this is the worst of the operations that have been taking place. Let me put the case of a district in a town from which the inhabitants have removed. The public houses in that district have little or no trade left. What has the brewer done? He has built new houses in the progressive parts of the town, and has persuaded the Magistrates to give up the useless licences and transfer them to other houses in the new and improving localities. This is one of the most mischievous things that could take place, and yet the right hon. Gentleman makes in his Bill the very exemption that will allow it to be done. He would permit, by the proposed transfer, the creation of big houses in lieu of the small ones, and thus make a large compensation necessary instead of a low one. Therefore I say that in so far as this Bill provides for the suspension of the granting of new licences, that is already practically secured, and that in so far as the right hon. Gentleman desires to exempt removals, he is perpetuating one of the great evils which the Bill ought to remedy. In my judgment, the restrictive clauses of the Bill are a sham. They are like most of the proposals I have heard from Her Majesty's Government since I have sat opposite them. They bring in, with a good deal of flourish, Bills which they put before the country as the means of doing great things; but when we come to examine them they are really very little. Let me illustrate this remark. They brought in an Allotment Bill which was to do no end of good; but what has become of it? They have had to bring it back, and now propose to amend it, as it was of no use. Then they brought in a Tithes Bill, which was regarded as a great measure; but it was so unsatisfactory that it was not passed into law, and having been driven out of Parliament last year, they bring it forward again in a new form this year. Then they brought in a Bill for the creation of County Councils; and wherever one goes the Conservatives say, "Oh; you must, at least, admit that the Conservative Government brought in the County Councils Bill, and that that is a great matter." Well, Sir, I know it is not very popular to say so, but I think the County Councils Act is one of the hughest shams ever passed through Parliament and palmed off on a confiding public. The County Councils are great bodies, but they have very little to do. They meet four times a year as a rule, but when they do meet they soon separate, because of the small amount of work that is put into their hands. The County Councils Act, when supplemented by a Liberal Government, may become a great measure; but, at the present moment, it is a fair illustration of what I call sham legislation. Well, then, let me ask, is it not the same with the Land Purchase Bill? They bring in a Bill for the purpose of settling the Irish land question. [An hon. MEMBER: Order!] I have simply used the Land Bill as an illustration to force my point home to the right hon. Gentleman, and I am glad it has succeeded. They bring in an Irish Land Bill, and they propose to settle that question with one quarter of the money that will be necessary to settle it. Their Licensing and Suspensory Bill is of the same character. It pretends to do what is being already done, and it refrains from doing whatever of a valuable nature it might do. The mere fact that a Suspensory clause is in the Bill is not sufficient to induce me, notwithstanding my objection to compensation, to vote for the Second Reading of the Bill. I conclude that this Bill is in its financial aspect unnecessary, and inadequate, and that it is, therefore, my bounden duty to give it my continuous opposition, because it takes money from the wrong people, and gives it to the wrong people, and because it introduces by a side-wind an unjust and novel principle, which, if effect be given to it, will at one stroke of the pen add £200,000,000 to the liabilities of the nation. I beg to second the Amendment.

Mr. Storey

(7.22.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): Before I proceed to follow the general remarks contained in the two speeches to which I have just listened in support of the Amendment, I desire to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. I am sorry to see that he has just left the House; but I have no doubt the appeal I venture to make will be conveyed to him. I have been requested by one of my constituents, a most respectable licensed victualler, who lives in the constituency I have the honour to represent, to bring to the remembrance of the right hon. Gentleman a most solemn and explicit pledge which that right hon. Gentleman gave to him at the time he was a candidate for Westminster in the year 1880. That pledge was contained in a letter written in answer to one addressed to the right hon. Gentleman by my constituents asking what would be his conduct in regard to a Permissive Bill, Local Option, and similar proposals. The right hon. Gentleman, whose letter I hold in my hand, after replying to some of the questions addressed to him, proceeded thus—and I ask the House to take particular notice of the words here used—

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Did the hon. Member give notice to my right hon. Friend that he was going to quote that letter?

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: I am sorry to say I did not give him notice; but I have no doubt that the fact of my referring to this point will be brought to his attention, and he will have an opportunity, in the later period of the Debate, to reply. These are the words I desire to quote—

"I may add that I should strongly oppose any legislation which should overlook the fact that immense capital has been embarked in your trade in the ordinary expectation that the trade would not be interfered with."

That letter was written to Mr. D. Gupwell, of the Talbot Hotel, Clarendon Road, North Kensington, and was dated February 10, 1880. That gentleman entirely accepted the solemn pledge given by the right hon. Gentleman. I do not know how he voted; but he spoke and acted at the time in a manner friendly to the right hon. Gentleman. I am aware that since the time when the right hon. Gentleman gave that pledge a good deal of somewhat intemperate language has been used all over the country by a portion, and I believe only a section, of the Temperance Party. I may say here that I regard myself, although a very humble Member of the Conservative Party, as a Member of the Temperance Party, and a supporter of the views of that portion of the Temperance Party which is temperate in its wishes, its language, and its expectations, namely, the Church of England Temperance Association, whose views I believe will ultimately be successful in this country. I have myself received very strong representations of various kinds from those who are opposed to the Bill, and who are at the same time supporters of a temperance movement. I may say that some of those gentlemen threaten me with all sorts of dreadful consequences for my action in this matter; but not one of them has ever yet voted for me, or is likely to vote for me in the future, nor for that matter for any person belonging to the Party with which I have the honour to be connected. I have mentioned the fact of my belonging to one section of the Temperance Party, which is the section that I regard as temperate in its wishes and expectations. We have been told that when the Temperance Brigade were out on parade there was not a single sober man in Ballyhooly; and I venture to think that intemperance of speech on this subject is not altogether confined to the Sister Island. Since the proposals of the Government have seen the light an attempt has been made by a section of the Temperance Party to make the question of what may be called permissive compensation a sort of principle of the whole Temperance Party. It has been pressed upon the view of the public that a man cannot properly be said to be an advocate of temperance unless he opposes everything in the form of payment for the extinction of licences. If this were so, it would seem that the object of the temperance movement was not the extinction of drunkenness, or the suppression of those crimes that spring from drunkenness, but hostility to the persons who are engaged in the Licensed Victuallers' trade. It seems to me that an attempt is being made to transfer to the licensed victuallers that hostility which I venture to think would far better be shown against the trade itself and the abuse of the trade. All I can say is that the trade of the licensed victualler has been always recognised by law. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer showed clearly that in regard to taxation a certain amount of interest in this trade has been recognised by law. In regard both to the Probate Duties and to other taxation, the taxes have been levied on the value of the licensed premises regarded not merely as houses but as houses possessing licences. I confess that I should be ashamed to be associated with any friends of temperance legislation who would insist on attacking the property of those engaged in the traffic rather than the abuses of the traffic. I agree that my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board would possibly be well advised in introducing some alterations in Committee to meet the objections of the hon. Member for Barrow with regard to the possibility of speculations in licences. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Barrow that anything like an encouragement to speculators in licences should, if possible, be prevented. But clearly such a matter as this is one for Committee, and ought not to enter into the discussion at this stage. Admitting that the abuse of the drink traffic is sinful, I agree with the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) that the traffic itself is really very necessary for the comfort of many of us. Even if we grant, for the sake of argument, that the traffic itself is sinful, surely that is not any reason why the Legislature should act unjustly to those who are engaged in it. Many hon. Members will have in their minds the old maxim of John Wesley, to the effect that while you hate and attack the sin, you should love the sinner. I want to ask the House whether, if we assume that the object of the temperance movement is to restrain intemperance, and not to punish publicans, that object will not be greatly assisted by the proposals of the Government in this Bill. It is perfectly obvious that the effect of this Bill will be in a way to grease the wheels, if I may use a familiar term, of the temperance movement. For a long time past the strongest opposition to the temperance movement has undoubtedly been aroused by the fact that very great personal suffering and personal loss must accrue from any large extinction of existing licences. If we can obtain the great boon of extinction of a number of unnecessary, and, therefore, pernicious licences, is it not well we should do so, provided we can do it by fair, honourable, and honest means? This brings me to the one question which I, as a temperance advocate, think this House should consider with regard to these proposals of the Government, and that is whether, allowing that they will put an end to a great deal of opportunity for drunkenness, they are in themselves such as we can approve, as moral, expedient, and non-injurious to the taxpayers of this country? The method proposed by the Government for obtaining a fund with which to purchase the extinction of licences aimed at under this Bill seems to answer this question in the affirmative. Who are to provide the funds? The licensed victuallers themselves. The liquor traffic is to be taxed in order to obtain the means of extinguishing the most injurious portion of the trade. Therefore, no taxpayer will be one penny the worse for this proposal. No one can doubt that, under the operation of this Bill, a large number of licences will become extinct, and that at once marks the proposal as being desirable in the cause of temperance and morality. I am free to admit that the proposals of the Government are also expedient from the point of view of the publicans themselves. It is quite true that the extinction of some of these more injurious licences will possibly enhance the value of those which remain. Therefore, the trade itself will endure the imposition of the tax necessary for the purpose of extinguishing the licences. I say, then, that these proposals have this very great advantage, that, whilst they are compatible with national honesty and morality and injure no class, they will benefit all. I have already given reasons for regarding the proposals of the Government as entirely compatible with morality. If the Government had not proposed to pay for the extinction of these licences, it is clear that they would have been taking away—I will not say a vested interest, because it is clear that the interest exists for a twelve-month; but, at any rate, an interest that has been recognised by the law of the country for many years, and which is practically recognised and understood by everyone, and especially by the trade itself in its purchases. Therefore, I say that the proposals of the Government, while they are expedient and will promote the cause of temperance, are also compatible with the interests of morality. I shall accordingly support the Bill most readily, and I do hope that there will be found amongst those on the opposite side who, like myself, are moderate advocates of temperance, many who will come over and help the Government with this most important measure.

* (7.41.) MR. WAYMAN (York, W.R., Elland): If ever there are times when constituencies require to be represented by the voices of their Members as well as by their votes, I think this is unquestionably one of them. I have never, during the time I have sat in this House, received so many letters on any subject as I have received on the subject now under discussion, and all those letters are most strongly antagonistic to the proposals of the Government on the question before the House. Two years ago it was brought home to the Government that the compensation proposals in the licensing scheme of the Local Government Bill were proposals which the country was strongly averse to, and I think the Government showed great prudence in retreating before the storm they had provoked. However, there was no good reason why they should have retreated from the whole of their licensing scheme. No doubt there was much in the whole licensing scheme which might have been adopted with advantage and satisfaction to the country. The hon. Member for Barrow laid the country under obligation by his opposition to the licensing scheme of the Government two or three years ago; but he would have laid it under a deeper obligation still if he had succeeded in inducing the Government to confer power on the County Councils to close public houses on Sundays, or in compelling them to give way to those who would have done so. The Government, however, do not seem to have learned much from their past experience, or they would not have made such proposals as those now under discussion. There was, two years ago, some excuse for them, because at that time a widespread feeling prevailed to the effect that there was a kind of freehold in licences, and the Solicitor General very firmly expressed an opinion to that effect. That opinion, I am quite aware, was roughly handled by the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries; but it was quite open to the Government to consider that the opinion of their Solicitor General was at least worth as much as that of the Member for Dumfries. Since then, however, the Queens' Bench Division and the Appeal Court have upheld the opinion expressed by the Member for Dumfries, and have knocked into a cocked hat the opinion of the Solicitor General. I do not doubt that the Government are perfectly sensible of the evils which result to this country from excessive drinking. I do not doubt either that they desire that the temptations to drink shall be sensibly reduced. I believe, as the President of the Local Government Board told us to-night, that the intentions of the Government are good; but we are told that a certain place, which I need not describe, is paved with good intentions. We want something more than good intentions. We want the Government to act with some degree of common sense, and with some perception of the feeling of the nation. There is nothing in the Bill which will compel a man to sell his licence, and a publican will refuse to do so except on terms which will yield him as great advantages as would the retention of his licence. I cannot see that the measure will be of much advantage in promoting the cause of temperance, which the Government profess to have so much at heart. I do not believe that the country will agree to leave things as they are, or to pay a most exorbitant price for the purchase of licences. The Government are impaled on one or other of the two horns of a dilemma. Either they must give a licence-holder all he may demand for it, or they must leave it where it is. They have made up their mind that the drinking habits of the people shall be seriously considered, but no remedy can be successful unless it is applied in a most drastic manner, and certainly very different from what is the case in this Bill. I was very pleased to hear the hon. Member for Barrow say that if the Government were to accept the compromise proposed by the Church of England Temperance Society he would not oppose that compromise. It is practically carrying out a proposal made in this House, 20 years ago, by Lord Aberdare, and it has also been made recently in the Times by Sir Thomas Farrer, and I believe such a compromise would be perfectly reasonable. There has, no doubt, been a notion that licence holders should not be disturbed in the possession of these licences so long as they hold them without reproach. In these circumstances we feel that whenever the question is settled it must be settled by some kind of compromise; and that to which I refer is a kind of compromise to which the House might safely commit itself. We have been told by the Government that they intend that all the powers which are now possessed by Licensing Justices shall be reserved. These include the power both of granting and of refusing licences. By this arrangement we should have Licensing Justices doing one thing and the County Councils doing another. There would be a most ridiculous conflict of authority, and confusion and displeasure would reign as between one authority and the other. I have great pleasure in supporting the Amendment, and in expressing my obligations to the Member for Barrow for the able, comprehensive, and masterly manner in which he has laid it before the House.

\(7.52.)* MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): It is said, "Why give the powers proposed in this Bill, as the Justices already have power to refuse licences?" Well, that may possibly be the law. It is disputed, but supposing that it is the law, I should like to know what Licensing Justices take advantage of it? Speaking for myself, and those Justices with whom

I serve, we feel the greatest difficulty in refusing the licence of a public house when it is well conducted and nothing is brought against it, although there is not the slightest doubt that in many villages there is a surplussage of public houses. I know a village in which there are three public houses, although two would be sufficient, and although we might possibly have power to suppress one, where all are equally well conducted it would be very unfair to single one out for destruction in preference to either of the others. Some years ago a public house in a small village was put up for sale, and it appeared to me that, as it was not wanted, it would be a good thing for the community if it were bought up and the licence extinguished. The value of the house was intrinsically £400, and when it was put up to auction, with the licence, it sold for £1,500. I could not afford to give so much, as it would have meant a loss of £1,100. The money was not subscribed by temperance friends; but under this Bill there would be a power of getting the money from the publicans themselves if it were desired to abolish such licences. I think the free-and-easy way in which transfers are often effected is a great evil, and I should like to see some change made in this direction. I disagree with the theory that large owners ought not to be compensated, because, in my opinion, simple justice requires that, if we are going to compensate one man, we should compensate all. I am not interested in any kind of brewers, but I recognise that theirs is a legitimate trade. There are a good many most honourable men who are brewers, and I think it a great shame to throw their trade in their teeth, and to say that because they are brewers they must be bad men. The brewing trade, to a certain extent, is a necessity, especially in England. Beer is a very good and harmless thing, if taken in moderation, and as we know it cannot be got without the brewer, I think it is hard to abuse the brewers. I feel very much indebted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for having introduced the clauses with regard to the superannuation of the police. In the county I represent, the Superannuation Fund is getting exhausted, that fund having been started when the police first came into existence, about 50 years ago. At first all went well, owing to the subscriptions of the men, who were all young, but after 20 or 25 years, the police began to draw largely on the fund, and it was found too small to pay the pensions. The consequence is that every year it is necessary to sell out a certain amount of stock. If it were not that we have funded property, we should be unable to bear the strain, and I believe that many other counties are similarly situated. I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what we are to do with this money when we get it? In aid of police superannuation we are to get £150,000, roughly speaking, £3,000 for each county. That would be amply sufficient for our county; but are we to understand that we are to have £3,000, comparatively speaking, every year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's Hanover Square): It will be an annual grant.

*MR. JEFFREYS: Then I think we ought to congratulate ourselves still more. With the aid of the grant we shall be able to put our Superannuation Fund in a thoroughly good state, and we shall get a better class of men, because they will know that their pensions are safe. I suppose the money will be allotted to the counties according to their number of police; indeed, I do not see any other fair way of allocating it. It certainly would be rather unfair that the counties which have managed their finance badly should receive as much as those counties which have managed their finance well. But the distribution of this grant, and also of the grants in respect of licensing and county finance is a mere matter of detail, which may be safely left to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Certainly, all county Members ought to unite in thanking the right hon. Gentleman for having given us the money, which will be a very great relief to our local burdens.

(8.30.) MR. J. WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I rise to address the House as a Scotch Member on this question of compensation to publicans, on which Scotch people are much interested; and I should fail in my duty if I did not declare that all classes of the Temperance Party, and, in a large measure, non-temperance parties, are opposed to any proposal of compensation on the lines laid down in the Bill. I speak in no spirit of ill-feeling towards the trade, although, personally, I have been an abstainer for many long years. I do not now speak so much as an abstainer as on behalf of my countrymen generally, the great majority of whom I am persuaded are opposed to these clauses. I do not object to be twitted as a fanatic, because, on principle, I am and have long been an abstainer. I have been impelled to this course as the result of long connection with the working classes, whom I have sought to influence by example. Often and often have I been told by workmen that it has been a temptation well nigh impossible to resist to pass the many public houses on their way home on pay day. My own experience as an employer of labour in Govan is that it is with the intention of tempting workmen that public houses are established. Three public houses were planted down at Govan; and my conviction has been increased that these licences tend to demoralise the community among whom they exist. With every word of the Amendment I cordially concur; and I hope the House which has listened to the exposition of the nature of this Bill, and the very damaging statistics my hon. Friend has brought to bear against the Government proposal, will show by its vote that it has no sympathy with the idea of public compensation to publicans. The licensing system in Scotland is somewhat different from that in England. In Scotland we do not license houses, but individuals, and hence it is that, though sometimes large sums are paid for a licence, they do not rise to the amount paid in England. In England I find you not only pay for the individual right to a licence, but you pay for the freehold right so far as the property is concerned. In Scotland, as a Justice of the Peace, it has often struck me with surprise to find how large a sum of money passes on the transfer of a licence, which might, in the ordinary course, be refused without even cause shown. But the transfer is taken for granted. I have known as much as £2,000 passing on the transfer. In England it is somewhat different, and I should say that any one who pays for a licence and buys the right to sell liquor does a very risky business. There is a common idea abroad that the Licensing Authorities, in granting a licence, are supposed to confer a blessing on the community. At all events, I know that in Scotland the one thing for the Justices to consider is whether the licence will be for the public weal, and if it is not, then the licence should not be granted. But a system has got into practice by which the Justices are beset by the landlord, the individual who wants the licence, and their friends to induce the Justices to grant a privilege to the individual to which he has no right or title, and yet people have got it into their heads that in the event of the public weal demanding that a licence should be taken away, compensation must be given to the individual. I dispute the principle on which compensation for the non-renewal of licences is advocated, and contend that as Magistrates have the power to grant a licence for the public weal, without the slightest reference to compensation for non-renewal, so they have the power to withdraw or refuse the licence if the public interest requires it. I hold that the value and goodwill of a licence are entirely in the discretion or power of the Licensing Authority. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that there is no desire by this measure to take away the power of the Magistrates to refuse licences without compensation, and yet he would give County Councils—quite another authority, and not the Licensing Authority—power to buy up licences. Why, there are no Magistrates anywhere who would put themselves in the invidious position of taking away a licence when the Government have actually provided the County Councils with money to buy it. I urge, further, that the sum of £50,000 to be given to the County Councils of Scotland under the Bill is an absurdly inadequate amount. It is scarcely sufficient to touch the fringe of the question. The amount is at the rate of £1,600 per county, while in Lanarkshire alone there are 5,000 public houses, and in Glasgow between 1,700 and 1,800. I am sure if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would look the thing in the face, he would see the futility of going to the country with such a proposal, putting an extra sixpence on the Spirit Duty, and coupling with it the sop of superannuation for the police, and the assistance to education. Why, Scotland would rather forego both these advantages than be saddled with the monstrous iniquity of having to pay compensation for licences they want to do away with. Only last year in Govan the Justices had before them an application from a licensee who had lived for a considerable time in the borough. His lease had run out, and he had quarreled with his landlord, who claimed the licence should be transferred to him, while the licensee insisted upon his claim, but very wisely, as I think, the Justices refused the licence to either party. They were justified, as I contend, in the interest of the public weal. If public houses are a public benefit, how is it that the influence of the more wealthy classes prevents the existence of more than one small public house within the residential districts of Hillside and Kelvinside, near Glasgow? The whole system of licensing is one of gross corruption to the community. Wherever public houses are thickly planted in a community there crime, immorality, trouble, and misery increase. Whisky and morality cannot exist together. If we acted rightly we should take a very different course to that proposed in this Bill. Earlier this evening the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) said in his benevolence and wisdom, surely we would never consent to bring ruin upon the wives and families of publicans, but he had not a word to say for the wives and families ruined by this trade. These to the families of publicans are as 100 to 1, and anyone who knows anything of the masses of the working classes will not let this tenderness stand in the way of sweeping away, to a large extent, the sources of this immorality, misery, and crime that afflict humanity. Publicans often get a licence apart from any consideration of the welfare of the district where the licence is to be used. Some two years ago I was on the Bench when an application for a licence was made, and one reason put forward for it was that the applicant had a wife and 15 children. The Justices could not hold this a reason for granting the licence, and the man was respectfully told that he must find some other occupation to provide the means of maintaining his family than that of keeping a public house. With some people there is a kind of fascination about the keeping of a public house, perhaps because the work is not hard and the profits are large. People acquire a licence simply for enriching themselves, and in no degree in the interest of the community. I was struck with one observation of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie). He told temperance advocates that the time was not ripe for a local veto, but if he were in his place now I could assure him that the people of Scotland are perfectly ready for a local veto. We have taken a plébiscite over large cities and towns, with the result that five to one of the people who are taxpayers are in favour of a local veto being put into the hands of the people themselves, and of this I am quite sure, that what would be invidious on the part of Justices and Magistrates in boroughs would not be invidious on the part of the people themselves, who would declare what licences should be granted and what withheld. I hope that when the right hon. Gentleman again considers this question he will eliminate from his view any idea that Scotland, at any rate, is not ripe for such legislation. The majority of Scotch Members are pledged up to the hilt for a local veto, and I hope they will remember their pledges to their constituents. I feel satisfied they will do so, and will not vote in favour of a proposal which is opposed to the right of the people to protect themselves against the planting of public houses in their midst. I may tell the right hon. Gentleman that so far as Scotland is concerned the "heather is on fire" on this subject. I speak for the united Temperance Party, the Good Templars, the Scotch Temperance League, the Scotch Permissive Bill Association, and many other temperance organisations in the country, and on their behalf I protest against anything being done in the manner proposed in this Bill to entail a burden on the people for the compensation of publicans, a principle which, in the general interest, should be condemned by the House of Commons.

*(8.55.) MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I am quite sure that everyone who has heard the speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down will give him every credit for enthusiasm in the cause of temperance he so ably advocates. But there are others who, actuated by the same motives, do not take the same views as the hon. Member. There are some on both sides of the House who think that something ought to be done, and done immediately, and who are not willing to wait until a large and comprehensive scheme is perfected and brought before the House for dealing with this very great question? Although I, for one, would rather see such a measure for dealing with the whole of the United Kingdom, yet I am thankful that the Government have seen fit to take up this question, and have turned their attention to the extent to which the drink traffic has grown. It cannot be denied that it is this which has prompted the Government to this legislation. Knowing well the difficulty of carrying a large measure through the House of Commons, I presume they thought they might still do something in the direction of diminishing drinking by diminishing the number of public houses, and hence the introduction of this measure. The measure divides into two sections. By one, the public houses are to be reduced in number by no further licences being issued, and by the other, and upon what we may call the "betterment" principle, the extra toll levied on drink is to be devoted to buying up certain public houses. It would have been matter of grievance if the Government had proposed fresh taxation in order to buy up public houses, but when, to diminish the number, the tax falls heavier on the remainder, I think it is a method to which we should not object. No one can doubt for a moment that one of the greatest evils to Scotland is the enormous consumption of whisky. But you cannot stop drinking by Resolutions and Acts of Parliament. We know perfectly well what would happen if we attempted it, and those of us who have travelled in the United States know that where State Legislatures have imposed very stringent laws against the sale of intoxicating liquors, these laws have failed in effect, and that, in a certain time, a man could go to various shops, and, under various names be furnished with raw spirits. You cannot entirely forbid the drinking of alcoholic liquors, although many hon. Gentlemen opposite apparently wish to do so. Hon. Members ought to welcome any means by which the number of public houses may be diminished. The Government have been animated by a good motive in this matter; they have told us that this question must be dealt with step by step, and I venture to submit that this measure will not be passed in vain if it does some good, however slight; therefore, temperance advocates should assist us in passing it. Hon. Members say it will be unworkable; then let them pass the Second Reading, and endeavour to amend it in Committee. The Bill will not interfere with the present jurisdiction of the Licensing Authority; it does not prejudice the principle of compensation, for that principle may be discussed at some future period. The Government have already promised certain Amendments in the Bill; they have told us it shall not prejudice the general question of compensation. I should like to draw attention to the position in which publicans now stand. It is an artificial position. Publicans are very properly surrounded by the watchfulness of a vigilant police, in return for having a share in the monopoly of drink. But because they have that share it does not follow that each individual publican is enriching himself by pursuing a trade legalised by the law. If he is well behaved, and if his business is conducted properly, he may hope to continue a servant of the public. Then will this House ever sanction his being turned out of his house neck and crop, simply because the Licensing Magistrates have allowed him to pursue a legitimate trade, and then suddenly withdraw his licence. I think hon. Members opposite would be among the last to beggar such a man. It is not the publicans they dislike; it is the system to which they are opposed. The great difficulty arises from the system of tied houses. Until within the last few years there were no such houses in Scotland, and in that country, therefore, that difficulty can be easily dealt with. But in England most of the brewers own tied houses, and there the great difficulty of solving this problem will come in. Suppose that this Bill became law would it be possible to adopt any other mode of compensation other than purchase? The suggestion which has been made of giving a man a vested interest in his house for 10 years involves the principle of compensation. We must not drive rough-shod, to use the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, over a frank recognition of this principle. We ought to look this question fairly in the face. This Bill is a step in the right direction. By passing it we shall be endeavouring to diminish drinking and to lessen the number of public houses, and I maintain that everybody who is interested in the temperance cause ought to vote for the Second Reading of the Bill. It has been termed an unrighteous Bill because it proposes to give public money for the extinction of licences. It will not give a shilling of public money compulsorily for that purpose. Then again, it is said it is unfair to affirm the principle in a Budget Bill, which affirms other principles. But the hon. Member for Barrow knows that it would have been impossible to carry a Bill for each separate proposal in the Bill. I thank the Government for attempting to carry a measure having as its sole object the promotion of temperance.

*(9.14.) Mr. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I think the hon. Gentleman who last spoke entirely misunderstood the object of this Bill. He seemed to think the person to be compensated under the Bill was the licensee. But the fact is, it is not proposed to give a shilling of compensation to the publican unless he happens to have an interest in the house; the compensation will go entirely to the owners.

*Mr. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman has made a statement which I am bound to contradict. It is perfectly clear that if the licensee has an interest he will be entitled to compensation under the Bill.

*Mr. J. B. ROBERTS: What compensation will a licensee who is only a tenant at will get? I contend that, under this Bill, he will not receive a farthing.

*Mr. RITCHIE: If the man is only tenant at will he can be turned out without compensation, and almost without notice; but I imagine the great bulk of the licensees hold on very different terms from that. I believe they hold on a much more secure tenure.

*Mr. J. B. ROBERTS: The right hon. Gentleman's explanation fully bears out my contention, which is that the licensee takes compensation in proportion to his interest in the tenancy. If, for instance, he holds a lease for 10 or 20 years he will be compensated in the proportion which the value of his lease bears to the value of the freehold. The compensation here paid will be exactly the same as in the case of a railway company which takes land, the amount of compensation that goes to the tenant is in proportion to the length of his tenancy which has still to run, and has no reference whatever to any permanent loss of occupation. If a railway company cuts through land held on a yearly tenancy the tenant is only compensated to the extent of the value of a year's occupancy. Reference has been made to cases such as that of the Irish curates and tax collectors, who have been compensated, but these instances bear no similarity to the present compensation proposals. Those are cases in which persons who have spent years of their lives in a profession or calling, and have thus become unfitted for any other, were compensated on being deprived of their occupation. But this is a proposal to compensate for loss of alleged property, which compensation will mainly go, not to the man who has carried on the public house business, but to the owner of the public house. But let me revert to the case of the Irish curate. Suppose the cases of such curates living in poor and thinly populated districts, and therefore occupying houses above the quality of the houses suited to the poor inhabitants of the district. The curates' houses becoming vacant owing to the abolition of curacies, and being practically unlettable to anybody else. If the compensation had been based on the principle of this Bill, it would, in the case put, have gone to the landlord of the depreciated house. But there the compensation was given, not to the landlord, but to the tenant, who was deprived of his calling or profession. No Legislature in the world would dream of compensating a landlord under such circumstances. The President of the Local Government Board has argued in favour of this proposal from the fact that Probate Duty is paid in respect of the value of the licence. The hon. Member for Barrow has controverted that point, and he has thrown considerable doubt upon it. But whether Probate Duty is paid or not, I quite admit that it ought to be paid. No doubt, if a house is licensed, there is a probability that the licence will be continued, and just as a man pays for goodwill and probable benefit therefrom, he should pay for the probability of the licence being renewed. Probability had a market value. But that is no reason why a probability should be converted into a certainty. Precisely in the same manner Probate Duty is paid on the goodwill of a deceased solicitor's practice, and the executors sell it, but they only sell the chance or probability that the clients will continue the business in the same office. If the clients decline to do so the purchaser cannot say to them, "I brought your future business, and the executors paid Probate Duty on it. It is, therefore, property, and you must continue it, or give compensation." It is clear that there would be no legal or moral claim for compensation from the clients, the executors, or the Inland Revenue. The public, or the State as representing the public, is in exactly the same position with regard to continuing the licence as the clients with regard to continuing their business. It may continue the licence or not. It is perfectly unfettered, and the discontinuance gives no claim for compensation, because the probability of continuance had a money value as long as such probability existed. It ought to be borne in mind that this value attaching to a licence is only of recent growth. It has practically been called into existence by the success of the temperance movement. Twenty or 30 years ago there was no value whatsoever in a licence, for any respectable person could obtain a licence just as a game-seller's licence is now obtainable; and it is only when the Temperance Party turned public attention to the possibility of reducing intemperance by restricting the number of public houses, and when Parliament adopted that view and passed the legislation which commenced in 1870, that the value of licensed property became specially valuable. Since then the Licensing Authorities have shown great disinclination to grant new licences, and those already granted have thus gained an artificial value. Under these circumstances, it seems to me most monstrous that compensation should be given for what has thus been called into existence by the exertions of the Temperance Party. At the time the value of the licences was increased there ought to have been a commensurate increase in the amount of duty imposed, so that the benefit of the monopoly should accrue not to the licence holders, but to the public at large. There is one other point. I see Clause 9 of the Bill enacts that in estimating the value of an interest in any licensed premises, no account is to be taken of increased value "due to the operation of this Act." How is it possible to work this Bill with that clause? The increased value will appertain to the licence in spite of any legislation. If you buy one public house, of necessity you increase the value of the neighbouring public house. Under the circumstances, this Bill will be totally inoperative to enable the County Council to buy the second licence, for the reason that it is permissive and not compulsory. Therefore, the owner of the second licence would never sell unless he got the increased value.

*MR. RITCHIE: This is a saving clause, which has been put into the Bill with reference to any legislation which Parliament might give assent to of a compulsory character. Suppose Parliament were to change the Licensing Authority, and were to give complete power to refuse a renewal and to propose compensation, then this clause would, in the event of purchase under any Act of that kind, prevent the increased value to which the hon. Member refers from being taken into account.

*MR. J. B. ROBERTS: How can you gauge the respective values due to legislation and to previous purchase by the County Council. It appears to me to be utterly impossible. We know that where a public body is dealing with public money, not coming directly out of the pockets of the ratepayers, as a rule it is most generous in giving compensation. Under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 10 per cent is paid for compulsory purchase.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): That is not so.

*MR. J. B. ROBERTS: The Act does not say so, but we all know that the theory of valuers is that 10 per cent. should be paid, but that the practice is to give more than 10 per cent. That will be the case here, and we may be sure that compensation will be paid utterly irrespective of Clause 9.

*(9.35.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Ty-rone S.): Mr. Speaker, I say frankly, in the few words I have to address to the House, that I wish the Government had left this question alone; but since we are face to face with the Bill I want to point this out first of all. The discussion has proceeded so far on the assumption that the law with regard to licences is the same in the three kingdoms. It is not. In Ireland every publican has a freehold in his licence. That was decided in 1877. The Recorder of Dublin considered that he had the same right to refuse to transfer a licence as to grant it, and in the Clitheroe case he did refuse to transfer the licence, on the ground that the house was not required. The case was brought before the Queen's Bench in Dublin, and that Court held that when a man had received a licence in Ireland it could only be taken away on two distinct grounds—either on the ground of the bad character of the holder of the licence, or on the ground that the house had been badly conducted. The discussion, therefore, ought not to proceed on the assumption that the law is necessarily the same in all parts of the United Kingdom. The Bill proposes that a certain sum shall be set aside to purchase public houses. That is held to involve the question of compensation. What is the law now, if any Corporation or public company desire to clear an area for public improvements? I will take one example. Twenty years ago the South City Markets Company in Dublin proposed to erect markets, and they had to purchase a great area in the centre of the city, one of those festering spots which are a disgrace to great cities. They had to purchase the property upon that area, including 15 public houses, and they had to pay for those houses out of the funds of the company. They have been embarrassed ever since. In several cases where they did not accept arbitration the cases went to a jury, and the jury, guided by Lord Justice Barry, decided that the payment of compensation was strictly according to law. The company found that if they were to take the public houses they must pay the value of them. If a Corporation purchases the funds will come out of the rates. What this Bill proposes to do is to supply the funds whereby the work of purchase can be done, that fund coming from the consumption of alcoholic liquor. My hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and myself have stood on the same platform in this matter for 30 years. But I am going to vote against my hon. Friend to-night. I will tell the right hon. Member for Derby why. Because I have not the slightest confidence in the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman presided at the annual meeting of the United Kingdom Alliance last October, but he presided at publicans' banquets before, and he was quite as happy at the one as the other.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I never did.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The right hon. Gentleman did at Oxford. I remember the right hon. Gentleman sneering at temperance legislation as grandmotherly legislation. If my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow is prepared to wait for the right hon. Gentleman I am not; for if the right hon. Gentleman were on the benches opposite next year he would eat every word he has said on this question, as he has done on political questions. I heard the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow to-night. My objection to it is that I heard speeches like it 20 years ago against Mr. Bruce's proposals. I was in the Lobby then, and I heard such speeches when the Bill was before the House. I heard such speeches at excited public meetings against Mr. Bruce's proposals, and there is not a man who made those speeches who would not to-night be delighted if he could get Mr. Bruce's proposals. I have a letter from one of seven brothers, warm supporters of temperance legislation, in which the writer says that there is no public act of his life which he has ever regretted so much as his opposition to Mr. Bruce's Bill; that its opponents did inestimable injury to the cause of temperance; that they were warned, but that they were deaf to everything but Sir Wilfrid Lawson's jokes. Mr. Bruce's proposals were scornfully rejected by the friends of temperance, and they have been in the wilderness ever since. The persons to blame for the rejection of Mr. Bruce's Bill were not the publicans—though they were insane against it—but the temperance leaders, who calmly folded their arms, and because the Bill did not contain all they wanted, would have none of it. I am not going to make any such mistake now. The Temperance Party have been fighting for 50 years, they have done much through moral suasion, they have won over many, and they have passed three Sunday Closing Acts. That is all that they have done. The evil is a gigantic one. It covers the whole land. It is time for this House to face it. After 35 years of hard fighting, I have made up my mind that the work can never be done without recognising the equitable claims of publicans—I do not say legal claims—and I will be no party to standing any longer in the way, fighting for what we shall never get. Let no one tell me of what right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench will do. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian is committed as deeply as anyone to the principle of compensation. I do not say that the right hon. Member for Derby is committed to anything. Having been fighting in this cause for many years, I cannot find it in my conscience to stand up against the proposals of the Bill.

*(9.45.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I was anxious to rise after the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, for, like the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Barrow, I am one of the oldest supporters of the temperance movement in this House; and I may add that among the official Members on the Front Benches on either side of the House I have been the longest and the most consistent supporter of what are generally called the extreme views of the Temperance Party. I think the hon. Member for South Tyrone has been deceived by a false analogy. I will not enter into a discussion as to who were to blame for the rejection of the Bill of Lord Aberdare; but I am inclined to think that the hon. Member for South Tyrone has given an account of the defeat of that measure which was not dictated by prejudice. There is, doubtless, a good deal in what he has said; but I would rather put aside the question whether Lord Aberdare's Bill was defeated by the unseen opposition of the publicans or the ill-judged opposition of the extreme Temperance Party. [A VOICE: "Apathy."] Well, apathy; still it was defeated, and we have a right to draw from it a lesson. But I utterly deny that the lesson which the hon. Member drew from the defeat of Lord Aberdare's Bill was the right one. Does the hon. Gentleman think that the Bill of the present Government can be named on the same day as the Bill of Lord Aberdare, either for what it does for good or for what it does for evil. For my part, I think, and I will undertake to show before I sit down, that the Bill of the Government does little or nothing in the right direction, whereas it does a very great deal to kill the hopes of the Temperance Party. The hon. Member for South Tyrone cannot bring upon himself to wait; he has forced the battle till he was on the eve of being triumphant; a few more years and one more General Election, such as we on this side hope we may have, returning a majority of men who wish to carry out the views of the great body of the citizens, and what the Temperance Party has been labouring for so long will be carried. The hon. Member has talked with great knowledge of the change that has come over the world on this subject; he has shown how the views of the Temperance Party had been brought to bear so strongly upon the Magistrates that licensing, which at one time was a mere method of choosing a respectable occupant of a public house, has changed to a method of choosing what shall be the number of public houses, and that it is only a step from that point to bring public opinion to bear on the legislation of this House, so that in a few years the battle in which the hon. Member for South Tyrone has been engaged would have been won. But I say that our efforts for victory will be neutralised by this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board quoted a good many passages from newspapers. I will quote one passage from a newspaper—a passage of great importance, because it is from a newspaper singularly qualified to deal with the two main questions before us—first, as to whether this Bill involved the doctrine of compensation for public houses; and, secondly, as to whether the fund for this purpose is to come from the publicans themselves. I will read a few lines from the Economist, a financial paper supporting Her Majesty's Government—

"It is idle to contend that the Government proposals do not recognise the publicans' claim to compensation because they merely authorise County Councils to come to terms with any publicans they may wish to sell out. The fact that the taxpayers are called on to contribute to a fund which must be used to buy out the publicans, or not used at all, does unquestionably put the question of compensation on a different footing from that on which it stands at present, and if the question is dealt with at all, it should be dealt with thoroughly. That, however, is clearly impossible this Session, and the time that must be lost in forcing through an imperfect measure can be much better employed."

On this question of compensation to the publicans as having to be found out of the ordinary taxes, I consider the dictum of the Economist to be absolutely authoritative. To pay the publicans compensation out of the Spirit Duties is precisely the same with regard to the taxpayer and the consumer as if they were paid out of the Tea Duty now or out of the Corn Duty in old days, and if the Economist were to hold any other view it would lose half its subscribers in a week. The money is not only not paid out of the publicans' means, but will go directly into their pockets. The other day a man of business in the North of England, one of the ablest valuers and agents in that part of the country, told me that he was agent for two public houses in a well-known North Country town. A new station was being built in that town, and several public houses had been bought up in order to make space for the works of the station. The rental of those two public houses had been £300 a year. As soon as the other public houses had been bought up, jobbing men connected with the liquor traffic came to him and at once offered double the rent for the two houses. As the leases were about to be renewed he went to the existing tenants, and told them he could get double the rent for the two houses, and the tenants at once took on the houses at £600 a year. The reason was that other public houses had been extinguished in the neighbourhood; and there is not the slightest doubt that if the partial extinction of public houses proposed by the Government succeeds, they would not diminish drinking in the very least, but would simply increase the gains of the other public houses in the neighbourhood. No, it is out of the taxes that the publicans are compensated, and that is the principle which is consecrated in the Bill. By the 5th clause the sum to be applied for the extinction of licences in England is to be apportioned among the counties in proportion to the amount which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue certify to have been received by them in the last receiving financial year on account of licences granted by them in those counties. The gross amount of those licences is about £1,400,000 a year, and the amount of money to be apportioned in England and Wales yearly under this clause is £350,000, and therefore it is easy to find out, by simply taking one quarter of the licences in each county, how much of this compensation would go to each county. Taking it by that calculation, the County of Huntingdon would receive £1,200 a year, and the County of Huntingdon has 400 licensed houses—that is to say, the county would have power to compensate at the rate of £3 per licensed house. Hertfordshire would receive £2,300; there are 1,300 houses in that county, so that it would be £2 a house. Cambridgeshire would receive £2,700 a year; there are 1,200 houses in Cambridgeshire, so that the county would pay a little over £2 a house to carry out the compensation scheme. But the licensed victuallers calculate the average houses in the country at £2,000 apiece; therefore the whole annual quota of an ordinary rural English county would be swallowed up in compensating one single house. I know what is said on the other side, and what I suppose is working in the mind of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. Hon. Members opposite say, "Oh, yes, that is all very well; but we are not dealing with the great and rich public houses. There are large numbers of poor roadside public houses which can be bought up cheap—a good many of them very cheap." Yes; but are they the worst public houses? that is where we join issue. In the opinion of most of us, and of the great majority of the class who suffer from the liquor traffic, they are had in proportion, as they sell a larger amount of liquor. There is an increasing number of people in this country who hold that retail trade in liquor over the bar is an evil in itself which ought to be abolished in the interests of the community. The only class who really and truly drink liquor retail is the working class, and the real secret of this question is that the working man cannot afford to drink spirits and beer. The Government last year issued a very interesting Report showing the expenditure of the working man householder; and it appeared from that that even the better sort of artisans, after defraying the ordinary household expenses, have hardly any margin left for expenditure on drink. A working man who is in the habit of drinking cannot have his glass of beer and have done with it. He can hardly spend less than 4s. or 5s. a week on drink, and where that is to come from out of his little budget it is difficult to imagine. It is a mistake to suppose that the worst drinking takes place in the little public houses. For example, in Bedfordshire, where there is a great number of small public houses, only one person is arrested for drunkenness out of 600, while in London, where the public houses are large and very valuable, the proportion is one in 300. If hon. Members go into the statistics they will find that at the outside 200 public houses will be extinguished every year under the provisions of this Bill. That means that it will take us 200 years to get rid of one-half of the public houses which exist at present. In point of fact, the result would be that we should extinguish even fewer public houses than we do now. My objection to the introduction of this principle of compensation is that it is perfectly new in this country, for at the present moment we do abolish public houses without any compensation. Under the Beerhouses Act 300 beer houses were abolished in Liverpool, and when its provisions were extended to Ireland no fewer than 500 beer houses were extinguished in Dublin without compensation.

An hon. MEMBER: Beerhouses?

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: Yes; but the keepers of beer houses are human beings, just as much as the keepers of public houses. This process I am referring to is what has been always going on in the country at large to a certain extent. A Government Return, referring only to a period of five years, shows that in Cheshire six public houses were extinguished by the Magistrates because the licences were not required. This process is going on slowly indeed, but not much more slowly than the process of extinction by compensation would go on under the Bill; and this is a process which would be infallibly checked if the County Councils were prohibited from extinguishing a public house unless they could buy up the consent of the owner. The hon. Member for North Kensington (Sir R. Lethbridge) quoted a passage from a speech of the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley), who was said to have expressed an opinion in 1880 as to the necessity for compensating publicans. The right hon. Member for Newcastle—said the hon. Member—said he was aware that a great deal of intemperate language had been used by the Temperance Party.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: I said some sections of the Temperance Party.

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: Well, some sections of the Temperance Party; but the hon. Member did not think that was a reason why the Member for Newcastle should have altered his view. A great deal, however, had happened since then, apart from the intemperate language referred to. The gravest Judges from the Bench in the most temperate language have stated that which is new to the general public, that the publican has no legal tenure at all. Mr. Justice Field, in the Court of Queen's Bench, stated that the Legislature recognised no vested interests at all in any holder of a licence. But whatever may be the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, the opinion of those more immediately concerned—the licensed victuallers and their advocates—is that the decisions which have been given have been of the most killing nature, because the counsel for the Licensed Victuallers' Association stated in the Morning Advertiser that a more unfortunate result of the Darwin case was that it promulgated and divulged what had hitherto been more or less a professional secret, namely, that, subject to appeal, the Licensing Magistrates could refuse to renew a licence to any and every holder of an on licence. Until this, he said, it was always popularly supposed that the holder of an on licence held a vested interest. But now it cannot be doubted that in the strictest sense no such thing as a vested interest exists, and that, subject to appeal, the Justices can refuse to renew licences of the largest, most useful, and best conducted businesses.

SIR E. CLARKE: Who said so?

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: I am quoting Mr. Thomas Nash, Counsel to the Licensed Victuallers' Association. In Canada and the colonies, and in America, the principle of compensation is absolutely unknown. By one operation of the Ontario Government the licences were reduced from 4,400 to less than 3,000. Not one penny was given in compensation, and no one even dreamed of presenting a claim for compensation. In America some States have laws of total prohibition, while others have ordinances of local option, under which districts do away with public houses. Moreover, there is a wholesale way by which the number is diminished to an extraordinary extent, namely, by the system of high licences. There are States in which an ordinary licence costs £100 or £130, and by this process the number of public houses is sometimes diminished in a State by one-half. And under no circumstances is compensation granted. That which has been universally reprobated by all the world besides ourselves, and by ourselves as well up to this time, probably deserves reprobation. The principle is grossly unjust, for what is the claim? A district grows, say, in consequence of some commercial works. A man takes a corner house and spends £2,000 or £3,000, and he then seeks a licence which he gets by the favour—the merest favour—and immediately he can sell that house for £4,000 more than it is worth the day before. This is practically a gift to him of £4,000 by the nation, and does anybody say that the nation is bound to throw away another £4,000 to revoke such a gift as that? There is another process which is still more significant. There are three houses built worth £50 a year apiece, and the man owning the middle one gets a licence. Instantly his rent rises to £300 a year, whilst the rental of the other two houses falls to £20 or £30 year; and yet, under the principle of compensation, the man who is in the middle, who has done no public service whatever, but who has got a gift from the nation, is to be compensated out of the pockets of the two men whose rent go down in proportion as his own rent goes up. But there is another serious reason against compensation which I should like to know how the temperance reformer who is going to vote for this Bill will meet. The men of whom I have spoken are those who have the confidence of the Justices; but now we are going to compensate a lot of people who have not that confidence. There is no abuse in our present system so great as the shameful manner in which Quarter Sessions are allowed to over-ride the real opinion of the Justices. I will give one or two instances which occurred in London. A licence was taken away for complaint against the manager—renewed at Quarter Sessions, on appeal. Licence taken away by Local Justices for knowingly permitting women of bad character to remain on the premises longer than was necessary—granted on appeal to Quarter Sessions.

SIR E. CLARKE: What Return is that?

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: A Return issued by the Home Office 2nd May, 1889. The case in Norwich, conviction on complaint of permitting drunkenness, licence taken away, renewed on appeal before Quarter Sessions. Take a case in the County of Glamorgan—a county which unfortunately had got into a bad condition. Two ale-house licences were refused because they were not wanted; in another case the licences of seven ale-houses were refused for convictions; reason; in another case four beer-house licences were refused, and four other licences. This was wholesale refusal, and was owing, I presume, to this being the first attempt of the Local Magistrates to purify the district. Well, appeals were made to the Quarter Sessions, and in each case the appeal was successful. At Newcastle-on-Tyne one licensed victualler, on account of selling liquor during prohibited hours, and two others for similar offences, were refused licences. The licences were taken away from all three by Newcastle Justices, and were given back to them by the Quarter Sessions. It should be remembered that a great many more licences would be taken away if the Magistrates were not certain that the Quarter Sessions would restore them, looking at the interests of the individual rather than at the interests of the public. I venture to say that these would be the very first cases in which the Bill of the Government would be employed. These fellows, who had been adjudged by the Magistrates not to be fit men, would be bargained with and would get whatever compensation they could induce the County Council to give in order to get rid of them. We all hear a great deal about the poor publican, and no doubt we should all be sorry for the actual holder of a public house who was suddenly deprived of his business. He, however, would not necessarily reap benefit under this Bill, which authorises the County Councils to seek out those who may have any interest in the premises in order that they may be compensated. The County Councils are to inquire very minutely into all interests affected—those of the spirit merchant, of the brewer, and of the shareholders in such companies as those of Guinness and Allsopp. In connection with this point the Church of England Temperance Committee has been most properly shown up by the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine). The Committee ought to have represented the moderate men who are anxious to extinguish public houses without doing injustice to holders, but that is not the character which they assumed. The real essence of what passed between the Committee and the right hon. Gentleman is well described by a London daily paper that, at the very least, is neutral—the Daily Chronicle. The Daily Chronicle says—

“Nothing has come from the action of the Church of England Temperance Society but its utter failure to get the only demand of any real value that was made to Mr. Ritchie, namely, their demand that compensation must be definitely limited to the actual licence-holder, and not given directly or indirectly to any interests that are behind him; and also that in any case it must not exceed 10 years' profits of the business.”

I must say that the right hon. Gentleman bought the Church of England Temperance Society uncommonly cheap—a great deal cheaper than we shall buy the publicans. I should regret very much the acceptance of the principle contained in the clauses under consideration, because I believe that public opinion is moving very fast in the right direction, and the acceptance of the principle of compensation would check that movement. Landowners, in a considerable number of cases, have done what the people themselves ought to be allowed to do. They have extinguished the public houses on their properties, and not only have they not received, but they will not take compensation. It is difficult to conceive how men who were well off could ask for compensation. Having made an extra rent for many years out of his poorer neighbours, a man who, after that, asked for compensation was asking for the dirtiest money that could touch anyone's hands. By this Bill, however, you will kill the right feeling which largely prevails among owners. The principle will be established that a man is to be paid when he gives up a public house, and owners will learn from the teaching of legislation that they can exact the uttermost farthing. By passing this Bill they will fasten on the shoulders of the country the burden of the liquor interest tighter than it had ever been fastened before. We shall incur a liability of £250,000,000 at least, if the hopes of the Temperance Party are ever to be gratified, and we are to get rid wholly or in great part of the retail system. The licensed victuallers themselves put the sum at £400,000,000. So far from the Bill introducing Local Option, as the right hon. Gentleman contends, it absolutely kills all hopes of Local Option. Any compensation ought to come out of the monopoly itself. This is a monopoly infinitely greater than any Monarch ever granted to favourite or Minister. I never will subscribe to the opinion that a nation that wants to get rid of this monopoly ought to buy it up. It has a right to take it away; and if we do not, in an evil moment, sacrifice that right, the nation will, sooner or later—and I think pretty soon—assume it itself.

*(10.31.) SIR E. CLARKE: The right hon. Gentleman has dealt with many interesting subjects, and I should have been very glad to debate them with him if this had been a debating society discussing the licensing laws generally and the habits of the people. If, as the right hon. Baronet says, the working men have not money to spend in drink, it is difficult to understand how the large consumption of intoxicating liquors is maintained.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I said they drank at the expense of their families.

*SIR E. CLARKE: I believe that argument is a great injustice to the working classes. This controversy has been going on for half a century, yet Parliament is in the same position with regard to the licensing question that it was in the year 1871, and the House has heard to-night from the leader of the Temperance Party in this Debate that he is prepared to adopt now the suggestion that was made 20 years ago, and to accept the principle of compensation, and give to the occupiers of licensed houses 10 years' occupancy, in order to provide for their extinction at the end of 10 years. Therefore, we are really in the same position as we were 20 years ago. We are not in the same position so far as the people are concerned. Last year there was a great increase in the consumption of liquors; but still, during the last 20 years, there has been a vast improvement in the habits, sobriety, and thrift of the working classes. If more liquor is drunk it is because there are larger means for consuming it in moderation, and no one can see gatherings of large masses of the people, such as the magnificent parade on Saturday afternoon in Hyde Park, where I spent some hours and did not see a single person intoxicated, without being convinced of the improvement in temperance, as well as in other respects, among the people. The right hon. Gentleman has adverted to the difficulty of administering the licensing laws, and to the over-ruling of decisions at Petty Sessions by the Magistrates at Quarter Sessions. That is absolutely irrelevant to the question now before the House. The Bill leaves Petty Sessions and Quarter Sessions with precisely the same powers as they now possess. What the Bill proposes is to add to the powers which Local Bodies at present possess for buying up licensed houses for the carrying out of public improvements, and doing that by direct negotiation with the parties concerned. That is the beginning and end of the proposal of the Government. It is remarkable to see how this proposal has been met. The hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) does not, in his Amendment, challenge the principle of compensation, or object to the payment of public money for the extinction of licences. He merely objects to extinguishing licences "in the manner proposed by the said Bill." It is, therefore, simply a Motion for postponing the Second Reading for six months. If, however, any Member would like to pay public money for the extinction of licences, and the details of this Bill are not satisfactory to him, the hon. Member hopes he will support the Amendment. The Amendment practically finds fault only with the details of the Bill. The hon. Member for Barrow in his speech objected only to the clauses of the Bill which refer to the distribution of money for the extinction of public houses, and expressed anxiety to accept other parts of it, but he has framed an Amendment which, if carried, will be absolutely fatal to the Bill and to every proposal it contains. ["No."] If the Amendment were carried the result would be the absolute defeat of the Bill and all its proposals.

*MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): The Bill might be re-introduced next day without the objectionable clauses.

*SIR E. CLARKE: The Government do not propose to submit to a humiliation of that sort. The Government do not in the least regret that the Amendment has been proposed at this stage because we would not have assented to the excision of the clauses in Committee. As to the position of the Church of England Temperance Society, I do not desire to insist too exclusively upon the attitude of any one society, but I know that in many parts of the country there are a very great many temperance advocates, having no connection with the Church of England Temperance Society, who, recognising the evils the Bill will deal with, are in favour of it. [Cries of "Name."] They are almost numberless.

If hon. Gentlemen will look at the local papers they will see letter after letter dealing with this matter in the way I am dealing with it. It has been suggested that my right hon. Friend has not dealt quite fairly with the attitude of the Church of England Temperance Society, and that the society advocated certain conditions as to compensation, which are not contained in this Bill. Whatever may be the opinion of the House as to the weight to be attached to the judgment of the society, it is well that the attitude of the society should be understood and fairly judged. In the letter sent to us by the chairman of the society suggestions are made providing against anything in that Bill affecting or in advance determining the principles upon which compensation should be based, and the suggestions thus made, and which, in their belief, will secure the country from any prejudgment of the question of compensation, are suggestions which my right hon. Friend has accepted and proposes to add to his Bill. Therefore, so far as this Bill is concerned, the whole suggestions of the Church of England Temperance Society have been accepted by my right hon. Friend. But I confess I am less concerned this evening to discuss the position of the Church of England Temperance Society than to consider the position which is taken up by the hon. Member for Barrow. The hon. Member for Barrow has taken up a position—not now for the first time, I am bound to say, for two years ago he took exactly the same line in discussion in this House—which seems to me absolutely inconsistent with his dismissal of compensation as being applicable to this case. It is impossible to exclude the question of compensation from the discussion on this Bill. The Bill does not deal with compensation in any way whatever, and if upon the Bill, as it now stands, there are apprehensions that it deals with, and prejudices the question of compensation, upon the Bill as it must stand, with the Amendments which my right hon. Friend has accepted, there is no room whatever for any fear that it refers to the question of compensation. But my right hon. Friend who introduced the Bill said, quite frankly and fairly, that, as far as the Government are concerned, the question of compensation will have to be faced in any measure which provides for the compulsory extinction of licences; and as to the principle upon which that compensation must be based, of course different opinions must exist in this House. Compensation might be of different kinds. It might be given in a sum of money to the man who was engaged in the trade, and whose interest in the premises and the licence would be put an end to; or by providing that the licence should have a certain and definite time to exist, at the end of which it might be altogether cancelled without any money payment being made. Those are two modes of dealing with the question, but to give to the licensed victualler of to-day an unchallengeable right to carry on his business for 10 years would be giving him compensation, though in another form. The hon. Member for Barrow is perfectly consistent in this matter. When he was discussing the question in 1888 he put in terms his proposal. He said to-night—

“Let me look at the effect of the compensation clauses in the Bill of 17 years ago. They proposed that every publican's licence, of whatever description, should be continued annually, subject, of course, to good behaviour, until the general Licensing Sessions, held after the expiration of 10 years from the commencement of the Act, and should absolutely determine at the end of such Session.”

That was the proposal of 17 years ago, which, though then rejected, was spoken of with regretful affection by the hon. Member for Barrow in 1888, and as recalled by him now in very remarkable terms. The hon. Member said to-night—

“I do not ask the House to commit itself against any more modified form of compensation.”

And then he went on to ask whether the Government would give to the licensed victuallers this 10 years' certainty of enjoyment of their licences, and he said—which for my own part I am bound to say struck me as being remarkable, considering the hon. Member's position—

“That he and his Friends here would not prevent such a Bill coming upon the Statute Book.”

MR. CAINE: I said “could not prevent.”

*SIR E. CLARKE: I accept promptly the correction. If I should happen to be right and he not, he will easily realise the fact, for his observations, if not in print, are certainly in manuscript. But I accept the correction. The hon. Member says he could not prevent it. I suppose that meant that he would not try, otherwise there was no meaning in the statement. If the hon. Member says that he would not try to prevent that Bill from coming upon the Statute Book I venture to submit to him—and I am sure he will accept the way in which I am putting it—that he and I are together on the principle of compensation. The hon. Member would compensate by giving a period, or allowing others to give a clear, unchallengeable tenure of a licence for 10 years, while, for my own part, if it came to the question of compensation—which is not raised by this Bill—I venture to say that I could satisfy the hon. Member that the plan of giving a sum of money to the publican whose licence was taken away without fault of his own would be a better plan, and would produce less difficulty in its administration, and be more certain in its effect, than the plan of allowing the licence to go for 10 years.

MR. CAINE: I find that I have in manuscript the words to which reference has been made, and they are as follows:

"Will the Government accept that"—namely, the proposals of the Church of England Temperance Society—

"as a final settlement of the controversy? I do not offer it, but I can tell the Government that if they choose to bring in a Bill on the lines of the compensation proposals of the Church of England Temperance Society, neither I nor anyone else could prevent it coming on the Statute Book."

I only stated this as a word of friendly advice.

*SIR E. CLARKE: I was disposed to accept it as a word of friendly advice. The hon. Member referred to the proposal as one which he would not resist and which he felt that he could not prevent. But the question of compensation is not here. If it were to be dealt with I think I could satisfy even my hon. Friend that to allow all the existing public houses to go on for 10 years, except where there is fault on the part of the publican, and then all at once to close them unless some further action took place, would be to invite such an agitation towards the end of the 10 years as would disturb all political and social relations, and my belief is—I am speaking now as an on-looker, one who is not interested at all in the financial matters of the publicans and brewers—my belief is that if the publicans or the owners of licensed houses were able to get, I would say, a 12 years' unchallengeable continuance of licences, except when forfeited by their own fault, it would be a thing they would wisely accept, and I think they would wisely accept it, for I believe at the end of the 12 years there would be no chance whatever of any large number of public houses being allowed to go out of occupation.

MR. CAINE: The hon. and learned Gentleman misapprehends the real proposal of the Church of England Temperance Society. They do not propose to continue the licence to a house for 10 years. They propose to continue it to a man for 10 years, of course, subject to conditions such as his dying or giving it up. They propose not to recognise any interest in the house, but to give the interest only to the individual.

SIR E. CLARKE: I do not want to enter into a controversy, but I am quite sure that that proposition could not be worked. I read the words of my hon. Friend in 1888. They were to the effect that every publican's licence of whatever description should be continued annually; and I think it is perfectly obvious to him that now, if a publican holds a licence, and by law, upon his death, his executors can have the licence transferred to someone else—[Cries of "No"—I beg pardon, that is the law now—it would be the grossest injustice to say that the accident of his death should put an end to and destroy altogether that which would otherwise be a valuable possession to leave to his family. But what I want to emphasise is this, that, accepting the hon. Member for Barrow as the spokesman of the assailants of this Bill, I and the hon. Member are together on the principle of compensation. [Ironical Opposition laughter.] Well, I think I have established my point. It is a great deal easier to laugh than to disprove it. But let me quote a few sentences from other persons in regard to it. I am not going to quote from the Economist or the Daily

Chronicle, or from an article in any daily paper. While I have the greatest respect for the daily Press of this country, I am speaking in the House of Commons, and the House of Commons is a greater place for the discussion of questions than the columns of daily newspapers. I will quote upon the question of compensation a few words of one who has not been in strong sympathy with the publicans. I do not require to go back to the discussion on vested interests. I certainly regretted to hear the right hon. Baronet opposite read an extract from what he has called the judgment of Mr. Justice Field in the Darwen case, in November, 1882. I regretted it for this reason, that the quotation has been scattered all over the country in hundreds and thousands of leaflets. It was read in this House in 1888, and in that year I said in this House what I may, perhaps, be allowed to read again. I said—

“The hon. Baronet”—I was speaking of the hon. Member for Cocker-mouth—

“Founded his proposition chiefly on a sentence which he quoted, and which I myself have seen quoted in a number of temperance publications, and he said that Mr. Justice Field in the Court of Queen’s Bench in the month of November, 1882, stated that the Legislature recognised no vested interest at all in any holder of a licence. . . . I have gone through five different Reports of the decision and the judgment in this case, and in no one of the Reports will the sentence the hon. Baronet quoted last night be found, and in the next place the decision was not a decision on this point at all, but on a different Act of Parliament.”

I was surprised, after the statement I made two years ago, to find this decision flourished in the House again to-night. I may, perhaps, now be forgiven for another word with regard to the case of “Sharp v. Wakefield.” It has been said over and over again in the country by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, not very familiar with legal matters, including the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that the case of “Sharp v. Wakefield” has disproved the advice the Attorney General and I gave to the House. The fact is that before that case ever went to the Court of Queen’s Bench my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury, and Mr. R. S. Wright, had advised the persons who proposed to appeal in that case not to do so, on the ground that it did not raise the question they desired to bring before the Court. But there was some society which insisted on carrying the case to appeal, although they were told by the best known lawyers of the day that it did not raise the question at all. That was not a case in which the only objection to the house was that it was a house not wanted. The house had been shut up for four months, and the man who applied for the licence had never been in occupation of the house. He was, therefore, obliged to go to the Justices and ask for a licence. The matter was then dealt with in the manner I have mentioned, and the point raised. I almost despair of making the right hon. Gentleman understand. The point is this. Under the Acts of 1872 and 1874, so well is the renewal of the licence recognised that no holder of a full licence in this country has to go before the Justices at all, unless he is sent for. If he is not sent for, the Justices must renew his licence as a matter of course. They have no power to withhold it as a matter of law. One night I remember the right hon. Gentleman tried to learn some licensing law at the feet of the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries, who brought a little handbook on the subject into the House, and the right hon. Gentleman will find that I am right in saying that if the holder of a licence is not sent for by the Justices, the Justices cannot take his licence away. Moreover, the Justices cannot send for him except for some cause personal to the licence holder. If the right hon. Gentleman will look at those two Acts of Parliament, and give an adequate time to their comprehension, he will probably see that I am right. The decision in the case of “Sharp v. Wakefield” has never disturbed that, and I say now, as I said two years ago, that it is not competent for the Justices to take away a man’s licence simply because they think there are too many houses, and without having anything personal against him. Lord Coleridge, who will be recognised as a fair authority on this matter, speaking at a meeting of the Church of England Temperance Society, on April 28th, 1888, when this controversy was in its acutest stage, said that

"Though these men (the publicans) might be looked upon as engaged in a mischievous trade, their trade had the sanction of the law, and had had for a long period of years, and had been dealt with as a legal trade. Although it was perfectly true that the Magistrates might refuse to renew a licence, everyone knew, as a matter of fact, that they never did so except for misconduct. In the case of a respectably connected house the Justices, as a matter of course, re-granted the licence, although it was perfectly true that in a Court of law there would be no redress for the best conducted publican in the world if they refused to do so. Everybody who dealt fairly with the matter would feel that a large interest had been allowed to grow up, and in his judgment it would be a very strong thing if such a man was to be dealt with on the strict, legal, technical view that he had no technical vested interest in the trade he had pursued."

Those are very important words of Lord Coleridge's, but there is one other person whose views have been quoted to-night, and, having regard to the confident expectation which the hon. Baronet opposite entertains of an early accession to power of those who will be inclined to deal with this matter in a stringent way, are of still greater importance. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian made a speech at Dalkeith on March 19, 1880, in which he said that to the principle of Local Option he took no preliminary objection, but that he must consider many matters with regard to its application, and, among them, strict justice to an interest which, possibly, the exercise of Local Option might affect. The right hon. Gentleman further expressed his disapproval of a scheme which contained no recognition of a fair and equitable title, and allowed to those interested in the case no opportunity for stating their case for equitable compensation if a fundamentally new proposition were introduced into legislation which might bear injuriously on their interests. In the triumph, therefore, of which the right hon. Baronet spoke as coming speedily, he will have over him and before him the authority of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. I think that the hon. Member for South Tyrone was well advised in saying that after this long and unsuccessful toil those who have fixed their minds on one particular solution of this controversy would be wise, in presence of this concurrent statement from all those who have responsibility in this matter or are likely to have it, in seeing some measure of conciliation and compromise adopted. My right hon. Friend who opened the Debate pointed out that a great deal of misapprehension exists in the country with regard to the proposals of the Government. A great many persons, as shown by the resolutions sent to the House, are of opinion that the Government have during this Session revived the whole scheme of 1888 for dealing with this question. I think that the hon. Member for Barrow is one of those most directly responsible for that misapprehension. I hold in my hand a copy of a pamphlet which bears on the front page the words—

"No compensation to publicans; two letters addressed to the Public Press of the country by W. S. Caine, M.P.; the first showing compensation payable under the Government proposals in the country districts, and the second showing the compensation payable under the Government proposals within the Metropolitan area: second edition, 1890."

There is nothing whatever on the face of this pamphlet to show to the persons who read it the fact that the letters bear date May 10, 1888, so that the statements with regard to the value of those licences are those which the hon. Member prepared for the Government proposals in 1888.

MR. CAINE: It says so in the preface. Read the preface.

SIR E. CLARKE: There is a preface, but I cannot read aloud the whole preface. My point is that many persons in reading the pamphlet would be misled into believing that it was correct to say that the Government proposals of 1888 are repeated in the Bill of to-day. The hon. Member also said that the sum applied to the extinction of licences is so small as to have no real effect on the number of licences. He suggested that the average value of licences in London was £5,000; but, in order to get that average, the hon. Member must have included a large number of hotels and other places, which no one would think of shutting up. The hon. Member is mistaken in his calculation. A return has been issued by the County Council in regard to the steps taken in London to extinguish licences, and also with regard to artisans' dwellings. Under the powers conferred on the Metropolitan Board of Works and the London County Council, enabling them to carry out the widening of streets and to undertake public improvements, or to erect artisans' dwellings, a great many public houses have been taken. I think that the hon. Member for Barrow will admit that this is a comparison which is strongly in his favour. When the County Council have to take houses in this way it cannot pick and choose, it must take all the houses. There is a difference which is most important in this case; the difference between compulsory purchase and purchase by voluntary bargain is a very considerable one. In compulsory purchase the amount, especially in public houses, of the mortgage on the property is quoted. It may not represent in all cases the real value, but it is very difficult to disturb it. There were about 128 public houses taken and extinguished in this way, and they cost altogether £144,000. In the Return of cases there were instances of property taken in Charing Cross Road, at Bethnal Green, in the West of London, and Ratcliff Highway, and there were a number of places in which the average value of the houses taken, compulsorily and not selected, whatever the situation, was under £800 per house. I confess that my belief is that the money, which can be assigned to the extinction of licensed houses under this Bill, will do a great deal of good. I was interested and amused to hear from the hon. Member for Barrow that there had been an increase in the value of public houses recently, owing to the clearing up of the law with regard to licences. Why, I had thought that that declaration of the law was supposed to have destroyed their value altogether. The hon. Member read a letter from a Mr. Fell, who, he said, was a magistrate of experience, in which that gentleman said that licences were only renewable from year to year on adequate grounds being shown for such renewal. The writer is entirely mistaken, because unless adequate grounds are shown for withholding the licence the renewal of a publican's licence is an automatic matter [Cries of "No!"]; that is the law, and it does not even require the presence of the publican at the Licensing Sessions to support his claim for its renewal. The suggestion with regard to a 10 years' licence would be, in a way, a sort of compensation. But I wish to point out to the hon. Member for Barrow that he himself is not in entire harmony with his Party. The right hon. Gentleman for Derby has been consistent for a limited period, at all events, upon one point, namely, in advocating that the whole matter of licensing should be handed over to the Local Bodies. In October, 1888, the right hon. Gentleman addressed a meeting of the United Kingdom Alliance, whose object is to secure the total and immediate suppression of the liquor traffic, in what the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth called an important, a magnificent, and an inspired speech. In that speech the right hon. Gentleman said that he desired that the Local Authorities should have complete control over the drink traffic. But that policy so enunciated by the right hon. Gentleman was immediately and absolutely repudiated by those who were gathered around him on the platform of the United Kingdom Alliance. The Secretary, I think it was, stated that they had given up the idea of local option, on the ground that they could not trust the Local Bodies, but preferred to intrust the matter to the direct vote of the community; by which all public houses might be shut up one year, probably to be reopened the next year by another general vote. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby does not seem to have been very kindly treated by his friends on that occasion, and the hon. Baronet (Sir W. Lawson), although he praised the inspired speech, suggested that the right hon. Gentleman's own habits were capable of improvement, and declared that no man could understand the Alliance policy unless he was a teetotaler, and believed that drink was a poison, socially and politically, and prevented a man from seeing that it was a good thing to prevent another being such a big fool as to go on poisoning himself. I must apologise for referring to these observations, which sound discourteous, but I suppose after the "inspiration" they were soon forgotten. I put it to the hon. Member for Barrow that we have to deal with a practical question. The present Bill does not attempt to deal with the question in a large and heroic manner, but it proposes a sensible way of diminishing the number of licensed houses. To attempt to shut up all the licensed houses on a particular day would be to endanger the peace of the country, and would lead to confusion and chaos. The present measure, however, seeks to help the people in their growing desire for the improvement of their own habits. The measure will not interfere one iota with the discretion of the magistrates, and will enable Local Bodies to extinguish licences by means of funds derived from the drink traffic itself. This proposal the Government has put before the House, with the sincere desire that something may be done in the direction of reducing the number of licensed houses. I regret that the Government proposals of two years ago were not accepted, because I believe that if they had been a great step in the direction of temperance would have been made by this time. The Temperance Party have now another opportunity offered them, and I trust they will not reject it. I hope that the discussion, which has now resolved itself not into bitter antagonism to the Bill, but of a discussion of various forms of compensation, may result in the House emphatically endorsing the policy the Government have submitted to it.

*(11.30.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I am glad to note that there is a sensible alteration in the tone of the speeches from the Government Benches on this subject, as compared with the Debate two years ago, when there was much talk about the absolute rights of the owners of licensed houses. To-day we have heard much more about compromise; there is a great deal in the nature of conciliation, and there are growing signs that the Government have begun to find itself face to face with the real situation. We had a remarkable speech the other day from the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington, and now we have had a remarkable speech from the Solicitor General—a speech in which he put his case far more moderately than he did two years ago. Still, we have the question of compensation raised. The word “compensation,” although one for which there was some excuse two years ago, is not applicable now, since the Court of Appeal, in

“Sharp v. Wakefield,” has decided what the law is. I listened to the exposition of the Solicitor General with reference to that case with a good deal of amazement. What the Solicitor General put forward was not the statement of the Judges, but that of the unsuccessful counsel for the unsuccessful appellant. In the proceeding before the Court it was contended that there was some right to consider the renewal of licences as an automatic process. But Lord Justice Fry, in the most distinct manner, negatived the argument which the Solicitor General put forward as the statement of the law. The position of the publican is this. He may go before the Court, and the Court is entitled to say Aye or No to the question whether the licence is to be renewed or refused. Now I come to the grain of truth in the case put forward by the hon. and learned Gentleman. There is an absolute discretion in the Justices as to whether they will refuse the licence or not, but the discretion is of a judicial and not of an administrative nature. It is a discretion which is to be exercised on judicial principles, by a Judicial Body, acting, not upon any rules of law which bind them or render them subject to review, but according to certain rules of practice which are well understood. We have an illustration of that in the award of costs in law suits. This is a matter entirely in the discretion of Court. But those familiar with the Court procedure know that if a litigant succeeds he usually gets his costs, and if he fails he is ordered to pay his opponent's costs. So in the case of renewals, the Court is not bound to give a renewal, but in the natural course of things the publican anticipates there will be a renewal. The advocates of the extreme Temperance Party propose to take the duties, which are now performed by the Justices in a judicial capacity, and shift their performance to the County Councils, who will perform them in an administrative capacity. It seems to me that that would give the owner of the licensed house some title to complain. I do not mean the man who has been guilty of misconduct, but the man whose house is respectably conducted, and who has probably paid for the goodwill, and whose goodwill is taxed and subject to Probate Duty. That man deserves consideration, not because he has any legal title, as has been suggested from the Government benches, but because he has no legal title at all. He is deserving of consideration because he is a man who has acquired his business under the existing practice, and if it is altered he should not be placed in a worse position. It is an abuse of language to call that compensation, because compensation must be for some right of which a person is deprived. The ground of my opposition to this Bill is the assumption which it has underlying it. It is one thing to say that men are worthy of consideration on account of their trade being dealt with in future in an administrative and not a judicial capacity; but that is not sufficient ground for an expenditure of public money. Payment of money raised from taxation can only be justified when the payment is made to people in respect of that to which they are legally entitled. I object to the proposition of the Government because it affirms the very reverse and negative of that. Underlying the Bill is the vicious assumption that there is a right of property which gives a title to legal compensation. And I have another objection. If we are going to assume the principle of legal compensation, and that the publican has something for which he is legally entitled to be paid, then the proposals of the Government are ludicrously inadequate. I am far from wishing to identify myself with the extreme section of the Temperance Party, but I cannot assent to the proposals of the Government. At the same time, I am prepared to approach this question with a due regard—not for vested interests, for there are none—but for the position of people who will suffer a moral hardship from the law regulating their trade being carried out in an administrative instead of a judicial capacity. That is quite a different thing to what is put before us to-night. I object altogether to the principle which underlies the proposal of the Government, and I, for one, shall vote against it.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

STATUTE LAW REVISION (RE-COMMITTED) BILL [LORDS]—(No. 251.)
Considered in Committee.

(11.50.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): I hope I may be allowed to make a short statement with regard to this Bill. It will be remembered by the Committee that last year a Statute Law Revision Bill came before the House, but was not then accepted, on the ground that it involved the repeal of certain Acts of Parliament, which hon. Members thought ought not to be dealt with without careful consideration. The Bill, was in fact, referred to a Select Committee, and that Committee, as the result of a large number of sittings, have now put before the House an amended Bill. They have drafted a Special Report, to which I venture to call the attention of the Committee. The Select Committee have pointed out in that Special Report that they felt it their duty to go carefully through the Bill submitted to them; that they have found it possible to amend it by leaving out certain formal language in the different clauses; and that they have found that the Preambles of several Statutes could well be dispensed with, as they threw no light on the Statutes and were of no historic importance. By this action the Committee have increased 12 or 15 fold the value of the Bill. The Committee further report that in the course of their examination of the Statutes they came across Statutes of little or no practical value which still remained unrepealed. This particularly applied to various Imperial Acts now operative in Scotland or Ireland only. [An hon. MEMBER: The Statute of Edward III.] These Statutes the Committee hold have no practical application to the present circumstances of either Scotland or Ireland, and it is obviously desirable that the Acts should be repealed, so that the law for the three countries should, as far as possible, be uniform. I can only say, in conclusion, that I hope the Bill will be accepted in its amended form. It has been most carefully considered. I beg to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again.”

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): As a Member of the Committee which presented the Report to which the learned Solicitor General has called attention I desire to confirm what he has said. The Committee were very much struck by the great care and attention which the Statute Law Revision Committee had devoted to the preparation of this Bill; they entirely deserved the confidence placed in them by the House. Following in their footsteps, we found that a great deal still remained to be done in the way of Statute Law Consolidation, and we hope that the Report we have presented will enable the Revision Committee to proceed more rapidly with its important labours.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

SUCK RIVER DRAINAGE (PROVISION OF FUNDS) BILL.—(No. 236.)

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (PROCEDURE) BILL.—(No. 245.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(12.0.) DR. TANNER: I object.

MR. ASQUITH (Fife, East): I hope the hon. Member will withdraw his objection. There is great unanimity of opinion among Members of the Legal Profession on both sides of the House.

DR. TANNER: Having listened to the eloquent voice of the hon. Member, I withdraw my objection, though it is the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Finlay) who promotes the Bill.

MR. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.): I am obliged to the hon. Member for the courtesy he has shown in this matter.

DR. TANNER: Oh, no; you need not express obligation.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

MR. FINLAY: The object of this Bill is to remedy the multiplicity of legal proceedings that take place in the Queen's Bench Division. The proposal is to supersede the necessity of one stage of these proceedings, namely, the Divisional Courts. There is, as my hon. and learned Friend has stated, very great agreement on the main objects of the Bill, though there may be some difference on matters of detail.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday, 5th June.

ORCHARDS RATING EXEMPTION

BILL.—(No. 177.)

Read a second time, and committed for Wednesday.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (BOROUGH OF BELFAST) BILL.—(No. 153.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

The following Amendments, proposed by Mr. MACARTNEY, were agreed to:—

Page 2, line 5, after "the," insert "said."

MR. MACARTNEY moved: Page 2, line 5, leave out all the words after "borough," to end of Clause.

MR. SEXTON: There is an Amendment to the Preamble leaving out the words relating to the expenses of the Clerk of the Peace.

MR. MACARTNEY: I am informed that the words proposed to be left out are unnecessary.

MR. SEXTON: The Preamble recites that it is expedient to make further provision for the whole of the Courts; but if these words are struck out there is no provision for charging the account.

MR. MACARTNEY: If the hon. Member presses that the words should be left in, I do not care; but I am informed that they are really not necessary.

MR. SEXTON: If it should appear on Report that the words are unnecessary, we could then deal with the matter.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I shall consider the question between now and the Report stage.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 18, to leave out all the words after the word "expenses," to "and shall," in line 20.—(Mr. Johnston.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. SEXTON: If this Amendment were agreed to, the clause would be worthless. The clause allows the Recorder of Belfast to pay to the Clerk of the Peace such sum as he may think reasonable as expenses in carrying out the Act. In recent years the work of registration has very much increased, for whereas there were formerly 21,000 voters and one Revising Barrister, there are now 32,000 voters and five Revising Barristers. The Clerk of the Peace expenses have, during the last three years, been £731, £665, and £633 respectively; and the Amendment, if passed, would have the effect of precluding his getting one penny.

MR. MACARTNEY: I cannot conceive that my hon. Friend will press the Amendment. Of course, if he does, it will stop the Bill, for the effect of his Amendment would be to give the Clerk of the Peace for Belfast a sum much less than the salary of £50 which he had before.

*MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast): Will the Attorney General state whether that would be the effect of the proposition?

*MR. MADDEN: Yes; a considerable proportion of expenses would be left outside the Bill.

*MR. JOHNSTON: I ask leave to withdraw.

VOL. CCCXLIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 20, after "and," leave out "shall also," and insert—

"The said expenses of the Clerk of the Peace, other than the costs of necessary printing, shall be calculated according to the scale for the time being in force under any order of the Lord Lieutenant in Council made pursuant to 'The County Officers and Councils (Ireland) Act, 1877,' and the said recorder shall sign and."
—(Mr. Macartney.)

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Member's Amendment defeats his own object. The effect of it would be to give the Clerk of the Peace, taking 32,000 voters at 1½d. each, about £200 a year. I trust the hon. Member will see the propriety of withdrawing the Amendment.

(12.28.) MR. MACARTNEY: This provision only applies to the expenses of the Clerk of the Peace, and not to his remuneration. I am obliged to press the insertion of these words, to which I am authorised to say the Clerk of the Peace makes no objection. They only apply to the actual legal expenses, for which he is out of pocket.

MR. SEXTON: Is the learned Attorney General of opinion that the Recorder will make the Clerk of the Peace such remuneration as is apart from expenses?

*MR. MADDEN: My opinion is that the Amendment merely applies to expenses.

Question, "That the words 'shall also' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 8, to leave out all the words after "clerk" to end of clause.

MR. SEXTON: By a clause of the Act of 1868 the County Down got rid of its expenses, and since 1867 the Clerk of the Peace has paid them out of his own pocket, and has never been repaid. This gentleman has been £318 out of pocket. If these words are struck out the Clerk of the Peace will lose his £300.

MR. MACARTNEY: I have endeavoured to reconcile the various interests; but it is a matter of difficulty, and, much as I sympathise with the hon. Member in what he has said, I am compelled to maintain the obligations I am under to various sections of this House. If this Bill passes, the Clerk of the Peace will be in a very much better position. I hope the hon. Member will not press his objection. I am obliged to omit the words.

MR. SEXTON: I am extremely sorry that the hon. Gentleman should, at the beginning of his political career, have given such an equivocal pledge, and that this Public Officer will not get his money back. However, I suppose I must yield, or the Bill, which on the whole improves the equity of the situation, would not pass at all. But I must express my regret that the hon. Member allowed himself to make any alliances whatever.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and rejected.

Other Amendments made.

Bill reported with an amended title; as amended, to be considered upon Wednesday.

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT BILL. (No. 163.)

Considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 264.]

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

IRISH SOCIETY AND LONDON COMPANIES (IRISH ESTATES)—SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR N. R. FOWLER (London): I beg to ask the Government to postpone the following Motion:—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire as to the terms of the Charters or other instruments by which their estates in Ireland were granted to the Irish Society and to the London Companies, and as to the trusts and obligations (if any) attaching to the ownership of such estates, and as to the mode in which the sale of their estates has been effected, or can be effected, consistently with such trusts and obligations as may be shown to have existed, or now exist."

I desire to say a few words on the subject.

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS assented.

MR. SEXTON: The re-appointment of this Committee has been pending for a considerable time, and if the question is not dealt with at once, the postponement is likely to become indefinite and the work of the Committee inoperative. The subject is of considerable urgency in the North of Ireland, and I had hoped that arrangements would be made to appoint the Committee to-night.

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS: I have already succeeded in removing the objection of one hon. Member to the Committee, and I hope to be able to remove those of others, and to get the Committee appointed by Wednesday.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the hon. Member to have the matter brought on before the Irish Members disperse for Whitsuntide.

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS: It does not rest with me to fix the day for the appointment of the Committee definitely. I will, however, do what I can to meet the wishes of the hon. Member.

MOTION.

ROADS AND STREETS IN POLICE BURGHES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Hugh Elliot, Bill to amend "The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878," in respect to the maintenance of Roads and Streets in Police Burghs, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hugh Elliot, Mr. Shiress Will, Mr. Barclay, and Mr. Sinclair.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 266.]

House adjourned at twenty minutes before One o'clock.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS
COMMISSION.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, in moving that there be laid before this House a complete list, with dates of issue, of the Reports of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, and of the Appendices thereto; together with an alphabetical index of the collections examined and reported on, giving a reference to the Report and Appendix wherein the result of the examination may be found, I am quite sensible of the audacity of the task I have taken upon myself in venturing to impugn the conduct of so august a body of persons as the Historical Manuscripts Commissioners; but I think that any of your Lordships and any of the public who have attempted to grapple with the publications of that body must have found an insuperable difficulty in the initial task of placing those publications upon their shelves in consecutive order. I suppose few Royal Commissions have ever been appointed which have dealt with matters of so much interest, and no praise is too high to be bestowed upon those noblemen and gentlemen who own valuable historical manuscripts, including the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, for the public spirit which has induced them to place their collections of valuable documents at the disposal of the Historical Manuscripts Commissioners. But I am compelled to say that a great deal of that useful and valuable work which the Commissioners have performed has been rendered, I will not say nugatory, but certainly very inaccessible to those who most desire to profit by it. Anyone who has attempted to discover or to understand the order and publication of the Reports, or their dates of issue, or to know which Reports and Appendices have been published, and what there is that has not been published, will have found himself entangled in a labyrinth, from which I am sure he has found it difficult, if not impossible, to extricate himself. Those manuscripts which have been dealt with by the Commissioners are of very great value indeed, and I regret that they have not thought fit to adopt the ordinary course which is followed by those have to deal with and superintend publications of this description, of providing a table of contents, which should be available to those who desire to study the volumes. I am not asking your Lordships for a direction that there shall be supplied a general index of the Reports and Appendices, for, of course, that would be a very large matter, and one into which I do not presume to enter now. All I ask is that we should have placed before us, in a clear and concise way, a list of the publications of the Commission, in order that we may know what has been published and what has not been published, and that we may be able to lay our hands upon such information as we may seek. An eminent authority of your Lordships' House once said that knowledge of the means for reference was really the knowledge itself, and I believe he was taken somewhat severely to task for that aphorism; but I must express my own opinion that he was perfectly right. A great deal of our knowledge must be potential, that is to say, you cannot carry the entire details of it in your mind ; but, to be in the position to make use of it, you must be able to go to the place or lay your hand upon the book where the necessary information is to be obtained. When reference is possible our knowledge is very much increased and enlarged, or, at all events, made more available, which tends to the same result. My Lords, the Commission is composed of noblemen and gentlemen of the highest possible attainments, and I think it is to be regretted that they have not paid some attention to the work I have referred to, for it would, I am sure, have saved those who are engaged in antiquarian and historical researches great waste of time, and I have also not the least doubt that the public convenience will be facilitated if your Lordships will grant this Return. When once granted, I hope it will be appended to every publication that may come out, either upon the wrapper or otherwise. It is really very inconvenient not to be able to ascertain the order of these various publications. Within the last few weeks a great part of the Cecil Manuscripts have been published, but there is no indication as to what Report they are connected with. Whether it is one of the Appendices to the 11th or 12th Report, or whether it is an excrescence or a mere casual volume, there is not the least clue ; and though that alone is a trifling matter, I think your Lordships will agree that when you wish to arrange on your shelves works of so valuable a character, it is very inconvenient to be vexed and thwarted by mere neglect on the part of those who have to superintend such matters. It would be of great public convenience, I am sure, if this Return were granted.

*EARL STANHOPE: I should like to say a few words in reference to what has fallen from my noble relative. I have collected these volumes since the starting of the Commission, that is to say, I have now 12 volumes, and I have the greatest difficulty in finding out what are the dates of their publication, or in what order they proceed. It is difficult to know from the title page at the top of each volume what manuscripts are reported upon. Lately, also, the size of the volumes has been diminished ; from being, as formerly, folio volumes, they have now become octavo, and the collection, therefore, does not look uniform, or as important as it should from its nature and character. I quite endorse everything that has fallen from my noble relative in reference to the valuable character of these Reports, which, I have no doubt, many of your Lordships possess ; but I think their value would be much enhanced if such a Return as he has moved for were granted.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) : My Lords, I am a very humble member of the Commission to whose labours the noble Lords have referred, but by special desire of the Commission I, like most of the other Commissioners, never attend. The Commission prefers to work principally in the absence of most of its members, and it works, I imagine, much better in consequence of their non-attendance. But there is one active member who, I regret to see, is not present in the House, the Master of the Rolls ; and I think he is the only person who can give my noble Friend that information or those assurances which he demands. Of course, there is no objection to the Return being given ; but I do not imagine that even the Master of the Rolls could, without consultation with the proper authorities, give my noble Friend information as to the mode in which the publications could be amended. I quite sympathise with him as to the advantage of being able to find one's way among the volumes, for I have invariably lost it when I have made the attempt.

EARL BEAUCHAMP : Of course I do not wish in the least to interfere with the contents ; I only desire that there should be given on the wrappers, or elsewhere, some proper indication of the contents.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : I am told that it would be better if the terms of the notice were altered, and perhaps my noble Friend would not mind putting it off for a few days for that purpose.

EARL BEAUCHAMP : I must really object to that. I wrote to the Master of the Rolls on the subject, and I have had no communication from him. Unless I know what the objections are I do not understand why the matter should be postponed.

EARL CADOGAN : Perhaps I may be allowed to say that just before entering the House I met the Master of the Rolls. He told me he was exceedingly sorry that he was obliged to be away, and he gave me charge of a message for my noble Friend.

EARL BEAUCHAMP : I do not understand what the objections are, and I think there must be some misconception in the matter. I have heard some suggestion that the words which I propose are intended to cover the supply of a general index to the contents of the volumes, but nothing is further from my intention. All I ask for is a complete list, with dates and issue of the Reports of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, and of the Appendices thereto, together with an alphabetical index of the collections examined and reported on. Your Lordships know that in each volume several collections are reported upon, of which no trace is to be found, though sometimes on the title page there is given some reference by which, in the result, a particular collection reported on may be found. I am quite satisfied that no printer of any reputation would allow such work to issue from his establishment without some means of reference, such as I am asking for. I do not understand what the objections are, and without an explanation I cannot withdraw my Motion.

*LORD DE RAMSEY : In answer to my noble Friend, perhaps I may state a little more fully what the Prime Minister has already said, that there is no objection whatever to grant this Return up to a certain extent. The noble Marquess is perfectly right in saying that the terms of the Notice would require to be altered, because what appears in the Motion is what the noble Earl, as I understand, does not ask for, that is a general index. If that is so, all I have to say, on behalf of the Home Office, is that there is no objection whatever to give the Return for which the noble Earl asks ; that is, a complete list with the dates of issue of the Reports, an alphabetical list of the collections examined, and an alphabetical list of the owners of such collections. That can easily be supplied, if that meets with the noble Earl's wishes.

EARL BEAUCHAMP : I do not ask for an alphabetical list of the owners of manuscripts ; I only ask for what is in the Notice.

*LORD DE RAMSEY : That can be supplied at the same time. I think the line can be drawn at a general index, which would be extremely expensive and cause a great deal of trouble. There is no objection whatever, therefore, to grant the Return which the noble Earl asks for.

Address ordered.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEES.

Report from, That the Committee have added the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Morley, the Lord Watson, the Lord Bramwell, the Lord Esher, the Lord Macnaghten, and the Lord Morris to the Standing Committee for General Bills for the consideration of the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Bill ; read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock, to Friday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 13th May, 1890.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

INDIAN FACTORY LABOUR.

MR. JAMES MACLEAN (Oldham) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that at a mass meeting of mill operatives, numbering upwards of 10,000 persons, which was held at Bombay on 24th April, a petition was adopted at the Millowners' Association to close the mills for four days in the month, and that two of the workpeople, both women, made speeches complaining of being pressed to come to work even on Sundays, and said that one day's rest out of the seven would be a great benefit both to the operatives and to the millowners ; and whether any provision is made in the Indian Factory Act Amendment Bill for closing the factories on Sundays?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): It is stated in the Indian newspapers that such a meeting was held and such a petition adopted. The Bill now before the Indian Legislature provides four days' holiday a month for women and children.

MR. MACLEAN: Are the four holidays to be on Sundays?

SIR J. GORST: The Bill does not specify that they shall be on Sunday, but I believe there is very little doubt that Sunday will be the day selected.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA—CATTLE FROM THE UNITED STATES.

MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he has any recent Reports as to the health of the cattle from the United States slaughtered at the ports of debarkation; and if he will take measures to have in future a regular inspection of the carcasses of such animals, as providing some indication of the health of cattle in the United States?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Since the beginning of the present year 41,000 animals have been landed at Deptford and 40,000 at Liverpool from the United States. During that period five cargoes were found containing animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia. Three of these cargoes were landed at Deptford on February 21, March 23, and March 25, and two at Liverpool on March 29. They were shipped at the ports of Baltimore, Boston, and New York. Having regard to these facts, it would appear to be unnecessary to undertake the trouble and expense of a post-mortem examination of each carcass in order to ascertain the existence of disease which is already known to exist. But the Board will always be careful that a sufficient inspection will be made at the ports to indicate the condition of the animals coming from America.

Mr. James Maclean

BULPHAN SCHOOL.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, as the Education Department allows the £10 grant under Article 111 to Bulphan School without making a demand for a census of the population within any radius, he will also give this grant to other schools in similar circumstances, irrespective of a demand for a census within a two mile radius?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Special inquiry was made as to the population before the £10 grant was allowed to Bulphan School, but the Department only asks for a census whenever there is reason to doubt whether the population is actually within the limit prescribed by the Code, and if my hon. Friend will refer to Section 19 of the Act of 1876, he will see that in such circumstances they are bound to take this precaution.

MARKET RIGHTS AND TOLLS COMMISSION.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the Royal Commission on Market Rights and Tolls closed the inquiry last year; and if he can state the cause of the delay in the presentation of the final Report?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am informed that the Royal Commission on Market Rights and Tolls have not yet completed their inquiry, as some further evidence has yet to be taken. The preparation of the Report is being proceeded with as rapidly as the voluminous nature of the evidence will permit, and the Commission hope to present their Report to Her Majesty in June.

NATIONAL SCHOOL CHILDREN.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that two children, presenting themselves with pence in their hands with their mother at the National (Church) School, Tiffeld (near Towcester), have been refused admission to the school, the mistress having stated that she was acting under the orders of the rector of the parish in declining to receive these children; and whether he will either cause these children to be received, or stop all grants in aid to this school?

SIR W. HART DYKE: The Department could not refuse to regard the exclusion of the children as reasonable, on its being represented that they were encouraged by their parents in resisting the teachers' authority, and had become unmanageable, but if there is no other school available, and the parents of the children are willing to submit them to proper disciplinary rules, the Department would not sustain the managers in declining to re-admit them.

LONG HOURS OF PRISON WARDERS.

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY (London-derry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has heard that complaints are made by the warders of the local prisons in England as to the long hours of attendance and work; whether in most prisons the hours of attendance are never less than from six in the morning to six in the afternoon, and every fourth day from six in the morning until ten at night, with each alternate Sunday counting for work as a week-day; and whether he will cause an inquiry to be made into the condition and the alleged grievances of the prison warders?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Prison Commissioners that no such complaints have reached them. Warders come on duty at 6 a.m. and leave at 6 p.m., but during that period they are allowed 40 minutes for breakfast and 70 minutes for dinner. They have duty on alternate Sundays. Every few days a warder remains to sleep in the prison. On these days he is on duty till 8 p.m., and goes to bed at 10. I have no reason to believe that the warders are dissatisfied with their condition, or that they suffer from grievances calling for inquiry.

SCOTCH PROCURATOR FISCALS.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is true that a police sergeant at Bo'ness holds the position of Procurator Fiscal, and can, consequently, institute a prosecution, issue a warrant, personally arrest, and afterwards act as prosecutor; and whether this was recently done in the case of the crew of the steamship Firdew, of London, who refused to proceed to sea in that vessel in consequence of the terms of the articles which they had signed being altered without their consent, and, if so, whether he will take steps to remedy what appears to be a reasonable grievance?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): It is the fact that a police sergeant at Bo'ness holds the position of Procurator Fiscal, and can consequently institute a prosecution, arrest, and act as prosecutor, but he has no power to issue a warrant. There is nothing illegal in such an appointment; and a clause similar to the section of the General Police Act of 1862, authorising the practice, has been approved by the several Committees of this and the other House, who have considered the provisions of the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill. A complaint has reached me as regards the crew who deserted from the steamship Firdew, into which I have ordered inquiry. But, so far as I can at present ascertain, nothing was done by the police on that occasion which they are not authorised to do, and no proceedings took place before the Burgh Court in connection with the desertion.

VIVISECTION.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that although an Assistant Inspector was appointed last year under 39 and 40 Vic. c. 77, regulating vivisection, no laboratory where experiments on living animals were carried on was inspected more than three times, some twice, and others only once in the year 1889; whether, whilst the terms of the Act are explicit, that "the Secretary of State shall cause all registered places to be, from time to time, visited by Inspectors," it is the fact that for the greater part of the year the experimentors are practically free from inspection; and whether, since it appears from the recently issued Report that the Inspectors still mainly rely on the statements of the vivisectioners themselves for the materials for their Report and Return, it is the intention of the Government to make arrangements for the more effectual carrying out of the spirit of the Act?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am aware of the number of visits paid by the Inspector as stated in the last Report. The words "from time to time" in the Act have been interpreted in the Home Office to mean once a year, and the Act does not contemplate that the actual experimentation shall take place under the personal supervision of the Inspector. I have no information in my possession which leads me to think that the spirit of the Act is not effectually carried out. On the contrary, the Reports made to the Inspector of the various experiments, and often communicated to the scientific journals, show that the conditions imposed by Parliament are loyally carried out. Should facts be brought to my knowledge showing that this is not the case, or that the existing provisions for inspection are unsatisfactory, I should not hesitate to apply for additional assistance for carrying out the Act.

NAVAL HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I had intended to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that nothing has yet been done to carry out the recommendation of the jury in the recent Barracouta case at Sheerness with respect to the hospital accommodation, and that, in case of accidents, the sufferers, if not military men, would still be sent to Chatham, although there has been and is ample accommodation in the Military Hospital at Sheerness; but as I do not see the noble Lord in his place I will postpone the question until Friday.

TELEGRAPHIC CODES.

MR. JAMES MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, according to the Rules passed at the Telegraphic Convention of 1879, and which have been in force for the last 10 years, the number of letters in words used in Telegraphic Codes is restricted to 10; whether he is aware that, at the forthcoming Convention, a proposition will be brought forward to further restrict the number of letters to eight, a change which would put the whole mercantile community to great inconvenience and expense; and whether the Representatives of the British Government will be instructed to resist such an alteration, and to refuse to sanction it till it has been submitted to Parliament?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the Convention governing the telegraphic relations of the States which are parties thereto is that concluded at St. Petersburg in 1875. The Regulations annexed to that Convention were last revised in Berlin in 1885, and the number of letters used in telegraphic codes has since then been restricted to 10 letters both for European and Extra-European telegrams. I am not aware that any proposition will be brought forward at the forthcoming Conference in Paris to restrict the number of letters in code telegrams to eight, and I do not apprehend that such a proposal is likely to be made.

UNCLAIMED ARMY PRIZE MONEY.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can state if upwards of £600,000 unclaimed Army Prize Money has been devoted during the present century to keeping up Chelsea Hospital and Gardens, and if a sum of £76,000 Consols is now awaiting claimants; whether, since 1863, £81,976 of soldiers' unclaimed balances has been handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners; and if, from either of such sources, allowances can be awarded to such deserving old soldiers, incapable of work and in want, who served before the enemy in the Crimea or during the Indian Mutiny?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): The sums transferred from Army prize money and from soldiers' unclaimed balances are substantially as stated in the question, but such funds can only be devoted to the purposes laid down in the Statutes under which they are transferred. But I should like to look into this matter a little further before arriving at any positive conclusion.

ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye):

I had intended to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state the exact precedence to which a local corps of Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers would be entitled when taking part in a brigade parade composed as follows: one regiment of Yeomanry Cavalry, local corps of Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers, local corps of Artillery Volunteers, and two companies of Rifle Volunteers? At the request of the noble Lord I beg to postpone the question.

INCOME TAX ON HOLDINGS OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.):

I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether considerable amounts of Consols, Indian, Colonial, and Foreign Government Funds, as well as of many other securities, of which the dividend warrants or coupons are payable in England, are held by persons living in Scotland and Ireland; whether, in the Parliamentary Paper recently issued on the Incidence of Imperial Taxation in the three countries, the Income Tax on the interests payable on all the above securities is set down exclusively as part of the contribution of England to the Imperial Revenue; and whether, to arrive at a fair apportionment to Scotland and Ireland, any allowance has been made for the Income Tax contributed by Scottish and Irish holders of the above securities?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Income Tax is deducted in London from Consols and other Government securities of which the interest is payable in London, and it follows that Scotch holders of such securities pay Income Tax in England. Income Tax is deducted on Consols at the Bank of Ireland, therefore Irish holders of Consols pay for the most part their Income Tax in Ireland. The Parliamentary Paper No. 163 states that the Return charges Income Tax under the country where it is collected. This is, in fact, the only definite information which we possess. I have not, however, lost sight of the fact that under the system of deduction in force England may be credited with Income Tax charged on Government Securities and the securities of various companies held by Scotchmen; but, on the other hand, Scotland may be credited with Income Tax charged on securities of Scotch companies held by Englishmen. It is possible, however, to give some indications of the extent to which securities paying Income Tax in England are held in Scotland. I learn from the Bank of England that out of 1,070 dividend warrants posted under letter A, 1,035 went to English addresses, 14 to Scotch, and 21 to Irish. But I have tried the letter most favourable to Scotland. Under the letter M, including Mac, out of a total of 1,079, 1,028 went to English addresses, 37 to Scotch, and 14 to Irish. Again, the dividends on £6,020,000 Consols out of a total mass of about £500,000,000 were paid in April last by the Bank to agents of Scotch banks. Further information has been received from an English bank much to the same effect. These figures would point to a very low percentage as representing the Scotch holding of Consols and other securities paying Income Tax in England. But, as a matter of fact, the contribution of Scotland to the Exchequer might be increased by the allowance of a high percentage in respect of their securities without reaching the figure of 11 per cent., upon which we base our contribution to the local expenditure of Scotland.

THE SUGAR CONVENTION.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the statement in the Standard of yesterday is correct, namely, that the German Government has received information that England has determined to defer for the present the carrying out of the Sugar Convention?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FER-GUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Standard said that a rumour to this effect was current at Magdeburg. Her Majesty's Government are not aware of any such information having been received by the German Government.

THE BARRACKS BILL.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he proposes to furnish to the House any information as to the districts or localities in which, and the objects for which, the expenditure of £4,100,000, under the Barracks Bill, is to be devoted?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I explained our proposals in considerable detail in introducing the Barracks Bill; but I am quite ready to meet the wish expressed by the right hon. Gentleman, and accordingly I laid on the Table yesterday a Schedule showing the detailed expenditure proposed in various localities.

MR. SEXTON: How much of the £300,000 to be taken this year is to be spent in Ireland?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid I cannot answer that question without notice, but I think a very considerable portion, because nothing is nearer my heart than that something should be done to the Dublin Barracks.

MR. SEXTON: What barracks are to be dealt with this year?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Both the Royal Barracks and the Richmond Barracks.

MR. G. ELLIOT (York, N.R., Richmond): May I ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Richmond Barracks, in Dublin, have been passed as healthy; whether an officer of the 2nd Battalion the King's Royal Rifles, quartered in these barracks, has recently been attacked by typhoid fever; and whether the barracks are now in a satisfactory sanitary condition?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am sorry to say that an officer in these barracks was recently attacked with enteric fever. He had been on leave on three occasions during the previous month, and it is therefore possible that the disease was not contracted in the barracks. A good deal has recently been done to the drainage of Richmond Barracks; but until the works immediately contemplated are complete, I cannot say that I am satisfied that every effort has been made to avert the recurrence of this disease.

IRELAND—DISTRICT INSPECTOR GAMBLE.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report published in the Glasgow Evening Citizen of an interview which purports to have been held between its special reporter in Tipperary and District Inspector Gamble; whether District Inspector Gamble refused to inform Father Humphries, when asked by him, whether the report of the interview was correct or not; and whether it is usual or in accordance with the Rules of the Irish Police Service that officers of that body should grant interviews to newspaper reporters?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I must ask the hon. Member to postpone this and also another question which appears in his name.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: May I be allowed to say that these are matters, relating as they do to police watching, which are of very great importance. There are proceedings now going on which I believe to be endangering the public peace, and I think that some effort should be made by the Department to obtain the information I ask for. I will postpone the question until to-morrow. I cannot allow it to stand over longer.

LAND COMMISSION—LEITRIM.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he will afford immediate facilities for the return visit of the Sub-Commissioners of the Land Commission to North Leitrim in order to dispose of the applications for fair rents, some of which have been listed for hearing more than two years.

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone the question.

MR. CONWAY: I will postpone it until Monday.

LIEUTENANT WILCOX, R.N.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I had a notice on the Paper to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he is aware that Mr. Wilcox, Lieutenant R.N., and Coastguard Officer at Spanish Point, Miltown Malbay, County Clare, acts as local agent for the Army and Navy Co-operative Stores, and has a shop fitted up and stocked in the locality, selling, amongst other things, wine, spirits, and tobacco; and if such conduct is in accordance with the Regulations of the Admiralty; and, if not, whether instructions will be issued to Lieutenant Wilcox to desist from such practices. As the noble Lord is not in his place I will postpone the question until to-morrow, but I wish to say that as this is the third time I have postponed it at the request of the noble Lord I hope he will find it convenient to give his attendance here at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

THE IRISH LIGHTS BOARD.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received any reply to his recent letter to the Irish Lights Board, asking for their observations upon the Memorial addressed to him by Mr. John M'Mahon, of Armagh, complaining that the Lights Board had refused to admit him to a competitive examination to fill a clerkship in their office; whether Mr. M'Mahon's application to be nominated for examination was supported by all the civic members of the Irish Lights Board; whether the majority of the Board, in refusing the nomination, correctly represented that the Board of Trade had instructed them to present the names of no more than five candidates for the vacant office; and whether, pending the decision of the Board of Trade on the question of Mr. M'Mahon's right to present himself for examination, the examination will be postponed?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Commissioners of Irish Lights have replied that they have no observations to offer upon Mr. John M'Mahon's Memorial. I have caused that gentleman to be informed accordingly, and that the Board of Trade have, as I stated in reply to a question of the hon. Member for North Louth the Session before last, no control over the Commissioners in the matter. I am not aware what members of the Lighthouse Board supported the application, or of the reasons given by the majority for refusing it. When the Order in Council settling the office establishment of the Lighthouse Board was made two years ago the Board of Trade made it a condition, in order that the competitive system might be introduced into this Service, that five candidates should be nominated by the Commissioners to compete for each vacant lower grade clerkship. As the Commissioners of Irish Lights are acting within their rights in this matter there is no decision for the Board of Trade to arrive at.

THE EXECUTION OF DR. CROSS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he can state the cause of the failure of the Coroner's Jury to record a verdict in the case of Dr. Cross, alleged to have been hanged in Cork Gaol, about three years ago, for poisoning his wife; whether the law requires that a Coroner's inquest must certify the cause of death in all cases of persons dying within prisons; whether the Government intend taking any and what steps to have the law complied with in this case; and whether the death of the man hanged, and alleged to have been Dr. Cross, has been registered; and, if so, whether he has any objection to state the date upon which the death was registered, the cause of death given, and by whose authority it was so registered?

MR. MADDEN: The Executive Government have no control over the action of the Coroner in this matter. The death was duly registered in a medical certificate given by Dr. Coates, interim Registrar of the district, dated February 15, 1888. The cause of death stated was "injury to the spinal column in the neck, effected by hanging." The Registration of Births and Deaths Act dispenses with a medical certificate where the cause of death has been found by a Coroner's Jury. In the absence of such a finding registration can, in my opinion, be effected on a medical certificate. The circumstances under which no verdict was recorded are simply these. The inquest was opened by the Coroner in due course, when some of the jurymen called for the presence of the executioner, and the executioner not being forthcoming the Coroner adjourned the inquest.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire whether it is not the fact that the executioner could not have left Cork for several hours after the Jury declined to return a verdict; and whether it is not also the case that in Liverpool before a Coroner's Jury consented to return a verdict they required the attendance of the executioner?

MR. MADDEN: I have no objection to make inquiry if the hon. Gentleman attaches importance to the matter; but I believe that in this case the coroner found that the executioner had left the town, and he had no jurisdiction to summon and enforce his attendance.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Is it true that the executioner was not sober, and was it not necessary that his absence should have been reported to the next Judge of Assize?

MR. MADDEN: I have no such information.

In reply to a question by Mr. CHILDERS,

MR. MADDEN said: I cannot answer for the course of procedure under the English Act; but under the Irish Act, where there has been no inquest or no finding by a jury, registration may, in my opinion, be effected, as in ordinary cases, upon a medical certificate.

TITHES.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury will allow me to put a question to him of which I have not given notice. It has reference to a matter referred to by the President of the Local Government Board on Friday. The right hon. Gentleman said he would seriously consider the advisability of advancing money at a low rate of interest, to enable landlords to buy up tithes. Have the Government arrived at any conclusion upon that subject; and is the First Lord of the Treasury able to make any statement at this moment?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I think the hon. and learned Gentleman must feel that a question of this kind requires notice.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I beg to give notice that on Thursday I will ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether he will make a full and definite statement on the subject before the next stage of the Tithes Bill?

SHIP ARAUNAH (SEIZURE OF VICTORIAN SCHOONER).

Address for—

"Copy of Correspondence that has taken place with reference to the seizure of the Victorian Schooner Araunah in the Behring Sea."—(Mr. Staveley Hill.)

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Sir Joseph Dodge Weston, knight, for Bristol (East Division).

MOTION.

ALLOTMENTS ACT (1887) AMENDMENT (COMPULSORY PURCHASE) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Channing. Bill to further cheapen the procedure for the Compulsory Purchase of Land under "The Allotments Act, 1887," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Channing, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Halley Stuart, Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Francis Stevenson, and Mr. Seale Hayne.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 271.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL—(No. 244.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment to Question [12th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out all the words after the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House declines to assent to a Bill which provides by payment out of public moneys for the extinction of annual licences in the manner provided in the said Bill,"—(Mr. Cairns.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*(2.45.) SIR W. H. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): Reference has been made, during the course of this Debate, to the attitude and action taken by the Church of England Temperance Society, and although I have no mandate from them to speak on their behalf I think it is only right that I should clearly state the position to the House. The hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) stated yesterday that the support which this Society is supposed to give to the Bill is really the action of a small sub-Committee, and he insinuated that they were acting without full authority from the Society. Now, it is perfectly true that this action has been taken by the legislative sub-Committee; but that is only a portion of the truth, for, as a matter of fact, the Central Committee, which is the Constitutional organ of the Society, met the day before and carefully considered the provisions of the Bill. They had no opportunity of receiving full information in regard to the provisions of the Bill, and I believe that, as a matter of fact, they had only one copy of it before them. But however that may be, they came to the conclusion that their best course was to relegate the Bill and the whole of the question to the Legislative Sub-Committee, and they distinctly gave that Committee full power to consider the provisions of the measure and to propose any amendments in it that were necessary. They were also authorised to make arrangements for an interview with the President of the Local Government Board, and generally to represent the Society in reference to the provisions of the Bill. Therefore, I think I may confidently state that the Committee fully represent the whole Society, and have Constitutionally expressed its opinions. It is quite true that the Executive Committee have very properly re-affirmed the principles laid down three years ago in regard to compensation, and these principles are, I believe, embodied or referred to in a resolution intimating that they have put down certain suggestions which they ask the Government to take into consideration. I should like to say further, in order that there may be no misconception, that the Legislative Committee are a very strong and representative body, and I should like to direct the attention of the House to the outcome of their action in order that there may be no mistake. Having heard the statement of the President of the Local Government Board, the Legislative Committee put down certain conditions upon which they were prepared to give their support to the Government. The suggestions which they ask the Government to take into consideration are five—first, that words should be introduced providing that nothing in the Act should be taken to prejudice the question of compensation or to establish any claims thereto in any Licensing Act, or to determine the question of licensing authority. It is quite clear that the Legislative Committee have clearly grasped the distinction between the provisions of the Bill and compensation, which are two entirely different matters. Before they went to the President of the Local Government Board they had grasped it, and they wished words to be introduced clearly distinguishing between compensation and the provisions of the Bill. In the second place, the resolution declares that nothing in the Act shall be taken to interfere with the power possessed by the present Licensing Authorities to refuse the renewal of licences without compensation. Three other suggestions were made, and I understand that the Government have accepted every one of them, and, that being the case, the support which the Society is in a position to give is, I think, justified. Hence the whip sent out by the Chairman of the Society, which was referred to last night. Reference was made by the hon. Member for Barrow to the 10 years' limit, and he seemed to think that it was one of the conditions the Society made in giving its support to the Bill. I venture to say that it is nothing of the kind. It is perfectly inapplicable to the present Bill. The 10 years' limit Bill dealt entirely with compensation, and it would be monstrous to say that because you are going, by this Bill, to give the County Councils power to buy up licences, you should, by a side wind, without any consideration as to the form the compensation should take, enact in a Bill, which does not apply to the question at all, that after a certain period compensation shall cease altogether. That would be prejudging the question altogether, and I think that, as hon. Gentlemen opposite object to prejudice the general question, the best course is to leave it entirely open. As the 10 years' limit has been referred to, I should like to say what the position of the Society and my own position are in regard to it. The position we take up is this: We refuse to recognise any legal claim whatever for compensation, assuming that the Magistrates have absolute discretion. But we hold that there is very strong moral and equitable claim to a moderate, reasonable, and terminable compensation. That claim arises because, assuming that the law on the matter to be perfectly clear, still no sufficient notice of a great change in the administration of the law has been given to the trade. We suggest that, when licences are taken away because the Magistrates think the houses unnecessary, compensation on a scale to be fixed by Parliament should be paid during the 10 years following such an Act, by which time we think sufficient notice would have been given. I do not think that any one judging the question fairly can come to any other conclusion than that it is hopeless to expect that Magistrates or any Local Authority invested with the absolute power of discretion would use the power of withdrawing licences unless accompanied by compensation. Although the Temperance Party may be strong on some of the Local Bodies, still it must be remembered that among that Party there are many fair-minded men who would decline to change the present system of administration and to throw men and their families out of employment and destroy their property simply because England has decided upon taking a moral turn and intends hereafter to become sober. I heartily support the Bill, because I think it is a forward step in the Temperance Movement. I know it is said that it deals with compensation. If I thought it dealt with compensation I should have a good deal to say on the subject, because I think it would be necessary to introduce many other provisions into the Bill. But it is not compensation that it deals with; it is rather a system of purchase, which is wholly and entirely different from compensation; and I scarcely understand the confusion which appears to prevail in the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite on the subject. Take the case of a Railway Company. It wants land for a railway, and there are two ways in which it can obtain it—either by purchase under agreement or by compulsory powers. I admit that there is payment in both cases, but there is a great difference in the mode. So also in this case—compensation must depend upon a number of circumstances, especially when the question happens to be compensation for the withdrawal of a licence. I do not think that any hon. Member opposite will deny for a moment that public houses are marketable commodities. They are bought or sold every day, and they are bought and sold by Corporations under Statutory provisions. Personally, I must say I would rather that the public money was spent in extinguishing licences than in keeping them alive, which is the case now. Then we are told of vested interests—that we are proposing to recognise a continuous vested interest. I deny it altogether if by a vested interest is meant an indiscriminate and indefinite interest over a series of years. We are doing nothing of the sort. But will any hon. Member deny that there is a vested interest at present which is a purchaseable article and a marketable commodity? It is recognised that there are vested interests in beer houses licensed before 1869, and that the Magistrates have no power to withdraw these licences. So also there is certainly a vested interest in every public house for a year, and a distinct value can be put upon the chance of renewal of the licence. There will always be a value attached to the house so long as the licence is continued, and it will be a marketable commodity varying with the reputation of the house, the character of the neighbourhood, the disposition of the authorities, and many other circumstances. Marketable commodities have no relation to compensation, and I fail to see how there can be anything detrimental to the cause of temperance in giving to the County Councils the powers contained in the Bill in addition to the limited powers they at present possess of buying public houses for other public purposes. I confess I cannot understand the policy of a certain section of the Temperance Party. There are two classes of temperance reformers—one who would rather have no reform save according to their own method. These are the impracticable temperance reformers, and as Mr. Bright said some years ago they have failed, and they always will fail, because they do not take advantage of their opportunities, but prefer a cut-and-dried system, and will accept nothing but that system. It is owing to the attitude of this class of temperance reformers that temperance legislation has been kept back and retarded during the past 30 or 40 years. But there is another class of reformers—and one which, I am glad to say, is becoming more numerous every day. They are to be found even amongst extreme temperance reformers. I refer to the class who though they have a preference for one system over another, and though they hold a strong opinion that their own system is the only one which ultimately will work out the object they have in view, still, as opportunity offers from year to year, rather than stand still and wait for a time when they can take a leap and a bound they are willing to take a single step, though it may be only a small one, in advance. If the policy of this last-named class had been adopted by the whole Temperance Party in this country, many steps by this time would have been taken, and a great deal of progress would have been made, in the direction in which we desire to go. I believe we should by this time have had a large number of Acts on the Statute Book which would have promoted the cause of temperance. If the House looks back over the past 20 years it will find there have been many proposals made for practical legislation which have been opposed by the extreme section of the Temperance Party. The Act of Mr. Bruce was opposed by them in 1871, and temperance reformers of the present day are bitterly regretting the opposition which was offered to that measure. By that opposition a great opportunity was lost. In that Bill there was the 10 years' limit; and if that measure had been passed we should now be years beyond the 10 years' limit, and the question would have been completely got out of the way. Yet the Temperance Party opposite—for what reason I do not know—preferred their cut-and-dried system, and opposed the very moderate compensation proposed in that Bill. Then there was a remarkable incident in connection with the partial Sunday Closing Bill, brought in by the hon. Member for Durham in 1885 or 1886. That was a very workable Bill, and one that I think would have done an immense deal of good. But what happened? The Bill passed the Second Reading, and there seemed to be a disposition to carry it through; but the Member for South Shields, an ardent temperance reformer, proposed, in Committee, what was practically total closing on Sunday. The hon. Member carried his Amendment in a small House and by a snatch Division, and the result was to wreck the Bill. The Bill was withdrawn, and we have not moved a single step in the matter from that time to this. Then there was the Bill of 1888, and, without saying that that was a perfect measure, I believe it could have been amended and that the Compensation Clauses could have been made perfectly moderate and reasonable. The compensation period would have been terminable, and by this time two years of this terminating period would have elapsed. And in this way opportunities are being lost year by year. We now have the present measure, and I am bound to say that if the Temperance Party defeat it they will incur a very heavy responsibility. I do not know that I can say that it is a very large measure. I admit that it is not large; but I have come to the conclusion that we can only proceed in this matter by small steps, until we can get public opinion educated up to, and the Temperance Party united upon, a general policy. We could get a great deal from this Bill. Do hon. Gentlemen opposite realise what we should gain by it? There would, under it, be no more new licences save under special conditions; there would be a popular body dealing with the temperance question. It might only be the thin end of the wedge, but there it is. And then there would be perfect freedom from all questions in the future as to the absolute discretion of the Magistrates to deal with the question of renewals. This discretion has been termed a blot in the Bill, as it insinuates the idea that the Magistrates have not discretionary powers at present. Well, I am no lawyer, and cannot give a definite opinion on that matter myself; but, at any rate, if there is a doubt in some minds as to the power of the Magistrates, the Bill will set it at rest. Whatever discretion now exists will still exist. Every care has been taken that no increased value shall be occasioned by the Bill; every care has been taken to protect the temperance interest; and, so far as I can judge from the tone and temper of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, he is most willing to entertain any fair suggestion for the amendment of the Bill. The question is—does the House mean to throw away this opportunity? It has had chances before, but has thrown them away. Are we going to repeat that fatal mistake? As I have said, the measure is a small one, and many people doubt how far the County Councils will use the powers which will be conferred upon them, but that is no argument against the Bill. Let us see what the County Councils will do; let us have some new light thrown on this temperance question. The action and attitude of the County Councils will be a guide for future legislation. Some of the County Councils may not use the powers of the Bill, others may use them to the full extent, and others may use them more or less, according to circumstances. I do not think we ought to be frightened by the cry raised as to the large sum of money that will have to be expended. The hon. Member for Barrow always seems to have too much in his mind the aristocratic public houses and to ignore an immense number of small houses. According to a statement I had prepared a year or two ago there are 961 licensed houses in Manchester, and of those the number whose gross rental does not exceed £20 was 116, while the number of those whose rental was from £20 to £30 was 341. It would not cost much to purchase the licences of these houses, which formed nearly one-half of the total number in the town. In both town and country districts there are large numbers of small houses with which the County Councils could deal. I regret that twice the amount mentioned in the Bill has not been devoted to the purpose of buying licences, believing that the Councils will not make such bad bargains as some hon. Members suppose. I support the Bill because I believe it will have the effect of greatly removing the temptations to drink. The measure is an honest attempt to deal with a very difficult question, and it will do good by strengthening public opinion in favour of a more complete measure of temperance reform. Looking at the Bill as an experiment, I am not sure that it will not be wise to make it terminable. For if the Councils should take an extreme view and should decline to spend the money as provided in the Bill, the fund would accumulate and would have to be dealt with by Parliament, and I am not sure, as hon. Members have doubts as to the soundness of the scheme, that the Government would not be well advised if they made the Bill altogether experimental. They might make it terminable at the end of 10 years, and then, having had 10 years' experience, Parliament could revise the whole question. This would mitigate much of the opposition now offered. In conclusion, I would repeat that those who take it upon themselves to defeat the measure—the first practical measure for many years which has had a chance of passing into law—will be accepting a very heavy responsibility—a responsibility for which they will have to give account.

*(3.17.) MR. P. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): It will be for those who belong to the Church of England Temperance Society to meet the hon. Member's arguments in that respect, but, on another point, I may say I am sorry to find that he has no faith in the present Bill. He says it is a small measure and that the County Councils will very likely refuse to act upon it. Well, what can operate in his mind to induce him to support the Bill? So far as I am concerned, I have only one or two considerations to put before the House—and I think they are considerations which will require an answer. It has been my duty for a long time past to deal with licences, and I quite sympathise with any Government that tries to bring about a different state of things in regard to them than that which at present obtains. I can say that anything more unsatisfactory than the present licensing system could not possibly be found. But we are required to deal with quite another consideration here. In Scotland I quite admit that things in this respect are quite different from England and Ireland. We have, as Licensing Magistrates in Scotland, recognised in no way whatever money transactions in regard to licences. We have no regard to the amount of money a person may pay as a matter of speculation for licensed premises, our only consideration being the necessities of the community. It is maintained by the Government that there is a value in licences, and that they ought to be bought at compensation price. I want the President of the Local Government Board to recognise where this value is derived from. The Licensing Magistrates commissioned by the community have a delegated right to give a licence for a certain price. Is that licence worth more than the money paid for it? Let us assume, for the sake of illustration, that the licence on account of the rent of the property is £50 a year. That is a right we give for a money consideration, not for the individual, but the community. If this is not an individual right, to whom does it belong? Unquestionably, it belongs to the community; and what is the consideration thus given or taken? The consideration given is the value of the licence as a working licence. Supposing that the value of the working licence is £100 a year instead of the £50 paid for it, the additional £50 clearly belongs to the community. If any person doubles and trebles that price surely a case is made out for increasing the value of licences, so that instead of £50 licences should cost £100 or more; and, moreover, we should not grant this privilege to any individual and allow him to sell it at a profit, pocketing that profit which belongs to the public. If we are to give licences at their marketable value surely we ought to raise the price. If to raise the price of the licence we take away the whole selling value and the consequent profit surely there is nothing to prevent our doing so. There is in my county a very large estate, the proprietor of which claims the right to let no part of it for the sale of intoxicating drink. The law does not interfere with the proprietor in this action. If he extinguishes a licence on the estate, he has a right to do so in the knowledge that he reduces the value of the house and of his property; but the landlord considers that there is such moral benefit to the people by the extinction of such licence that he refuses to take the extra value for a trade that demoralises the community. The landlord can do that now. Are we to institute a new law which will enable the County Councils to make the community pay for what, under the existing system, a landlord so acting has to pay for himself? These are considerations which must be taken into account in discussing this proposal<sup>1</sup> of the Government. Further, I believe that there is no occasion for pressing this question of compensation. I believe that under the existing law it is quite possible, and quite within the power of the Magistrates, to reduce the number of existing licences very largely without any compensation whatever; and where Licensing Magistrates have had the wish to reduce the number of licences there has been no difficulty about it. I think it is a monstrous proposal that the people of the community should be called upon to pay out of public money for a thing which they have all along held— which the public sentiment of the country holds—is a right conferred not on any individual, but for the community of a particular neighbourhood. I noticed in this discussion that Members speaking from the Benches opposite have very much harped on this: that there are a large number of public houses which can be done away with almost without any compensation whatever. I claim for these small houses that they are not the houses which are doing mischief in the locality. Many of them are hostleries and small hotels conducted upon a plan and under a supervision which make them a convenience to the public and not as objectionable as the large public houses to which the compensation will go if this Bill passes. I think it is unfair that these houses should be singled out, not having influence and the brewers at their back, as places from which the licences may be taken without compensation, while the large houses in populous districts, doing a thriving business at the expense of the morals of the community, are those alone which are to receive compensation. Representing Scotland, I maintain that the highest moral sentiments of the country are distinctly opposed to this proposal as a pernicious measure, and for that reason I shall give a strenuous opposition to the Bill at every stage.

*(3.35.) MR. SOMERVELL (Ayr, &c.): I propose to address a few remarks to the House in support of the vote which I intend to give in favour of this Bill, not as the Representative of Scotland, but merely as the Representative of one of its Divisions. I listened to the remarks of the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Esslemont) with some amazement, for I failed to discover in them a single argument to induce the House to reject the measure. We are here to discuss the Second Reading of a Bill which proposes to divert a portion of the resources of the country to purposes which are desired by the people of Scotland; and hon. Members who represent Scottish constituencies must not lose sight of the fact that if they vote in favour of the Amendment they will deprive the people of Scotland of the means of applying this money to purposes to which they desire to see it applied—such as a proper scheme for police superannuation, freeing education in the compulsory standards, the carrying out of the Pleuro-Pneumonia Act, without trenching on the grant in aid of pauper lunatics. Then, again, the County Councils are about to appoint Medical Officers and Sanitary Inspectors, and I would ask if they are to have no assistance from this fund in paying these new officers? Why is this measure to be thrown out? Not because of any objection on behalf of the individuals who are to find the additional money, but because we are told there is a certain objection on the part of certain people to give compensation to publicans. The Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Barrow does not contain a word about compensation from beginning to end. He only asks the House to pledge itself not to devote the public money to the purchase of annual licences, in the manner provided by this Bill, a totally different thing from compensation. The hon. Member for North-West Manchester (Sir W. Houldsworth) has pointed out that the principle of compensation and the principle of purchase are totally different things. The hon. Member for Barrow, in moving his Amendment, referred to two elections which have recently occurred for the borough I have the honour to represent. He told us that in 1888 an Unionist was defeated because of the Compensation Clauses of the Bill then before the House; but I should like to inform him that in my candidature I distinctly stated that I was in favour of compensation from a fund to be raised out of the drink itself, and of transferring the power of granting or refusing licences to the County Councils; and in order that my statement might not be liable to misrepresentation, I stated that I would vote against any other measure. The result was that I was returned. The constituency I represent are earnest in their advocacy of temperance reform, but they desire to see it carried out in a fair and equitable manner. We have been told by the hon. Member for the Govan Division (Mr. J. Wilson) that the heather is on fire. I am not aware that there is much heather in Govan. It is much more easily found in the district I represent, and I am certainly not aware that it is on fire. In contradiction to the statement of the hon. Member, I say, unhesitatingly, that the people of Scotland are not prepared to sacrifice the money which is proposed to be devoted to purposes of free education and police superannuation in order to throw out this Bill. There is one ground which might justify hon. Members in voting against the measure, namely, if it were proposed to take the money out of the Consolidated Fund; but I apprehend that the only persons entitled to object to this tax are the manufacturers, vendors, and consumers of intoxicating drinks. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that he intended to make the tipplers pay for tea; but now it appears that hon. Gentlemen opposite object to the tipplers paying for the teetotalers. I believe that the people affected are unanimous in supporting the measure in its entirety. The distillers have been met fairly and generously by the Government, who have intimated that they will introduce a measure dealing with German spirits which will more than compensate them for the additional 6d. they will have to pay. So far as the publicans—who are the middlemen—are concerned, they have unanimously passed resolutions in support of the proposals of the Government; and, in regard to the consumers, I am not aware that a single meeting has been held for the purpose of protesting against the additional 6d. The measure is not one of a heroic character, and I really cannot understand why it should not be accepted, seeing that it will confer the advantage of free education and other benefits upon the people of Scotland, as well as promote the cause of temperance. I represent a constituency in which a considerable amount of drink is manufactured, and in which there is a considerable amount consumed, but in which also there are strong Temperance Organisations. In supporting the Second Reading of the Bill, I feel that I am only doing my duty as the Representative of these varied interests, and that the measure itself is one which deals with the temperance question from a practical and sensible point of view.

*(3.45.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I wish to discuss the question from the point of one who has for many years been a practical reformer in the temperance movement. The hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Esslemont) has said that landlords, under present circumstances, have been willing to sacrifice money in order to do away with public houses, but that in future they would go to the County Councils and ask for compensation. I do not believe that that is the fact, and, speaking from my own experience, I may say that wherever the landlord has shut up public houses he has done, as a rule, no injury at all to his tenant, but a great deal to himself, because the entire loss fell upon him. I wish altogether to repudiate the argument used by the Solicitor General last night, and I deny the accuracy of his remarks as to the power of the Magistrates with regard to the refusal to renew licences. I maintain that what the Solicitor General said was bad both in law and in fact, and am prepared to prove both assertions. The case of "Sharp v. Wakefield" has proved that there is no vested interest in public houses, and that the Magistrates have perfect power over the renewal of licences. They have an absolute right to refuse if they choose. Now, I would not vote for this Bill, or for a single word or line in it, if I believed that it would set up a vested interest in any way whatsoever. I believe that when the Amendments promised yesterday by the President of the Local Government Board have been put in the Bill, and perhaps some more adopted while the Bill is in Committee, the measure will be deprived of any ground of complaint that it sets up vested interests. The President of the Local Government Board stated that he would restrict the issue of off licences, and that he would insert a clause which would set forth most clearly the right of Magistrates to use their discretion in refusing to renew licences. That clause is one which I think should be watched very carefully after the speech of the Solicitor General, who, I hope, will have nothing to do with the drafting of it. I should like to point out what, in my opinion, will be the result of the power given under the Bill together with the power which the Magistrates now use fairly. I believe that, after the decision in "Sharp v. Wakefield," the Magistrates will get rid, as far as possible, of all unnecessary and all moderately, as well as badly-conducted, houses. There is another class of houses—generally small houses—conducted very fairly and with credit; but they do a very small business, indeed, and it will be a very good thing to get rid of them. I believe that the purchasing power intrusted to County Councils will be used for the purpose of getting rid of those houses. I desire to see them got rid of because they do an unprofitable business and prevent other houses from being managed in a respectable manner. Such houses deprive a neighbourhood of the peace which ought to prevail. My experience as a Magistrate is that in a village where there is only one public house, good order prevails, and the services of the policeman are not in much request; but in villages where there are two or more public houses it takes fully half the time of the policemen to watch the public houses. I can speak of this with some experience as a Magistrate; for when I was actively engaged in attending Petty Sessions more regularly than I am able to do now, I found that, in my division, nearly all the cases came from four parishes, in two of which there were two public houses, in one three, and in the other five. We had only to sit once a month, and I believe that if in each of these parishes there had only been one public house, it would not have been necessary to sit more than once in three months. No Government can accept such an Amendment as this now under consideration, and then go on with the Bill. It is an Amendment that will be absolutely fatal to the Bill. What has been the object of reform in temperance matters for years past but to decrease temptation and diminish public houses? Will not that be the result of this Bill? I do not, myself, see why temperance reformers should object to public houses providing funds to assist them. It seems to me rather a dog-in-the-manger policy. Some temperance reformers will not give any money from rates, and now they will not allow publicans to assist them. I have always recognised that, if there is no legal or vested interest, a publican has, at any rate, the right to be treated as any other tradesman would be if disturbed. We are told that Parliament ought not to deal with this question, and I ask, Why not? I say, on the contrary, that we are almost pledged by our action in 1888 to deal with the question in the present Parliament. The constituencies did not wish the Licensing Clauses to be incorporated in the Bill of 1888 on good and sufficient ground, for they do not wish it to be a question at the first election of County Councillors. Well, I do not know what other temperance reformers may be pledged to in this matter. In 1888 I saw the crisis coming, and went down to Grimsby and asked both interests to meet me on the same day, and the resolution then come to expressly states that it ought to be dealt with by a separate and comprehensive Bill in the present Parliament. Now, I strongly support this Bill for what there is in it, but I shall probably move some amendments in Committee. I am strongly in favour of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington's (Lord R. Churchill) Bill, for I believe in the abolition of beer houses, the raising of the status of public houses, and direct responsibility of those having the control of them; and I agree that there should be some provision to make Magistrates more careful than they are in granting renewals. I would even go so far as this: I would compel every public house to have a coffee room in it, where refreshments could be got without having to go to the bar or the tap room. I would also like very much to see some limitation put with regard to the purchasing powers. I think that a term of 10 years would be quite enough for this Bill. In the meantime, there could be a large comprehensive scheme that would thoroughly deal with the question. I think that the publicans are as much entitled to compensation for disturbance from County Councils as they would be if disturbed for the purposes of public improvements or of a railroad, and I do not see why we should refuse to give them this compensation, in order to smooth the way for temperance, or to ensure the health and prosperity of the people. I have not forgotten, and I cannot forget, the admission of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) when he said, in 1880, that he wanted a frank recognition of the principle that we are not to deny the publicans as a class the benefits of equal treatment. Here is laid down the principle of equitable compensation for disturbing the trade by the will of the people, or their representatives on Local Councils.

*(4.2.) MR. A. GATHORNE HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead): I wish to treat this question as far as possible free from Party bias. I am content to take it that the effect of the "Sharp v. Wakefield" decision was correctly put by the other side, and that there is no vested right in licences. But at the same time I take that with the qualification that has been given to it by many speakers, for it has been clearly pointed out by hon. Members opposite, that, though there is no vested right in licences, the holders of them have a claim to fair and equitable treatment, and that their rights have so far been recognised. It has so far been the established practice that their position should not be disturbed without adequate reason that it would be indeed a harsh thing if their trade were disturbed without adequate compensation being given to them. I am not now dealing with the amount of compensation, but merely with the principle. Lord Coleridge has said that there is nothing in England that would help the question more than bringing to bear upon it the great principles of fairness and justice, and nothing would defeat their ends more than if any one had the right to say he has been unjustly and inequitably treated. Whatever may be the legal rights of the licence-holders, they have an equity that they should not be ruined because the mind of England has changed on the subject. Their equitable interest ought not to be upset. That would not be to the advantage of the Temperance Party; and would recoil on the heads of those who supported it. Let me point out the difference between abstract and individual interests. We are all in the House of Commons the advocates of economy in the abstract, but all know very well that when the case of a particular interest is brought before the House we are apt to throw our ideas of economy to the winds. I am satisfied that many of those who are at this moment shouting for no compensation to the publicans, if it came to the individual case of Mr. So-and-so, with whom they were acquainted, and if they found that he had invested the savings, perhaps of a lifetime, in a public house for which he had paid a considerable price, and was to be turned out into the streets without a penny of compensation, they would be outraged at such a thing taking place, and there would be a block in the way of the temperance movement in the future. The Mover of the Amendment raised also the question as to whether compensation should be given to other persons, and gave an instance of property at Liverpool where in one district there were eight public houses, and in the other only one, and argued that damage had resulted to property in the district where there were eight. I venture to think that that is an argument to which this House would not listen without requiring to know more about the neighbourhood. Then the Mover of the Amendment said, take any hundred working men, eliminate from them all the total abstainers, and the majority of those left would repudiate compensation proposals. That test, however, it is impossible to carry out. For my own part I can only say this, that I have in many constituencies and on many occasions spoken to large representative meetings of working men, and I have always advocated the principle of fair and legitimate compensation, and stated that it was impossible to meet the question on any other terms. On those occasions I have met with few dissentient voices. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir George Trevelyan) has given vent to one or two propositions which, to my mind, are absolutely astounding. In the first place he has committed himself to this, that the partial extinction of public houses would not diminish drink, but would only give a larger traffic to those remaining, and would really do no good. I can only say that that statement is in opposition to the statements of temperance reformers up to now. Everyone who has addressed the House upon this question has deplored the number of licences that exist. I cannot help thinking that the great wit of the right hon. Gentleman must have deserted him when, in the next place, he was dealing with the question of whether it was the houses of great or small value that caused intemperance to the greater extent. He (Sir George Trevelyan) showed that he had made an examination of the number of public houses in Bedfordshire, and the Returns of drunkenness, and also the Returns in London, and he found that the offences were much greater in London than in Bedfordshire, the houses being of greater value in London. He, therefore, seemed to think that he had proved his proposition. To deliberately put before the House the naked proposition of the comparison between Bedfordshire and London was almost an insult to the capabilities of this House. This measure consists of three parts. In the first place, it redeems the pledges of the President of the Local Government Board to give further assistance to the ratepayers with regard to local taxation. I know the grievance of that pledge not having been fulfilled was very seriously felt in the country. It was felt that something should be done to get that £800,000 out of the Chancellor of the Exchequer which we lost by the Van and Wheel Tax not being passed. I attended with the deputation which waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I urged that view; and I am most thankful to the right hon. Gentleman for the full, frank, and free manner in which he has fulfilled that pledge in the present Bill. I believe that the country attaches the greatest importance to it. The second question is the suspension of licences. Do hon. Members who oppose this really consider what they are doing? It will be found practically impossible to carry into effect a very great and heroic measure of stopping an enormous number of public houses at a time. I believe time will fight on our side. The Magistrates have every right, and they certainly have the duty, to see that they only renew licences when the houses are well conducted. I believe there is an increasing feeling among them that that duty presses upon them. The suspensory powers in this Bill will prevent the creation of new licences, and in an appreciable time a great reform will have been carried out, and one that will be very beneficial to the community. Then there comes the proposal, to which the greater part of this Debate has been addressed—the purchase of licences. To that there have been two objections urged: one that the Bill is inadequate, and the other that it involves untold liabilities. I should quite agree that the proposal was wholly inadequate if it was a proposal for dealing with all licences, but the Government proposal is for the extinction not of all licences, but of some licences by purchase. The sum intended to be appropriated for the purpose shows that is only intended to be a small act for a temporary purpose. If the money is wisely and beneficially used I believe that it will be supplemented by a further sum. I think it is perfectly fair that, considering the taking away of one licence gives additional value to the licence which remains, some additional charge should be put upon those licences which remain, and the money so derived might very well be used in the future to supplement the present sum. In a letter to the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth, addressed to him by a distinguished civil servant, the former Secretary of the Board of Trade, the writer has given evidence that though he knows a good deal about the trade of the country he is not very familiar with the licensing question. He says—

“Supposing I was President of a County Council Committee. Supposing the clergy of the district were to suggest to me that a particular house is injurious to morality, would it be for me to go hat in hand to the owner of the house and say ‘I want to buy you out? Sell me your property as cheaply as you can.’”

I venture to think the gentleman who wrote that letter wholly misapprehends the position of the Magistrates with regard to the question; because, if the public house is badly conducted the Magistrates have the power and the right to refuse to renew the licence. With regard to the question of compensation we have enormous figures put before us, but I believe them to be a bogey raised by the hon. Member the Mover of the Amendment. It is impossible, I quite agree, to treat these properties as freehold. They are a precarious property, and those who buy know that they are liable to be turned out if they do not carry their business on properly. They know, too, that there is a discretion in the hands of the Magistrates, though it has not been used capriciously. But is it the fact that the law recognises no property in these licences? It has been accepted as common ground on both sides of the House that, for the purposes of probate and taxation, interests in public houses have been treated as property. When I was practising at the Bar, some considerable time ago, I was concerned to a certain extent, in what are called compensation cases; and I can assure the House that I have known arbitrators and juries give compensation for public houses taken for the purpose of public improvements just as they would have given compensation in ordinary cases. Supposing, in the future, the London County Council had absolute discretion to take away a licence without compensation. In the first place, they are promoting a Bill for the improvement of the Strand. They take a block of premises, including two public houses, in regard to which they would have to give notice under the Lands Clauses Act, providing compensation. That compensation would be assessed as it is assessed now, and these publicans would recover a considerable amount of compensation for what they have lost. But in an adjoining street, which they do not want for the purpose of public improvement, they might, in the exercise of their discretionary powers, extinguish licences of other two publicans, absolutely without compensation, and turning them into the street without a penny. Some one may say, “You could extinguish the licence first, and take the property afterwards for your improvements.” Is that argument going to be raised? Are we to have the case of Naboth’s vineyard? “Hast thou killed and also taken possession?” Are you going to take away such licences which would not be taken away because you think it necessary in the interests of public morality? I will not insult hon. Members by thinking they will take such a course as that. I thank the House for having listened to what I have had to say. We are to have very large and imposing demonstrations; certain gentlemen have subscribed hundreds of pounds; no doubt we shall see reproduced from the lumber rooms the banners with which we were familiar in 1888; and I congratulate the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth upon the fact that the existence of these banners will, to a certain extent, diminish the expense that he and his friends have incurred in organising the demonstration. With regard to Petitions, of course I have presented any sent up by my constituents; but I must say that of two I presented the other day, I found one was from a Lodge of Good Templars, and the other from a Temperance Society in the same district, and when I looked at the signatures, I found that some of the members of the two Associations were identical, and that the two Petitions were, in effect, almost one. The House will remember the device resorted to in the minor theatres to produce the effect of the passage of a great army. A small number of supernumeraries pass over and over again from one side of the wings to the other, constantly crossing and re-crossing the stage, so as to produce the appearance of a great and imposing demonstration. I think the Petitions to which I allude are largely produced by means of a similar device. For my part, I believe the expense of these proposals to be enormously exaggerated. If I did not believe it I think I should be entitled to ask whether, because a thing is very valuable indeed, you ought to take it for nothing? I have heard from many an hon. Gentleman opposite, speaking from many a platform, statements as to the enormous saving to the community the closing of public houses will effect. We are told that our prisons will be emptied, and that the great and growing curse of lunacy will be diminished. And are we to be told that we are to postpone such reforms as these because we have to put our hands into our pockets? Let us have the courage of our opinions. If we are to effect these reforms let us be prepared to pay for them. I believe myself that if this Bill be carried it will be a great step in the right direction, although I cannot suppose it will be a final step. I believe public opinion, when it is rightly given, will be on the side of the Government. I say to them: "Be just, and fear not," and in that spirit I support the Second Reading of the Bill.

(4.34.) MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I am most anxious to urge upon the Government and the House the mischief they will do, if they deal with a small part of this great and difficult question, before they are prepared to deal with it thoroughly and comprehensively. I shall be able to show from past experience that when you have increased, as you will increase by the present proposals, the enormous value of the public houses, without taking precautions against that increased power and wealth of corruption being used to promote drunkenness, while you paralyse the law to prevent such abuses, you will seriously increase the very evils you are trying to diminish. On introducing the Bill, the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised that precautions should be taken to meet this danger. I fail to find in the Bill the effectual precaution promised that the enormously enhanced value which will be given to licences by the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer shall not be brought in as a charge for compensation when the great question of licences comes up for settlement. The provision in the Bill, though not intended to be, is practically an insult to the intellect of the House. As the man in Scripture said "Be ye clothed and fed," the Bill says: "Be the evil pointed out prevented," but takes absolutely no precaution, takes no security that any precaution will be or can be taken against the evil admitted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and, indeed, patent to any one having the most elementary acquaintance with economic laws. And yet I shall be able to show before I sit down that the enormously increased value which the present action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give to the existing licences, is emphasising and increasing the very difficulty which has made the due enforcement of the law against encouraging drunkenness practically a dead letter. That neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, nor even one having much less knowledge than he has of the laws which govern prices, supply, and demand, will deny that when you stop the creation of new licences, and buy up existing licences, you increase by millions on millions the value of existing licences, and thereby make it more difficult, if not impossible, to put any legal check upon the spread of drunkenness. I would appeal to the Home Secretary, and to everyone who has really tried to go to the bottom of the subject, to say whether they have not found that the mere diminution of the number of public houses, if accompanied, as I shall show it has been, with the development of those left into gigantic gin palaces, and with a diminution in the power of checking the offences of permitting drunkenness, or, to speak more correctly, of encouraging drunkenness has the effect of increasing and not diminishing that dreadful evil. Many years ago, in conversation on this subject, in 1877, with the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), I assumed that the increase or diminution of drunkenness went hand in hand with the increase or diminution of licensed houses, independent of any other considerations. He brought me up with the question, "Have you ascertained that that is really the state of the facts; and is it not desirable that the true state of the matter should be ascertained before we proceed to legislate on it?" I felt the justice and force of the rebuke, and moved for the Return of the necessary statistics, in August, 1873, and on receipt of that Return, in the following year, I employed an experienced accountant to calculate and tabulate for me the statistics, so as to show the proportion of convictions for drunkenness to population, and the proportion of public houses to population, and how far the two went hand in hand together. The result astonished me, and everyone to whom I showed it. It appeared as if the fewer public houses the more drunkenness, and the more public houses the less drunkenness. But the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) justly pointed out that it was not fair to deal with the north and south of England, or with urban and rural districts, or even with large and small boroughs, as on the same footing, inasmuch as the circumstances differed so entirely, both as to the temptations to drinking and as to the means of the population. I had the statistics re-cast into north and south, urban and rural. The figures were somewhat less striking, but still I would defy any clear headed man to deny that there is any apparent connection between the number of public houses and the convictions for drunkenness. On the contrary, they would seem to show that the arbitrary reduction of the number of public houses in a town, without any strengthening of the precautions against those that remain using their increased wealth and monopoly to encourage drunkenness, increases drunkenness. I will further show the House why this is, and how this increased power of monopoly defeats the very object for which the monopoly was conferred, and has made the law a positively dead letter, powerless to prevent or punish the tempter in his deadly work. In these tables you will find that among the boroughs north of Birmingham, with a population of 50,000 and upwards, Norwich stands best, only having one conviction for drunkenness for every 451 inhabitants, whereas Blackburn has fewer public houses in proportion to population of any other town, and yet it has apparently three times as much drunkenness as Norwich, and compares unfavourably with other towns in the same trade as itself. For instance, Stockport, also a cotton spinning town, showed only half the number of convictions in proportion to population, but has 50 per cent. more licensed houses in proportion to population of Blackburn. I showed the table to Mr. Bruce, the author, as Home Secretary, of licensing legislation of the 1868 Parliament. He pointed out at once that averages were very deceptive, and set to work to compare places in similar localities, and places in similar trades. He took Sheffield and Birmingham, both largely engaged in metal work and hardware of various descriptions. We certainly expected that Sheffield, with its dangerous, and, some of them, unhealthy trades, would have vastly surpassed Birmingham in its convictions for drunkenness. We found, on the contrary, that whereas Sheffield had about the same number of public houses in proportion to population, Sheffield had only one conviction for drunkenness for 200 of its population; Birmingham had one to every 126, or nearly double. Mr. Bruce then took Leeds and Sheffield, as being towns in the same county. Well, among the 19 large boroughs in the North of England, Leeds comes second in order of merit, having fewer licensed houses in proportion to population. It had only one licensed house to every 316 inhabitants, whereas Sheffield had 50 per cent. more licensed houses, namely, one to 179. On the other hand, while Sheffield had only one conviction to every 200 inhabitants, Leeds had one to every 164. I was so much struck with this contrast, that, without stating why I had required the information, I asked one of the largest and most intelligent of the manufacturers of Leeds, which had the most drunkenness, Leeds or Sheffield? He answered, without any hesitation, that he was sorry to say Leeds. Of course, there will be special circumstances which may affect individual cases, but if you go through the figures carefully, as I have done, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that the facts show no relation whatever between the amount of drunkenness in a town, and the number of public houses, when the numbers are reduced, as they have been in this country, without any efficient precaution against the abuse of the increased power and wealth given to the remainder. A single specimen case will show the House how this part of our legislation has hitherto worked. The House will then see that the mere arbitrary restriction of licences has in it no tendency to discredit drunkenness, but that, on the contrary, taken alone it makes difficulties in the execution of the law and has just the opposite effect. Stringent laws are useless if you make their execution practically impossible. I have been brought to these conclusions not merely by these statistics, but by a study of the subject of the working of the laws in America and England during the last 21 years, or over. Just one instance to show how the law works. Two years after the passage of Sir Selwin Ibbetson's Beer Act I received a letter from one of my constituents, a beer seller, living in one of the industrial quarters of Liverpool, complaining that the Magistrates did not execute the law justly between public houses and beer houses. He said, in effect—

"Sir Selwin Ibbetson's Act made my beer house licence worth £100, I committed an offence against the law, I was fined £5, the Magistrate endorsed it on my licence, and thereby reduced the value of it from £100 to £60. Having committed an offence, I have no right to find fault with the Magistrates' sentence, if the law is equally enforced between rich and poor. But the manager of a public house in the same street committed the same offence—but the Magistrate went out of his way to say in a most aggravated form—he was fined the same amount of penalty as I was, £5, but the Magistrate did not endorse his licence. The public house belonged to a rich brewer owning many public houses. I ask you, is this fair?"

In my reply, I declined to give an opinion on an ex-parte statement. On my return to Liverpool, I placed the letter in the hands of a Magistrate, who took great interest in licensing and was an ardent supporter of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cocker mouth Division of Cumberland. He said at once that he had not a doubt of the truth of the man's statement, but that the value of the public house licence was, at least, £1,000, probably several thousand pounds. The endorsement on the licence would have reduced its value proportionately, at least as much, probably more than with respect to the beerhouse licence. So that the minimum penalty which the endorsement would have inflicted on the owner of the public house would have been £400 for an offence which the law only punishes with a penalty of £5. But I urged the monopoly was created which gave this enormous property to this man, not simply to make him enormously rich, but for the sake of the order, sobriety, and welfare of the community, and surely he has no right to complain if some part of that enormous wealth should be forfeited if he violates the law and defeats the very object to secure which he was allowed to become thus enormously rich.—

"Very true," said the Magistrate, "they ought to have endorsed it, but you will never get any Bench of Magistrates to inflict a fine on a man many times greater, nay! in some cases many thousand times greater than that directly inflicted by the law itself."

I have shown you how the law works in an individual case. I will now show you the effect of the law in the mass. The convictions for drunkenness during the last three years, in Liverpool, were 13,601, 13,817, and 14,368, respectively, and the convictions for permitting drunkenness during those years were only six, seven, and six respectively, and, mark this, not one single offence of permitting drunkenness out of those 41,000 cases of permitted drunkenness, ay, and often encouraged drunkenness, was endorsed on either public house or beer house licence. Will anyone in his senses say or believe that there were no such cases which ought to have been discovered and punished, and the more you look into it the more you will perceive that with the very wealth you have given the holder of licences, and which you are now proposing to pile on with the addition of millions, you have given him practical impunity in permitting and encouraging drunkenness. No one can wonder that this system demoralises alike the Licensed Victualler and his victim, or that, as I have been informed, the average time which the London Licensed Victualler, who manages his own house, remains in the business is not much over five years. In other words, the business is so profitable, or so demoralising, or both, that it only takes five years for those in the trade to make their fortunes, or to be too often ruined in both character and fortune. As it is very important that we should have accurate information, and as it is popularly believed that what is called the Liverpool experiment in open licensing caused Liverpool to have a more than ordinary number of licensed houses, and that it was owing to that that Liverpool had so many convictions for drunkenness, I beg to state that exactly the reverse of this is the case. Out of the 19 large towns, including Birmingham, there are only six which, by the Return I am quoting from, had so few public houses in proportion to population as Liverpool, while 12 of these large towns, which is double that number, were shown to have more public houses in proportion to population than Liverpool. As to drunkenness, there was some increase of drunkenness during the three years the experiment was continued, but during the last year of the experiment the convictions for drunkenness in proportion to population were rather less than during the year which preceded its initiation. I am sorry to say that the increase of drunkenness after the close system was renewed was most serious; but no doubt that was in part, at least, and indeed largely, owing to the prosperity and high wages of that period. I shall now, however, proceed to show another instance that, where the Magistrates did not allow the value of the licences to interfere with the strict administration of the law, they were able largely to prevent the demoralising influence of that period of prosperity. I will refer those who wish to study this question to the evidence before the Lords' Committee on Intemperance, of my brother who was for many years Chairman of the Visiting Justices in Liverpool, who took an active part in upsetting what was called the open licensing experiment in Liverpool, but who, as he gained more experience, became convinced that we must look to diminishing the number of licences rather to strict provisions against permitting drunkenness, and their strict enforcement, than to their arbitrary reduction without such precautions. In a district adjoining Liverpool, called Garston, with a similar population to Liverpool dock labourers, quarrymen, whose work is rough and uncertain, and a population therefore difficult to deal with, there the Magistrates have taken a course which I think the result has proved to be the right one, which has restricted the number of public houses by making it impossible for the publicans to carry on a drunken trade. I refer anyone who is interested in this question to the evidence of Mr. Robert Neilson, for many years the Chairman of the Licensing Committee of the Prestwich Division of Lancashire, given before the same Lords' Committee on Intemperance. They will find most conclusive evidence of the necessity and efficiency of the precautions for which I contend. The Committee in question were not likely to be reckless invaders of the licensing property. Their Chairman was a Conservative, one of their most active members was the Deputy Chairman of the Lancashire Quarter Sessions, a Conservative, and a shrewd and able lawyer. They continued for many years the system of restricting the number of licences simply by shutting out public houses which were promoting drunkenness and disorder. When a man came for a licence, if his character was unimpeachable, his house a proper one, and properly situated, they gave him a licence, but on the understanding that without any definite number of convictions they would refuse to renew his licence if he permitted drunkenness or allowed disorderly characters to assemble at his house; and they acted courageously, as I contend every Magistrate ought to act, upon this principle. For, surely, if a man acts so as to defeat the very object for which this great property is given him, the very least you can do is to withhold continuance of the abused privilege. Well, the result was most satisfactory. At the very time when we were deploring the increase of drunkenness and disorder in Liverpool with its close system, the Chief Constable of the Prestwich Division, including Garston, with the same rough population of dock labourers that we have in Liverpool, and of quarrymen, and unskilled and casually employed labour, and this, remember, in prosperous times affecting both districts alike, reported from year to year a marked improvement in the management and conduct of the public houses in the district and a marked diminution in drunkenness and disorder. A confirmation of the evidence which you will find in the Report of the Lords' Committee on Intemperance was given me most unwittingly, but most straightforwardly, by a most unbiassed witness, and one who did not see the force of the evidence he was giving. My hon. Friend the Member for Barrow told me that he must send the Secretary of the United Kingdom Alliance to examine into the statements made by the Chief Constable. I was very glad that he should do so, as we all want only the truth, and he kindly directed the agent to see me on his return and report the result of his inquiries. The first words the agent spoke were, "You are quite wrong, Mr. Rathbone; there has been no increase at all in the number of public houses in Garston or its neighbourhood." I never said there had; but I asked, "Has there been no such change as has taken place in Liverpool? Has not the small public house blossomed out into the flaring gin palace, with its numerous entrances, its plate glass windows, and various attractions? Well, then," I said, "as to the improvement of drunkenness and disorder." He admitted there had been a great improvement in the order of the district and a great diminution in the cases taken up for drunkenness; indeed, so great had been the change that a solicitor who used to attend the Petty Sessions of the district had ceased to attend from lack of cases. But he attributed it to the establishment of a police station in Garston, for he said that the ministers of religion stated that the improvement in disorderly habits had not been accompanied by any improvement in the drinking habits of the population. Well, as we had as powerful a police station as that at Garston, I cannot help thinking that the practised eyes of the police and the judgment of an experienced superintendent are more likely to have been right than the ministers of religion, whose feelings must be constantly excited and outraged by the large amount of drunkenness still remaining. And I told my Friend that he had completely proved my case by finding that the Prestwich Magistrates had been able to control the increase of licensed houses and greatly improve their management by simply strictly enforcing the law against permitting drunkenness. But the experience of this subject is not confined to this country. In other countries they have found that the worst system of all is one that gives the evils of monopoly without those precautions which monopoly is intended to secure. I found that in Sweden they had been persisting for over a century in trying to reform drunkenness by the simple reduction of the number of public houses without taking the precautions that I contend for. From 1,200 drink-shops in 1793, they reduced them to 700 in 1847 and to 500 in 1850; and in 1876, when I inquired, there were only 280 houses licensed to sell for consumption on the premises, and 30 for retail consumption off the premises. But to my question, "Have these measures attained, or brought you nearer attainment of, the desired object?" the reply was, "No, on the contrary; the number of cases punished has increased from 1 in 88 of the inhabitants in 1851 to 1 in 46 in 1874." And they were then proposing the adoption of the Gottenberg system by which the monopoly in the sale of drink would be practically in the hands of the public and for their benefit. And now, Sir, having pointed out the want of success of a mere arbitrary diminution of public houses without precautions, may I point out what can be done, according to our own experience, if the Magistrates are empowered and willing to enforce penalties on permitting drunkenness. During the time Mr.

Bruce's Bill was at work, and before its provisions were weakened by Mr. Cross's Licensing Act, a very respectable man consulted me on behalf of a friend of his, evidently a respectable licensed victualer, with a public house in a most respectable neighbourhood. His friend told me that he was tired of the trade and wanted to get out of it, for he could no longer carry it on with the same advantage as before; that since the new Inspectors had been put on, the police had increased their vigilance, the Magistrates had become stricter, and the publicans were no longer allowed to sell drink to men who had had too much, without fear of an endorsement on their licences; and that this alone had reduced his takings by £700 a year. Consider what an amount of evil and demoralisation preventable under the present law, if strictly administered, that £700 a year represents. Consider the benefit of such strictness applied to those parts of the town where drunkenness prevails and a drunken trade is more unscrupulously carried on. The admirable Stipendiary Magistrate, Mr. Raffles, and the experienced Chief of the Police, Major Greig, of Liverpool, both stated in evidence that the system of Mr. Bruce's Bill of minimum penalties and endorsing licences was most salutary and ought not to be altered, nor ought the introduction of hours from 7 p.m. to 11 p.m., nor had there been any invasion of the right of property; on the contrary, in 1869 127 public house licences were forfeited; in 1873 only 13 were forfeited. The reduction in the forfeitures in beerhouse licences were still more striking. It showed that the direction which I contend ought to be proceeded in was that in which Mr. Bruce's Act had proceeded, for the improvement caused by that Act arose from the increased care and attention to avoid infractions of the law from the more preventive effect of a severer law which was, therefore, required to be less often put in practice. And yet I regret to say that with this evidence before us those precautionary regulations were weakened by Mr. Cross's Act, with the results which we all deplore. I am afraid I have detained the House much longer than I could have wished in trying to connect cause and effect as far as they can be deduced from practical experience. I will only ask permission to state in a very few minutes what I consider should be the course of the Government in the House. Pass, if you like, a suspensionary clause limited to two years till you can collect the necessary information, and then carefully consider how we can best deal with the whole question. Do not go on, as we too often do, with this haphazard, piecemeal legislation before we have collected and digested the matter necessary to enable us to legislate wisely and well. Let the Government in the meantime carefully collect, with the aid of the most acute minds whose services they can command, all the experience that can be procured on the subject. Take, for instance, the United States. They have tried almost every experiment in licensing, in local control, and in prohibition. Why should you not send to the United States a man with the acuteness of mind and freedom from prejudice of my friend Mr. R. S. Wright—I give him merely as the kind of man whom you ought to send—and let him collect from men of all sides and parties the results on their minds of American experience. You will not find, probably, any perfectly successful experiment; but you would be able to obtain for yourselves and lay before the country many useful hints of what could be done practically, and still more useful experience which would clear out of our way experiments which may have proved impracticable, or may require careful adaptation to varying circumstances. This course will, without inflicting discredit on anyone, avoid the frightful danger of making alike the reform and the administration of the law more difficult than it is already. And in the meantime the Magistrates, who will have had warning that their lax administration of the law will be no longer tolerated, will shut up 10 disreputable public houses for one which the means you are placing at the disposal of the County Councils and Local Authorities by your present proposals would enable you to close.

(5.20.) MR. ELLIOTT LEES (Oldham): The hon. Member who has just spoken has given us some interesting statistics respecting public houses in Liverpool, but I do not think his argument was very germane to the question which is now dividing Parties; and I imagine he stands almost alone in his belief, certainly almost alone in this House, that by increasing the number of public houses you will reduce the amount of drink consumed.

MR. RATHBONE: I must really correct that statement. I never said anything of the sort. I said that in itself the increase of public houses was not so great an evil; the evil was in permitting them to carry on a disorderly trade with impunity.

MR. ELLIOTT LEES: I am sorry I misunderstood the hon. Gentleman. I thought he was advocating what is popularly called Free Trade in drink. I will leave the question affecting Liverpool to be dealt with later on. I must protest against some of the tactics pursued by some hon. Members belonging to the extreme Temperance Party. I, in common I dare say with many Members, have received many letters protesting against the attempt of the Government to rush this scheme through the House of Commons, and it was a letter by the hon. Baronet (Sir W. Lawson) that created the impression that such an attempt was being made, that a Bill printed on Friday was to be read a second time on Monday. Now this was hardly fair on the part of the hon. Baronet and his Friends. When our constituents are told that a Bill is set down for a certain day, they, not being conversant with our methods of business, not unnaturally imagine that the Bill is to be taken on the day named, but the hon. Baronet must have known that such a Bill, being placed low down on the list of measures, had no possible chance of coming on. Ample time was given, as we have all found, in ten days for the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) and his friends to set their disciplined and obedient organisations to work, and, as the result we have leaflets, resolutions, letters, and telegrams, all protesting against the Government proposal. But there is no very clear idea among the many as to what that proposal really is. There are many who think that it is a revival of the proposal originally embodied in the Local Government Bill, and I have seen letters from constituents demanding that no ratepayers' money shall be devoted to compensation of publicans. Of course, it is a completely different proposal in the present Bill. I am very sorry that hon. Members should have adopted the line they have followed on this occasion, because I do not think a better opportunity could be offered to friends of temperance, among whom I reckon myself, to carry out a temperance reform. Look at the state of Parties in the House. Hon. Members on the other side, almost to a man, received the support of the Temperance Party on their elections. I do not think the Temperance Party have been quite wise in their generation, in declining to take the offer of the highest bidder, and letting it be understood that no matter how friendly a Conservative might be known to be to the cause of Temperance yet he would not have the support of the Temperance Party. Yet so it is; the Teetotal Party gave their support to hon. Gentlemen opposite, but there is scarcely an instance of that support having been given to a Member on this side. If we had a Radical Government introducing a Bill like this, a Bill which goes further in the direction of temperance reform than was hoped for by friends of temperance a few years ago. A Bill which, recognising a certain amount of local control over the granting of licences, provides, and not by general taxation, for the gradual extinction of unnecessary licences was almost beyond the hope of practical politicians a few years ago; if such a scheme were introduced by a Radical Government it is only human nature to suppose that a great many Members on this side, who hold no very strong views on this question, would have offered it strenuous opposition. It is a difficult thing to carry a measure of this sort, but it would have been especially difficult for a Radical Government of the day, because of the strong opposition they would meet with here. But as it is, there are many who, occupying a neutral position in regard to temperance questions, give their ready support to the proposal introduced by the Government in which they trust. If we only had the support of temperance advocates on the other side then we might carry the Bill through the House without difficulty and with rapidity; in another place it would meet with little opposition, and a great deal would be done for the cause of temperance. The hon. Member for Barrow said if the Church of England Temperance Society would introduce a Bill upon the lines of their scheme for settling the reduction of licences, the friends of temperance would not oppose it. The suggestion of the society is that the licence holders' interest should be the only interest recognised, and that only for a period of ten years. Their argument is that the licence holder is the only person whom the law should recognise; that he has no legal but only an equitable claim to compensation, and that if there are other claims behind him they must be settled by agreement between themselves. Now, Sir, that is a compensation on a limited basis, as put forward by the Church of England Temperance Society, and I should like to know what difference there is between that proposal and the proposition of Her Majesty's Government. Both involve the principle of compensation, which can be affirmed by the Second Reading of this Bill. The detail is a question for Committee and not for the Second Reading. If, therefore, those were the opinions of the hon. Gentlemen opposite they might very well support the principle of compensation or "marketable value" on the Second Reading, and endeavour to alter the details in Committee. The hon. Member for Barrow and others have made a very remarkable admission. They protest against compensation at all, and yet denounce the smallness of the provision made by the Government under the Bill. Surely these arguments defeat each other. I should like to make a suggestion to the hon. Member and his friends. They remind me of a story of the plough boy, who, when seen crying over his bowl of porridge, was asked what was wrong, and replied, "It's thick and nasty, and full of lumps, and there aint half enough of it." Hon. Members have taken up a similar position with regard to the proposed donation of £350,000 by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They say the Government scheme is thick and nasty, and full of lumps, but their greatest grievance is that there is not enough money offered. If they wish to show their practical sympathy with the cause of temperance, and are willing to do so in the way in which an Englishman believes it may most genuinely be shown, there is a way in which, I think, they may do it. Hitherto there has been little use in buying up licences, because there has been no security that new ones will not be issued. Now, no new licences are to be issued, and it will be possible to reduce the number by buying up existing licences. Here is a chance for private benevolence. Let hon. Gentlemen, who do not mind some sacrifice in the cause of temperance, show their sincerity in trying to reduce the evil by paying for it. Let them start a fund to augment the Government Fund for the purpose of buying up licences. Such a fund might be well supported all over the country, and if one is started I will promise to contribute as much as my means will allow. Some hon. Members say they cannot endure the principle at all. They object to any tampering with the accursed thing, and will not pay a penny to reduce the evil. That is a theory to which I can never consent. I believe it to be a theory of national dishonesty, and I would rather see a nation of drunkards than a dishonest nation. Everyone must admit that the publican has an equitable right in his licence, because it is marketable, and it is admitted to be legal to value it for probate. To speak in the language of logic, I believe the publican has no deductive right to assume his licence will be renewed, but, undoubtedly, he has an inductive right. The renewal is not a mathematical certainty, but it is a moral certainty, provided his house is a moral house. I believe the whole sense of the country would revolt against any general measure of confiscation. Here you have men carrying on a respectable business, sanctioned by the State, and if those men are to be turned out at a moment's notice they will be quite unable to get their living, and yet will have to support their wives and families. What worse fate could overtake the drunkard himself. No opinion on the will reduce the number of houses, and because I believe that the reduction will conduce to the sobriety of the country, that I am going to support the Second Reading. It is true that it will, to some extent, increase the monopoly which will be possessed by such licence holders as remain; but they will be the most respectable class of publicans, and it is as unfair to compare them with the disreputable publicans as it is to compare bankers with usurers. I shall vote for the Second Reading upon these grounds, and because I believe the Bill will conduce to the increase of temperance, and that it will prove a great measure for the advancement of the sobriety of the nation.

*(5.45.) Mr. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.):

I think that the Government may be congratulated on the fact that the debate has been conducted with an absence of Party feeling, and that there has been no imputation of motive on either side.
I hope no remarks of mine will disturb that amicable temper. I give the Government full credit for having introduced a Bill in what they conceive to be the interests of temperance. I cannot see why, otherwise, they should take up such a thorny question, and be prepared to spend so much time upon it, at a critical part of the Session. They ought to have taken warning from what occurred two years ago, and to have realised that the opposition of hon. Members to the principle embodied in this Bill has been since strengthened rather than weakened. Now, I want to discuss the question coolly. I do not assume that the publicans are necessarily sinners, and that they ought to be the victims of confiscation. By all means let us deal fairly with them. But do not let us forget that there are two sides to the question, and that it is possible to rob the public instead of the publicans, by placing upon them a burden of compensation where none is due. Those who advocate compensation ought, therefore, to make out a case for it, but though to the speeches from the Government Benches, I failed to hear a single argument which formed sufficient foundation for the claim a compensation. The Solicitor General, last night, attempted to show that in the case of "Sharp v. Wakefield" the Court had not decided what it thought it had, and that the decision was really one in favour of the holders of licences. To-day we have had four elaborate speeches from supporters of the Bill, and yet I have not heard anything, except one remark from the hon. Member for East Grinstead, tending to show that the claim for compensation is well founded. Now, is there any legal right to compensation? I say legal right, because I shall presently admit that there may be grounds for a plea for compassionate treatment, for some sort of indulgence which would enable licences to be more quickly reduced and with less friction than if they were simply withdrawn. I ask, then, if there is any right capable of being enforced in a Court of Law? It surely cannot be argued that a licence is property, considering that the tenant of a public house holds the licence only for one year. To assert this would be to say that a tenant from year to year is to be treated like a freeholder. It is suggested that property is proved by the fact that the licence is valued for probate. I should like to learn from the Government what is the largest number of years for which allowance has been made in calculating probate in such cases. Is it three, four, five, or six years? Surely the Government would scarcely venture to claim compensation for publicans on any greater scale than that allowed for the purpose of probate valuation. The hon. Member for East Grinstead has argued that compensation ought to be granted because when houses are taken in the making of a public improvement some special value is allowed for a licensed house. But we all know the laxness of arbitrators and of juries in awarding compensation in such cases. Moreover, in such a case compensation is awarded on the basis of the profit made during the last few years. But it may happen that, immediately after the valuation, the property becomes greatly depreciated in value, perhaps by the opening up of new thoroughfares or the removal of large works. These are unpredictable events, which may involve loss to the licence holder. So is the withdrawal of the licence. Compensation is no more due for the one event than for the other. The publican takes his licence with the possibility that it may be withdrawn, and I submit he is, therefore, not entitled to compensation on the withdrawal. If the claim cannot be rested on property, can it be rested on the ground of interruption of trade? The liquor trade is like no other trade, because no man can practise it without obtaining the special favour and indulgence of the State; and the value which the trade possesses is entirely due to this indulgence, because the trade is prima facie unpermitted. Then, can the publican whose licence is taken away, be said to be in the position of the man whose goodwill is taken away? If we take away the goodwill of any particular business, in ordinary circumstances, we make compensation for it. The case of a publican would fall under the general rules. But what is the fact? Supposing the Magistrates grant me a licence for a house worth £1,500. The value of my premises immediately jumps up from £1,500 to £3,000. Who has given me the benefit? The State, without any act of my own. It is so much unearned increment, yet we are told that the State ought to compensate the person on whom it has conferred the increment, when it takes that increment away. That is asking the State to pay a man for taking back what it has just given. What reason is there why the State, having doubled the value of the premises, should be prevented from reducing those premises to the position in which they were before they received the licence? It is said that the holders of licences have formed a reasonable expectation that they will receive compensation, and upon that expectation they have based their claim to compensation. My answer to that is, that they have had ample notice that this compensation would be disputed. Ever since the year 1871 it has been well known that it would be a controverted question. Let me put the case from another point of view. My hon.

Friend (Mr. Rathbone) who spoke just now referred to the free licensing system which was at one time practised in Liverpool. It is clear that the value of public house property would be enormously diminished by the free grant of licences. If there are 1,000 licensed houses in a town and the Magistrates treble the number, it is quite clear that the value of the existing houses is immediately and heavily depreciated. Has anybody ever suggested that the owners of licences in that instance should be compensated? In fact, it has been suggested that if we want to deal with this question with a perfectly clear conscience all we have to do is to increase the number of licences until the value of existing licences is reduced to a point at which the payment of compensation would become a comparatively easy matter. I only mention that for the purpose of showing how untenable is the contention that there is a legal vested interest in these public house properties. In America they have tried every possible experiment with the liquor traffic. There are in that Republic 38 commonwealths, each with full authority to try any experiment as regards the regulation of the liquor trade within its own limits which it pleases. There is no country where the extreme Temperance Party is so strong and has so often gained control of the Legislatures. Every State of the Union, besides, carefully protects the right of the citizen to compensation when his property is taken for public purposes. What in England rests on usage, embodied in Statutes, in the United States has all the irresistible and unvarying authority of a written Constitution. You would naturally suppose that questions of compensation must have arisen either in regard to prohibition or diminution of the number of licences, or the traffic in liquor between one State and another, but I think I am right in saying, having taken all the pains I can to ascertain, that there is no case in which compensation was ever awarded, either to the liquor seller or to the brewer or distiller, in respect of stopping or regulating his trade. When we consider how numerous must have been the cases, and how complete is the protection which the Constitutional system of that country gives, I think it is a very strong argument in favour of the doctrine that there is no legal right in these matters. Whether we look at the matter as a question of purchase of goodwill or as a question of property, I fail to find any legal ground for giving pecuniary compensation. I do not deny that there may be other reasons, and of a different character, which may make it desirable to award something to holders of licensed premises whose licences are taken away. I put that on two grounds, which may have some weight separately, and which, conjoined, certainly possess weight. One ground is that it will very much facilitate the withdrawal of licences if some sort of compassionate provision can be allowed to be made. There would be less feeling that a harsh and severe thing was being done, and I cannot doubt that the wheels of restriction or prohibition would, to some extent, be greased, if some such arrangement were made. But I do not propose to discuss this question now, because this Bill proposes compensation as a legal right. It is that, or it is nothing. We are told it is a small measure, but there is nothing so dangerous as to begin with these small measures, because you recognise a principle which may be made applicable to the whole value of this public house property, which, according to the calculations of the Licensed Victuallers, amounts to some £200,000,000 or even more. Therefore, this Bill is not an innocent Bill; it embodies a principle on which the sum of £1,000,000 a year or more would eventually have to be raised by taxation for the purchase of these licences, if they are to be largely withdrawn. The Government have been rather astute in interweaving with this proposal for compensation other proposals which the House generally approves. We are entirely in sympathy with those portions of the Bill which relate to superannuation of the police and the extinguishing of school fees in Scotland. There is a strong and general wish in Scotland to complete the operation begun last year of putting an end to school fees. Yet of the many communications made to Scotch Members on this subject there has not, I believe, been a single one inviting us to take the Bill for the sake of getting free education. On the contrary, the Scottish people would rather put up with the non-completion of the educational work than consent to the buying out of licences. The portions of the Bill which we support might be dealt with separately, leaving the compensation for licences to a later stage. The hon. Member who spoke last said the temperance movement was growing. Certainly the temperance vote and the strength of temperance sentiment in this House has enormously increased, even within the last 10 years. The tide of public opinion is, no doubt, rising steadily in favour of temperance, although it has not yet reached the top of the flood. I think that we on this side of the House, and hon. Members on the other side, who are as sincere advocates of temperance as we, would be wrong in accepting a proposal like this merely because it is the best that has yet been made, before we have made sure we cannot get a better. This proposal is less audacious, though not more workable, than that of 1888. The next proposal may be better still, and we should be throwing away the advantages we have gained by our action in 1888 if we accept a proposal which we conceive to be contrary to the opinion of the country, and calculated to do little or nothing for the cause of temperance.

\(6.17.) THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes):* The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has certainly carried out his promise that he would do nothing in any way to alter the tone which has characterised this Debate; and I think the House will agree with me that the speech which we have listened to was one that has given pleasure and profit to the House, and I am most thankful to realise that the hon. Gentleman has talked about the Government Bill being a good Bill and the best Bill yet introduced to the House. If we cannot have the support of the hon. Gentleman, it is something to have his praise. The hon. Gentleman has asked for some information on the Probate

Duty question; that will be given by another Member of the Government at a further stage of the Debate. With regard to the question of compensation, I submit to the House that the speech of the hon. Gentleman would have been a most valuable one, and would have required an answer in detail, had the question which we are now discussing been a proposal on the part of Her Majesty's Government to give an absolute compensation to the publicans for the removal of their licences. The hon. Gentleman, in the course of his remarks, has denied the existence of any legal right to this compensation being paid. Now, what this Bill proposes to confer upon the County Council is the right to purchase in the market what the Government contend is a marketable commodity, which is sold in the market frequently, daily, at the present time; to enter into the market as a purchaser of that commodity, and to buy that commodity with the money with which the Government provides them. We believe that that power will largely assist the cause which we have been told times without number hon. Members opposite have at heart, namely, that of temperance. Therefore, it is not desirable now to enter upon the hotly-contested question of the legal right of owners of licences to compensation. I desire, however, in passing, to supplement what has fallen from my right hon. Friend with regard to what we propose to do with the police. Anyone who is conversant with the conduct of their duties by the police in every part of the country will agree with me that their work has been admirably done, in circumstances often of peculiar difficulty; that their claims have been too long neglected, and that it is high time that this House should recognise their right to receive proper and adequate pensions. I now come to the second part of the Bill, in which the Government propose to transfer money in aid of the local rates to the County Councils. I am glad that hon. Gentlemen, particularly on my own side of the House, have admitted that in giving this money in aid of the County Councils the Government have redeemed the promises which it has often been said we made some time ago. Turning to the licensing question, upon which we shall shortly be asked to vote, I desire to say a word or two with regard to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine). I regret that the hon. Member is not in his place; but the hon. Gentleman has challenged a statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board in a very decided way. I desire now to refer to that challenge. The hon. Member for Barrow has said that the right hon. Gentleman contended that his plan had secured the support of the Church of England Temperance Society, but that he, the hon. Gentleman, would point out that it had only secured, if at all, the assent of one of the Committees of that Organisation, and that he had no hesitation in saying that its main body would probably repudiate any such promise. Only a short time ago my right hon. Friend had received the following telegram:—

“Manchester Diocesan Executive of the Church of England Temperance Society request you to contradict Mr. Caine’s statement that the deputation to you was that of the London Committee only; the deputation was arranged for by the Central Committee, which is composed of representatives of every diocese in the country, and this executive cordially supports the action of the deputation.—CANON KELLY, Chairman.”

I think that that is a full and sufficient answer to the challenge of the hon. Member for Barrow. Amongst the many speeches which we have heard on both sides of the House I think that that of the hon. Member for the Ayr Burghs seemed to put the case for the

Bill in the clearest possible terms. The hon. Member has referred to the fact that this Bill had received the support of all connected with the liquor trade, and his statement that manufacturers and sellers of liquor had adopted a resolution in support of the Bill had been received with some derisive cheers from hon. Members opposite. I do not know why that should have been so, because I do not think that anyone could believe that all those connected with either the manufacture or sale of liquor, or even its consumption, are men whose opinions are unworthy of consideration. No doubt they have a great interest in the matter, but then the State has not forgotten to lay a sufficiently heavy impost upon them, and they bear a large share of the national expenditure. Now, by this proposal they are called upon to pay an additional expenditure, a certain portion of which is to be spent in buying their own licences. Surely that is a moderate proposal, and those who are so closely concerned have the right to be heard. Anyone who came into the House and listened to the speeches which have been made on this Bill, would have arrived at the conclusion that the Government were proposing some great compulsory system under which all the licences in the country were to be bought up, and which would make it impossible in the future for Parliament to make any change. The Government proposal is nothing of the kind, but is a small and humble one; and I would earnestly ask those who in this House are led by the hon. Baronet the Member for Coker-mouth whether there is not time yet for them to re-consider the position they have taken up with reference to the Government proposal. Do they honestly believe that the passing into law of this Bill will really prevent the hon. Member for Coker-mouth, or the right hon. Baronet the Member for Bridgeton, from dealing with the question in time to come? [“Yes.”] Then their case cannot be anything like so good as they have led hon. Members on this side of the House to believe, and if all their plans are to be nipped in the bud by the passing of this Bill, all I can say is that they cannot be the men that either they have led the country to believe they are, or that we on this side have given them credit for being. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton has been almost pathetic in speaking of this question, and has implored the House not to deal with it now, but to let him and his friends deal with it. If the Temperance Party will listen to a word from me, most respectfully uttered, I would say that they had better not wait for the time which the right hon. Gentleman has described, because if that time does arrive, then the right hon. Gentleman would possibly find other questions, in the completion of which he is supposed to have some interest, which would occupy his time to the exclusion of this question for a great many years to come. What I would respectfully implore the House and the Temperance Party to consider is, whether this is a step in the right direction, whether it is a step backwards or forwards? Is it a step which may be taken by men of different opinions, and which they can unite in taking on the common ground of holding temperance views generally; or is it a step which ought to be arrested at the outset? I think it can be shown that it is a step in the right direction, though it may not have the effect of exterminating the public house interest, or I should be the last to support it. The hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson) has never concealed his hostility to the publicans, and the publicans never expected any consideration from him except the consideration which the hangman bestows upon the criminal. But that has not been the view of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. I could quote from their speeches on this question at a length which would keep up the Debate for many a day to come. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen will not deny that the majority of them have not voted for the Motions of the hon. Member for Cockermouth without expressing, in the most distinct language, that the question of the disturbance of these men ought to be considered. The right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) is, no doubt, in a different position from his colleagues, because he was once a publican and a sinner, but he has now found salvation in the ranks of the hon.

Mr. Long

Baronet. I could quote abundance of passages from the right hon. Gentleman's speeches showing that he supported the right of the publicans to compensation. A speech of the late Mr. Bright has been published in the form of a pamphlet, and the views expressed by him on the general question, as well as the coincidence of his views with those of Her Majesty's Government are very remarkable. When Mr. Bright shadowed forth his plan as to how the question should be dealt with by legislation, and brought under the control of popularly-elected bodies, he proposed to devote some of the extra revenue to the relief of the police rate, and he did this because he said the trade and the police were cause and effect. The same proposal is to be found in the Bill of Her Majesty's Government. Mr. Bright was a man to whom we on this side of the House were accustomed to find ourselves in opposition. There was no body of men whom Mr. Bright opposed more than the so-called county Member class, to which I myself belong; but however much we may have disliked his policy, we never for a moment denied that he was a man of the highest honour and the greatest possible ability, and that his views were deserving of the attention of his opponents as well as his supporters. The views of Mr. Bright on this question are well worth the attention of the House and of those who wish to deal with the matter in an equitable and reasonable manner. Hon. Gentlemen who support the Amendment declare that it would be better to postpone dealing with the Licensing Laws, even in the limited manner now proposed, than to take a step which might induce the publicans to think that they had a chance of getting something for their licences; and they give as a reason for that opinion the crime and misery which are caused by the existence of public houses. Now, I would ask the House to consider whether it is fair to attribute solely to this trade all the crime and misery of the country, of which there is, and has been, a great deal; but which we are all thankful to know is decreasing. Is there nothing to be said of the insanitary condition in which these poor people live, and of the crowded dwellings and the miserable surroundings of the places called their homes from which they are driven to the public house? Is it fair to saddle on the trade all the misery which results from various causes? What hon. Gentlemen suggest is that they ought to cast upon the publicans the whole burden of responsibility and saddle them with all the punishment; that on no account has the public house interest any recognised value, but that it is to be exterminated root and branch. That is not the view which we on this side of the House can take, and it is not the view which used to be held by hon. Gentlemen opposite. The hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce) has said that the publicans have no right to ask for compensation, because the question has been debated so long that the publicans have had their fate plainly displayed before them. I deny that that is the case. I doubt whether the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth ever expected to find some of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite acting with him on this question. The hon. Baronet will remember the time when some Gentlemen on the front Opposition Bench devoted a good deal of vituperation to his proposals, though they have suddenly discovered that they are his most ardent supporters. Though the publicans may have learned from those Debates and attempts at legislation that they would probably be placed under the control of the Local Authorities, and that their licences might be withheld, it is not likely that they also learned that they would be prevented from obtaining compensation for any loss they might suffer. They were thoroughly justified in that view, not by the opinions expressed on this side of the House, but by the opinions expressed by the leaders of a great political Party, who knew perfectly well that the persons interested in the trade would attach the greatest importance to what they said. I contend, therefore, that it is unreasonable to say that the public house interest ought to be prepared for their fate, and ought to submit to it with resignation. Sir, I end as I commenced, by saying that this proposal of the Government is not a large one. We do not suggest that we are dealing with the whole licensing question; but what we say is, this is a distinct advance in the path of temperance, while it does no injustice or wrong to a great trade.

There are hon. Gentlemen opposite who think it a disgrace to a Member of Parliament to say one word in favour of the Liquor Trade as a body. I am not afraid of saying a word on their behalf. I have had long experience of Members of the trade, and I have found them anxious to do their duty, to lead respectable lives, and to keep respectable houses. It is unfair that these men should be ticketed as if they were the reverse of respectable, and that the House of Commons should be asked to legislate against them as if there was nothing to be said in their favour and there was to be no defence of their rights. We object to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Barrow, because it would destroy our Bill. If it be the case that the law is as the hon. Member tells the House we are not changing the law. We are giving to the County Councils certain powers which they can exercise if they like, and which they need not exercise unless they like. At the same time, we contend that the proposal is a distinct advance in the direction in which all people now desire to go; and we recommend it to the House with absolute confidence, because we believe, if passed into law, it will prove beneficial, helpful, and useful to all classes in the community.

Debate further adjourned till Thursday.

SUCK RIVER DRAINAGE (PROVISION OF FUNDS) BILL. (No. 236.)

Read the third time, and passed.

PAUPER LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) (OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION)

BILL. (No. 130.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

(6.47.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I really think that the hon. Member (Mr. Johnston) in charge of this Bill, should give us some explanation of its provisions before it proceeds in Committee. If he is not prepared to show very good reasons in support of it, it will become my painful duty to move to report Progress. I hope the hon. Member, whose sterling worth we all recognise, although he differs from us, will give us some explanation of the measure.

*(6.49.) MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): The object of the Bill is to place the attendants and officers of lunatic asylums in Ireland on a similar footing to what they are on in England, and to give a permissive power to Governors of asylums to vote superannuation allowances subject to the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant. It was introduced in a former Session, and went up to the House of Lords, but became a dropped Order there, in consequence, I am sorry to say, of my not communicating in time with a Peer, to take charge of it.

It being ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday, at Two of the clock.

PHARMACY ACT (IRELAND) (1885)
AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 241.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I object.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Does the Attorney General for Ireland object to the principle of this Bill? At present the occupation of 3,000 chemists and druggists is illegal, and this Bill aims at remedying the flaw in the law to which that condition of things is due.

*MR. MADDEN: I am not prepared to say that I object to the principle of the Bill; but I do object to a Bill of this kind, on which there is a difference of opinion amongst those who are best qualified to form an opinion on it, being taken at a time when it cannot be discussed, and before there has been time fully to consider its provisions.

DR. TANNER: I would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman if he would take steps to ascertain what the difference of opinion on this Bill really is amongst those best qualified to judge, so that when it comes on again he may give us his most valuable assistance. So far as I have been able to ascertain from the Medical Profession in Ireland there is no objection to the Bill.

*MR. MADDEN: I have a number of objections under my consideration at this moment. I, however, recognise that the subject is one which should be dealt with by legislation.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. and learned Gentleman recognises the necessity for the Bill; therefore, as a consequence, he admits the principle of the Bill.

*MR. MADDEN: I recognise the necessity for some Bill.

MR. SEXTON: Will he afford facilities for the Bill to be discussed, seeing that 3,000 traders are at the present moment outlawed.

*MR. MADDEN: I conceive it to be my duty not to allow the Bill to be taken at present. I cannot hold out any hope that exceptional facilities will be afforded for the consideration of the Bill.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

EVENING SITTING.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at five minutes after Nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 14th May, 1890.

MOTIONS.

ASCENSION DAY (COMMITTEES).

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Committees shall not sit To-morrow, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock."
 —(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(12:28.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I do hope that this Government will not press this Motion, and waste the time of the House and of the Committees. Though "Ascension Day" is not a part of my Presbyterian 'doxy, I can quite understand that some people in this country may think it desirable that Committees of this House should not meet on that day. I do not, however, think there is any considerable desire on the part of hon. Members that Committees should not sit to-morrow until 2, seeing how anxious we all are to make progress with the surfeit of work before us. If any Members on particular Committees desire that they should not sit until 2 o'clock I have no doubt the Chairmen of those Committees will yield to their representations and adjourn accordingly. We shall shortly be adjourning over another saint's day—the Derby Day—and though I admit that going to church on Ascension Day is an innocent amusement and not on the same footing as going to the Derby, I think that as only a limited number of Members are likely to desire to go to church the Government should not press the Motion.

*(12.30.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am very sorry the hon. Baronet has occupied so much of the time of the House in opposing this Motion. It is one which it is my bounden duty to propose, and it is a Motion that has been made in this House from time immemorial. I would point out to the hon. Baronet that it is a question which only affects the functions of Members of this House who are appointed to serve on the Committees of the House for the purpose of considering matters in relation to Private Bills. I trust the hon. Baronet will see that the Motion does not in any way infringe on the time of the House itself, and I think I may add that it would be exceedingly hard upon Members of this House who may desire to avail themselves of the ordinary services of their church on Ascension Day to prevent them being able to do so by reason of their compulsory attendance on a Select Committee. I trust the hon. Baronet will not persist in opposing this Motion, but will allow the time of the House to be saved by permitting the Motion to be carried.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That Committees shall not sit To-morrow, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock.—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS
(IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 4.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.33.) DR. FOX (Tullamore): I rise for the purpose of moving the Second Reading of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, in introducing another measure, stated that the time had come when something of a practical nature might be done for the benefit of the labourers of Ireland, and he propounded a scheme which we who claim to know Ireland a little better than the right hon. Gentleman regard as purely experimental. We object to that scheme because we believe it is not likely to succeed, and we object to the employment of Irish funds for any experiment of the kind. We claim that if the right hon. Gentleman wants to experiment he should experiment not with Irish but with English money, and we also claim that we have proved by the Bill we now propose that we are as ready as he to do something for the labourers of Ireland, though with this difference, that we want to do something of a practical and tangible nature, and to spend the money for the benefit not only of the Irish labourers but the Irish tenants generally—the Irish shopkeepers, and even the Irish landlords. I find from the Report furnished to this House in 1888 the number of cottages applied for amounted to 19,860, while the number authorised up to that date was 9,552. Of those the number actually erected was 3,172, the number then in progress was 1,792, and the estimated cost was £934,480, the amount sanctioned by the Treasury being £820,997. This clearly shows that there is in Ireland a great demand for labourers' cottages, and also that under the existing law those cottages have not been supplied. It necessarily follows that there must have been some grave defect in the mode of procedure, because whereas the number of cottages applied for was 19,860, the number authorised to be built was only 9,552. I will, however, in order to illustrate my argument, take the case of one or two specific Unions. In the Union of Tramore there were 287 cottages applied for. The number authorised to be built was only 83; of these, only 63 were erected, while 12 were in progress. The estimated cost of these cottages was £861, and the amount sanctioned by the Treasury was £8,580. This money was to be obtained at an interest of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., which would amount to £4 9s. 2d. on every £100 borrowed. I next take the case of Nenagh. There the number of houses required was 262, which were obtained at an average cost of £132, entailing an amount of interest of £1,400 per annum. The income obtainable from the rent was about £630, leaving the large balance of £770 a year to be met by the taxpayers. Those figures do not include an estimated cost of about £50 per annum for the repair of the cottages. Well, Sir, I think I have shown that there is a great demand for labourers' cottages in Ireland. That has been admitted by all Parties of this House. I have further claimed that the demand for those cottages is not met by the present law. I also claim that there is a grave defect in the law, because there is no compulsory power to do more than lease land in such cases, whereas we contend that there ought to be a compulsory right to purchase land at a fair valuation. Another point I should like to put before the House is this: that while you say you are benefitting the labourer, you are, at the same time, imposing heavy taxation upon the taxpayer. We say that, inasmuch as the money you are proposing to deal with is Irish money, you ought to give us the chance of doing what we like with our own; and I put it to the House, in what better way could the surplus fund of any nation be employed than in benefitting the people? I will not detain the House further, except to say that the admissions already made by the Chief Secretary have rendered it quite unnecessary for me to further recommend this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman admits that his measure is a purely experimental one, and it is surrounded by grave difficulties. That admission he has made again and again. I ask him whether, under these circumstances, we ought to be called upon to pass a measure for the expenditure of Irish funds in a way which we do not believe will be beneficial, but which we do believe will inflict great loss upon the Irish people. On the other hand, the Bill which we now propose, although a small measure, is one which we believe will be devoid of all danger, and of advantage alike to the labourers, the general taxpayers, the shopkeepers, and even the landlord himself. I have great pleasure in moving the Second Reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Fox.)

(12.40.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): My hon. Friend has been exceedingly brief in the remarks he thought it necessary to make in introducing this Bill to the notice of the House. I commend his action in that respect and shall follow his example. I shall, therefore, be brief in performing the duty of seconding the Second Reading of this measure, because I believe that the House for the past eight or nine years has heard all the arguments that could possibly be adduced in favour of this measure. Year after year we have felt it to be our duty to introduce measures for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of the Irish people, and year after year those measures have met with the hostility of the Government, and the condemnation of this House, that condemnation having been shown by the rejection of those measures. Hence it is that we have come to the resolution that we ought not to weary the House by prolonged arguments in favour of this Bill. Measures like this we shall briefly introduce; we shall ask the opinion of the House upon them, leaving it to the House, should it think fit, to follow the example of previous Parliaments, and throw those measures into the waste paper basket. I notice that the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) has a notice on the Paper for the rejection of this Bill. In his Motion he points out that the Church Surplus Fund is already hypothecated for the purposes of the Irish Land Purchase Bill, and is, therefore, not available for the purposes of this measure. Now, Sir, Agricultural Labourers' Acts have been passed in this House before, and this Bill is a measure intended to facilitate the operation of those Acts; it seeks to use the National Fund in Ireland for that purpose—a fund to which the Irish people have an undeniable right. Doubtless, the hon. Member for South Belfast will be glad to have the Church Surplus Fund go where so much has gone before, namely, into the pockets of his friends the landlords. It is not many years ago since the leader of the former Conservative Government, Lord Beaconsfield, gave a million of that money to the landlords of Ireland, or rather lent it to them at an interest of  $1\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. The people of Ireland have for many years been relieved of the necessity and burden of supporting that institution, and surely the people of Ireland, and more especially the labourers, ought to be entitled to the residue of that fund, taking into account that the landlords have received so much from us already. I object to the remnant of that fund being devoted to the purposes of the Land Purchase Bill, and I claim it for the labourers of Ireland who are entitled to it. With regard to one clause of this Bill, which states that the price to be paid should not exceed 20 years' purchase, I would point out that that proposition is based on one made by the Chief Secretary, who has made it the maximum of the price to be paid for the land. This, I think, is quite enough to convince the mind of any reasonable man. I shall conclude my few remarks by stating that the labourers of Ireland are a very improving class of people, and of this I will furnish an illustration to the House. I have the honour to represent a portion of Ireland well-known to the hon. Member for Huntingdonshire. It is not long since, under the operation of the Labourers' Act, the Board of Poor Law Guardians built a number of labourers' cottages in a district with which he is well acquainted. They are sound, comfortable dwellings. The labourers were brought out of the huts and hovels they had formerly occupied on the estate of the hon. Member, and put into these dwellings, where they lived very comfortably. A short time ago, on a fine summer's afternoon, I was driving amongst these people, and I went into a number of the labourers' cottages. Although I was pleased with many things I saw, there were many others that were not very satisfactory to me. I was accompanied by my friend the Chairman of the Poor Law Guardians (Mr. Dalton), and I said, "I will give a prize of £5 to the occupier of the best kept cottage of the Union." Well, Sir, that offer was announced in the paper, and the result was that in many cases the manure heap was removed from the front to the back of the dwellings, and the price of geranium pots went up in the district. In point of fact, the houses bloomed internally and externally into flowery garden plots. I claim, Sir, on behalf of the labourers of Ireland, that they are an artistic and floral people if you only give them a chance; and if the hon. Member for Huntingdonshire only paid as much attention to the duties belonging to his position as he does to the enforcement of its rights he might have his estate in Tipperary one of the most beautiful in the three Kingdoms. If he did this instead of enforcing his rights, and encouraging other landlords as bad as himself to enforce their rights, there would not be a more picturesque portion of these realms. If the labourers of Ireland only had fair-play and due encouragement, such as we ask this House to give by the passing of this Bill, we should have among the labourers of Ireland a thriving and prosperous community, and be the means of preserving a very useful class of people. I have great pleasure, for these reasons, in seconding the Motion for the Second Reading of this Bill.

*(12.50.) MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I rise, Sir, for the purpose of moving the Amendment which stands in my name, namely,

"That, inasmuch as it appears from a Return laid upon the Table of the House that the present value of the Church Surplus is insufficient to cover both the charge imposed on it by 'The Land Purchase Bill, 1890,' and the additional charge of £1,500,000 for the purpose of erecting labourers' cottages, and as the Land Purchase Bill, which has been read a second time, provides special facilities for improving the dwellings of labourers, this House declines to sanction a proposal which will deprive the population of the poorest portion of Ireland of the funds requisite for ameliorating their condition."

In moving this Amendment I shall follow the example of brevity set by the Mover and Seconder of the Bill. I do not think that hon. Gentlemen opposite should be allowed to pose as the only friends of the labourers. The Members who sit on these (the Ministerial) Benches are just as anxious to promote the comfort of the labourers as any of those who sit opposite, and in the Resolution I have the honour to move I desire to manifest no hostility to the labourers of Ireland. What I want to affirm is that the provisions of this Bill cannot be carried out concurrently with the Land Purchase Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. As hon. Members are aware the Land Purchase Bill provides, through one of its clauses, for the erection of labourers' cottages; but if the Irish Church surplus, whatever it may be, is to be appropriated by this Bill, it is quite impossible that the benevolent intentions of the Chief Secretary can be carried out. Those Members who are opposed to the whole policy of the Government, who are opposed to land purchase, and who are hostile to the whole of the scheme of the Chief Secretary, are consistent in pressing forward this Bill, and in accusing the Government of want of generosity towards the labourers; but those who desire to see a practical scheme carried out—and the Bill of the Chief Secretary is a practical one—are consistent in supporting the Land Purchase Bill. Believing that the latter Bill is a masterly and statesmanlike measure, and that its operation will benefit the class of people this Bill professes to serve, I have great pleasure in moving the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "inasmuch as it appears from a Return laid upon the Table of the House that the present value of the Church Surplus is insufficient to cover both the charge imposed on it by 'The Land Purchase Bill, 1890,' and the additional charge of £1,500,000 for the purpose of erecting labourers' cottages, and as the Land Purchase Bill, which has been read a second time, provides special facilities for improving the dwellings of labourers, this House declines to sanction a proposal which will deprive the population of the poorest portion of Ireland of the funds requisite for ameliorating their condition,"—(Mr. Johnston.)

—instead thereof.

(12.55.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I cannot agree with the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. J. O'Connor) that measures of this description have invariably met with hostility on the Government side of the House. I am confident the hon. Gentleman will on reflection admit, that since the inception of legislation on behalf of the labourers of Ireland such legislation has always been received with cordiality by hon. Members on the Conservative side of the House, and so far as I and some of my hon. Friends are concerned, the present Bill will not be received with hostility. I do not intend to vote for the Amendment, but to vote for the Bill. I cannot, however, give the measure very much praise, because I cannot see that any clause of it will really do anything to promote the legislation which right hon. Members opposite have at heart. I rather imagine that, until quite recently, hon. Members have not been quite sure what they would put in the Bill; indeed, the revelation made by the Chief Secretary, to the effect that the Church surplus amounted to £1,500,000, must have been a God-send to them. However, I prefer to devote that £1,500,000 to the purposes of this Bill rather than to the purchase of land, and therefore I propose to join hon. Members opposite in support of this measure. But I totally differ from hon. Members opposite as to the mode in which they propose to apply the money. The Bill is brought in by hon. Members opposite under the guise of advancing the interests of the labourers of Ireland, but really to save the pockets of the ratepayers in certain districts; and if I vote with hon. Gentlemen opposite in favour of the Bill, it will be with the intention of moving in Committee such amendments as will make the Bill a real Bill for the benefit of the labourers all over Ireland—amendments which will enable the labourers of Ulster who are now deliberately excluded from the benefits of the Bill, to obtain some advantage from the operation of the measure. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Second Reading of the Bill got up the most recent statistics as to the progress of the Labourers' Acts in Ireland. I will admit that, having regard to the clauses of the Bill, it does not matter whether he took the statistics of last year or of the year before. He laid great stress on the fact that there was a demand for labourers' houses which had not been complied with, and that that demand had not arrived at a satisfactory solution. But whose fault is it that labourers' houses have not been provided? Undoubtedly the fault is altogether to be attributed to the action of the Poor Law Guardians themselves. In one of the Unions specified just now as being insufficiently supplied, I find that over 55 of the houses applied for have been abandoned by the Sanitary Authority who had charge of the carrying out of these schemes. ["No, No!"] I have the statistics here, and that certainly is the case. In the North of Ireland the Labourers' Acts have proved nearly abortive owing to the action of the elected Guardians. In the Union of Ballymena, for example, no action would have been taken but for the strenuous exertions of the ex officio Guardians. This Bill will do nothing to remedy the difficulty under which the labourers in Ulster suffer at the present moment. While I shall vote for the Second Reading, I intend, if the Bill reaches the Committee stage, to move Amendments which will enable those on whose behalf this class legislation is promoted to take, at all events, the initial steps by which they can secure a discussion of their scheme by the Boards of Guardians. I intend also to move the insertion of clauses giving the Local Government Board control over the action of the Boards of Guardians, which is at present dictated solely by a regard to their own interests and not with a view to remedy such defects as may substantially exist. I have now only to express my regret that hon. Members opposite, having been fortunate enough to secure the first place on a Wednesday, should not have taken a little more trouble over a Bill of this class and should not have endeavoured to make it a little more effective. I have no doubt that if they desire seriously to benefit the labouring class in Ireland they will be prepared in Committee to receive such Amendments as will make the Bill a satisfactory piece of legislation. I regret that I cannot follow my hon. Friend who has moved the Amendment, and I shall vote in favour of the Bill.

*(1.10.) MR. MULHOLLAND (London-derry, N.): I think I am right in regarding the 3rd clause as the central point of the Bill. Concurring as I do with the views expressed by the hon. Member opposite, and also by my hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney), as to the method there proposed for spending the Church surplus, I feel bound to support the Second Reading of this Bill. As has been represented by the hon. Member who moved the Second Reading, the Church surplus is essentially Irish money, and ought to be devoted to the benefit of all parts of the country. I am bound, however, to dissociate myself from the proposal which has been made with regard to the distribution of this money. Hon. Members opposite propose to devote about £500,000 for the benefit of what I may call the Nationalist parts of Ireland, and the remaining £1,000,000 is to be held up for the remaining Boards of Guardians to scramble for on the principle of "first come, first served." I think I shall not be very far wrong in stating that the result will be that hon. Members opposite and their friends will secure nine-tenths of it. I think this affords a good illustration of the way in which Ulster would be treated by a Home Rule Government. I differ from those who assume that this Bill if passed would be in any way a final settlement of the question. The Boards of Guardians in Ulster, at any rate, have not shown the smallest inclination to carry the Acts into effect, and even when they are stimulated by this sum of money the Acts will still remain a dead letter in many parts of the country. The fact is, that the farmers, who are paramount on the Boards of Guardians in Ulster, have not shown the smallest disposition to act for the benefit of the labourers. It is a matter of extreme regret that the Land Commissioners have not dealt with the question by exercising the powers conferred upon them by the 19th clause of the Act of 1881. I hope my right hon. Friend (Mr. A. J. Balfour) may suggest some method by which the Land Commissioners may be encouraged to exercise those powers in the future. Members below the Gangway on the opposite side will, no doubt, say that the landlords are responsible for the failure of the Labourers' Acts in Ulster; but I assure them, from my personal knowledge of several Unions in the Counties of Down and Derry, that they are altogether misinformed. The labourers know very well that the landlords, as a rule, are in favour of giving a fair trial to the Acts passed for their benefit. I am surprised that this question has been left so long in the hands of private Members, and that the House has had as yet no indication of the course which the Government intend to pursue. I think hon. Members hardly recognise the extreme importance of the labourers. A great deal has been done for the farmers, and very little for the labourers, who number, with their families, about 1,500,000, as against 2,500,000 farmers. The labourers in my constituency are looking forward with great interest and anxiety to the speech which the Chief Secretary is going to deliver, and if, on account of the clause in the Land Purchase Bill the right hon. Gentleman is unable to support this measure, I hope he will give some distinct assurance that the Government intend to deal with the question before long in a thorough and practical manner.

*(1.20.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): If this Bill were what it professes to be—a Bill to benefit the labourers—I should be the very last person to vote against it. But the title of the Bill is most deceptive. It has nothing to do with the agricultural labourers, and will not put a shilling in their pockets in any part of Ireland. If it had been introduced from these Benches it would very properly have been called a Bill for the relief of landlords. It is simply because it is impossible for Members opposite to devise means for relieving labourers out of the rates that the measure is brought in at all. The present Acts, if properly put in force, are amply sufficient to supply labourers with cottages where they are required. No doubt those Acts have not been as operative as we could have wished; but this Bill would do very little indeed towards mending matters. It is meant to benefit labourers in the agricultural districts. A very large proportion of the agricultural labourers in Ireland live in the small towns, and to them the Bill offers no assistance towards getting their dwellings improved. I object to the appropriation of the Church surplus in the manner proposed. If the Church surplus be applied to anything it ought to be applied to the reduction of the enormous tithe rent-charge annuities amounting to 22½ years' purchase, a sum out of all proportion to the value now fixed upon Irish land. But if not applied to that purpose it ought to be applied to the solution of the most pressing and important of Irish problems—a problem which has hitherto proved insoluble—the relief of the congested districts. Whether the sum available will be sufficient to produce any effectual results in the congested districts I am unable to say. It will largely depend upon the manner in which hon. Gentlemen opposite deal with the question, and whether they encourage their constituents to accept the boon offered to them in the spirit in which it is tendered. I shall vote for the rejection of the Bill.

*(1.25.) THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I do not intend to speak at any great length on this Bill, but I do wish to point out to the House the very peculiar character which this Debate has hitherto assumed. This Bill, introduced professedly for the purpose of improving the condition of the labourers of Ireland, has received hardly any explanation. But the most remarkable thing is the way in which the Bill proposes to deal with the Irish Church surplus, and the casual manner in which that all-important paragraph of the Bill has been treated by the Members who have brought forward the measure. I wish to say for myself, and I am sure my Colleagues on this Bench agree with me, that any such measure, if it had not contained this particular proposal for allocating and absorbing £1,500,000 of the Irish Church surplus, would have received from them the most careful and friendly consideration. [Ironical Home Rule cheers.] Why should it not? Do hon. Members opposite really pretend that the present Government is disinclined to confer advantages on the Irish labourers? [Home Rule cries of "Hear hear!"] Well, then, to say any such thing is one of the grossest of calumnies ever uttered without a shadow of foundation. The Irish supporters of the present Government who have spoken to-day are so anxious for the advantage of the Irish labourers that they are willing to vote for a Bill which each of them has condemned as almost ludicrously inadequate. I say it is mere claptrap to make such accusations against any Government. It is the exaggeration of absurd partisanship which prompts such a charge. The policy of hon. Members opposite to-day is perfectly plain. Having present a very large number of their friends, their object is to snap a Division which may seem to be destructive of the Land Purchase Bill of the Government. Hon. Members propose in this Bill to allocate £1,500,000 of the Irish Church surplus to this particular purpose of benefitting the agricultural labourers of Ireland. When did they first think of this admirable scheme of financial policy? How many of their leaders have sanctioned the proposal? I challenged hon. Gentlemen opposite, and especially the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who was in the House a few minutes ago, and who, if he is not here now, can be informed of what I say, to deny that this proposal is merely an afterthought put forward for no other purpose than to deprive the Government of the use of that sum for the purpose of meeting the great and grave difficulty which presses upon them in the congested districts of Ireland. Why do I say that? The House remembers that the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) used every kind of opposition he could imagine for the purpose of repelling and discrediting the proposals of the Government. And what was his main argument? To-day we are told that the surplus of £1,500,000 must of necessity be applied to the urgent demands of the labourers of Ireland. But what did the hon. Member for East Mayo say the other day? These are the words which he used, and I think I am entitled to ask hon. Members opposite, and especially the hon. Member for East Mayo for an explanation, otherwise the people of this country will believe that this Bill has been introduced with this clause in it mainly for the purpose of defeating the Land Purchase Bill of the Government and to take away this Irish Church Surplus Fund, which is certainly an important portion of the measure. I will read the words of the hon. Member for East Mayo, and I will leave the explanation to hon. Members opposite. On the 28th of April the hon. Member, speaking of the manner in which the Government Bill deals with the congested districts of Ireland, said—

"It was no doubt true that the sum of £1,600,000 was charged on what remained of the Irish Church surplus for the purposes of this Act. But he protested against such a burden being placed on this fund. This was a purely Irish fund, and it would be wanted when Home Rule was in operation for purposes of education."

I call upon the hon. Gentleman to explain what it was that he meant, and to explain also the present action of the Irish Members.

*(1.35.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I had no intention of taking part in this Debate. We have had a good many discussions upon the question of labourers' cottages during the present Parliament, and the sum and substance of them is that labourers' cottages have been very few. That is perfectly true; and so far as Ulster is concerned, the Act has practically been a dead letter. The failure has been owing to the unwillingness of the elected Guardians to increase the taxation of the country by adding the expense which the erection of these cottages would entail. That is the real reason why in Ulster the Act has not worked; and, having read this Bill carefully through, I do not see that it contains a single clause that would get us out of the difficulty and facilitate the erection of cottages. I am certainly inclined to describe the Bill as a piece of cheap philanthropy, and I will tell the House why I use that expression. It proposes to take for this purpose £1,500,000 out of the Irish Church Surplus Fund. But that £1,500,000 is already ear-marked by another Bill which has already passed its Second Reading. Hon. Members know that if this Bill were carried it could only come in as a second charge, behind the proposal of Her Majesty's Government, and that, so far as practical working is concerned, it can come to nothing. Now, I am not inclined to join in this cheap philanthropy, and I will be no party to an attempt to stab the Land Purchase Bill. I am not in the least afraid to stand up in my place in this House and use that language, and I say that hon. Members, in uniting to try and get hold of the £1,500,000, are attempting to destroy this Land Purchase Bill in one of its most vital parts. Therefore, as I say, I will be no party to the operation. But there is another thing to which I wish to call attention. This is a Bill of 14 clauses, which proposes to amend the various Labourers' Acts. Have we had a word of explanation of the measure? I admit that my hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) went into the clauses of the Bill, but did the the Mover offer a single word of explanation? I listened in vain for any attempt at explanation, and I think it is an extraordinary thing for hon. Members to come down here on a Wednesday when there is ample time to discuss the provisions of the Bill, and to find that neither the Mover nor the Seconder attempt to explain the nature of those provisions. We are told that the proposal is a simple one—merely to take the £1,500,000 remaining of the Irish Church surplus; but, as I have already pointed out, it is already earmarked by the proposals of the Government. As hon. Members who support the Bill appear to have adopted a conspiracy of silence, I beg to move that the Debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

*(1.40.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think that any hon. Member who has been present in the House during the last hour must feel that the Motion of my hon. Friend for the adjournment of the Debate is thoroughly justified. Two gentlemen only have spoken from the quarter of the House from which the Bill proceeds, and neither of them have thought it necessary to explain the provisions of the measure. I think we are entitled to have a complete and full explanation from hon. Members who support it. I know that on the Motion for Adjournment it would be out of order to discuss the Bill itself, and that the only question we can discuss is whether the Motion is justifiable or not, and ought to be accepted by the House. We are certainly entitled to some explanation of a Bill which seeks to dispose of a million and a half of money, and, therefore, I think that the Motion of my hon. Friend is absolutely justified.

Question put.

(1.43.) The House divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 94.—(Div. List, No. 82.)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. PARNELL rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

*(1.55.) MR. SMITH BARRY (Hunts, S.): I am very much disinclined to vote against a Bill of this kind, seeing that it is a Bill which deals with so important a subject, and a Bill which professes to improve the houses of the agricultural labourers of Ireland I have always been, and I think all the landlords of Ireland have always been, in favour of bringing about some improvement in the condition of the agricultural labourers. I have certainly myself done everything I could, ever since I had anything to do with the management of Irish estates, to improve the condition of the labouring classes. In the very Union of Tipperary, which has been referred to, I built 100 houses. [AN IRISH MEMBER: And put a rack-rent upon them.] Those houses are still occupied by a contented and thriving agricultural population. An hon. Member opposite has referred to those houses; I am glad that he takes such an interest in the labourer and his horticultural pursuits; and so far as the geraniums he mentioned are concerned, I can only say that they were presented to the labourers by my own agent at the end of the season. The reason why the provisions of the Labourers' Act have not been more largely made available in Ulster is that it has been the fault of the tenant-farmers, who are the elected members of the Boards of Guardians in Ireland. What I maintain is, that the landlords have done far more to help in the building of houses in Ireland, under the Labourers' Act, than the tenant-farmers. In the winter of 1884-5, after the first Labourers' Act was passed, I made an offer to the Tipperary Board of Guardians to present a piece of land which would supply from 10 to 20 different sites, on the condition that the farmers, on whose land the cottages were to be built, were content to forego any payment on their part for their interest in the land. The Board of Guardians accepted the offer, and the Board of Guardians of Ennis did me the honour of voting a vote of thanks to me. I do not think that, under the altered circumstances of the present day, any Board of Guardians in the South of Ireland would venture to pass a vote of thanks to me. I am sorry to say that my offer came to nothing, because the tenant-farmers did not look upon the matter in the same light that I did. They were by no means disposed to grant facilities for the erection of labourers' cottages on the condition that they were to forego their share of the price. The proposal contained in the present Bill is that a very large sum of money shall be devoted to the purposes of supplementing the Agricultural Labourers' Act. It is a very important Bill, and it deals with a very important subject. So far as I can see, it seems to be a Bill which has been fairly drafted, and which proposes to deal with the subject in a proper and straightforward manner. But we have had no explanation of the Bill, and without an explanation it is impossible for me to vote for it, especially as the reason for introducing the measure seems to be the desire to upset the large measure of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. This Bill was ordered to be printed on the 12th of February, but it is evident that the figures which it contains have been inserted from the Government measure, and, therefore, I am not prepared to support the Bill, because I regard it simply as an attempt to destroy the more important measure of the Government for the disposal of the Irish Church surplus. Whatever the merits or demerits of the Government proposal may be—and I am by no means inclined to bless the Bill in every respect—I must say that that part of it which proposes to deal with the congested districts appears to be the best, the most comprehensive, and the most genuine attempt which has been made in our time to deal with a most burning question. Upon these grounds I shall vote for the Amendment.

(2.15.) COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): From the condition of the Benches opposite one would not be led to imagine that this is a question of much importance to the Nationalist Party in Ireland. I know that hon. Members on the other side of the House arrogate to themselves the representation of the Irish people; but when a question arises which concerns the condition of the Irish labourer the appeal for a verification of their statements is made to empty benches. If we desire to learn the true meaning of the Bill before the House, I think we might learn it from the singular fact that the leader of the Nationalist Party, who declares that he takes a great interest in the welfare of the Irish people, did not even take the trouble to listen to the opening of the Debate, but rushed into the House with great activity after the Debate had progressed for some time to move that the Question be now put, and when the Speaker declined to put it rushed out again. It is another singular fact that the Bill was not printed until after hon. Members below the Gangway discovered the fact that there was an Irish Church surplus. In fact, many of us doubted, before we learned the fact from my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, that there was any considerable surplus at all. And hon. Members below the Gangway refrained from inserting any figure in their Bill until they ascertained the actual amount of the surplus and the object to which it was proposed to be devoted by Her Majesty's Government. As soon as they made the discovery they proposed to relieve the Chief Secretary of this sum of £1,500,000, to take it away from the object which the Government have in view, and to apply it to objects which, in themselves, are admirable, but which would have the effect, if this Bill were adopted, of preventing the solution of one of the most difficult problems of Irish life. The Bill of the Government is a great measure. In its object I cordially agree, although I object to many of its details. At the same time, I believe it is a measure which, in the future, will largely result in knocking the bottom out of the agitation which for so long a period has destroyed the best hope of securing the peace of my country. So far as I am concerned I shall vote against this Bill, not because I disapprove of its object, but because I disapprove of the spirit with which it has been brought forward. Anybody who knows anything of Ireland will admit that a great social revolution has been taking place in that country. It is now proposed to settle the difficulty by substituting one class of landlord for another. I deny that it would do so. A majority of the Irish people are not tenants, but belong to the working class; and I am persuaded that until a measure of large generosity is brought in to deal with the condition of the working classes, there will always be a rankling wound left which will be a source of continual discontent, in fomenting which any mercenary or truculent agitator will find a market for his wares. I maintain that there is no tenantry on the face of the land which has ever been treated with such generosity as the Irish tenants, although I am prepared to admit that at the same time very little has been done for the labourers and the working classes. In using the word "generosity" it has always struck me when I hear English statesmen descant upon the condition of Ireland, and see tears dimming their eyes, that when they desire to wipe those tears away they always use the pocket-handkerchief at the expense of the Irish landlord. I should certainly prefer to find that their sympathy is manifested at their own expense. When I find a Bill of this kind introduced into Parliament, which proposes to be generous to the working men of Ireland at the expense of the congested districts of the South, I confess that I very much doubt the bona fides of the action of hon. Members opposite. I am sorry that on this occasion we have not had the benefit of their voluminous eloquence. The hon. Member for North Cork (Mr. Flynn) caught your eye, Sir, before you left the Chair. Where was he, Sir, when you came back? I am unable to say. He was certainly not in his place to explain the provisions of this Bill. Under the Bill of Her Majesty's Government they propose not to sweep away landlords, but to substitute one class of landlords for another. I challenge anyone who is acquainted with the conditions of Irish life to deny that the life and social condition of the labourer in that country are infinitely better on the estates of large landlords than on the smaller estates. Has any Member of the Party opposite built a hundred labourers' cottages at his own expense, as the hon. Member for South Hunts has done? I am aware that you are building a new town at Tipperary; but I fancy that that is at the expense of the inhabitants. I should like to know if you have improved the condition of the Irish labourer in any way, whether you have not made a fool of him, and whether the suffering that ought properly to have fallen on the shoulders of agitators has not been borne by him? I challenge contradiction when I say that the condition of the labourer on a large estate is a thousandfold more preferable to the condition of the labourer under the small farmer. Now, you propose to sweep away the present Irish landlords. ["No."] Hon. Members say "No ;" but an Irish landlord must have money to live in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes ; the Irish landlord does not possess that facility for living without money which distinguishes other people. It seems that these Irish landlords are now for the first time discovered by hon. Members opposite to be so necessary to the welfare, the prosperity, and the progress of Ireland that the hon. Member for Cork has come forward and informed us that he is far from desiring to banish the Irish landlords, and has found fault with the Bill of the Government on the ground that it will have that effect. I want now to point out what the condition of the labourers will be when the landlords are gone. It is proposed to establish another set of landlords of a much smaller—of a microscopical character. I ask, whether it is not the truth that the Irish labourers on estates of 12 or 30 acres will be far more unhappy and more devoid of the necessities and the comforts of life than those engaged upon the present larger estates? I am not in favour of doing away with the present landlords, but I am in favour of, and will support to the best of my ability, any proposal of the Government to deal with the question of the Irish labourers in a measure of a far more comprehensive character, which will have the effect of showing us that the generosity of Great Britain to Ireland is not always to be vicarious, but that she will put her hand into her own pocket and show the Irish people that their gratitude in the future should not be founded on gifts from the pockets of the Irish landlords, but from the pockets of the British people.

(2.35.) SIR C. LEWIS (Antrim, N.) : I am sorry that on the present occasion I shall not be able to vote either for the Bill or the Amendment, and I will give my reasons for the attitude I take up. I have long held, and still hold, the opinion that Irish land legislation has taken a wrong direction, and that we are now proceeding to such an extent in relieving the tenant that we not only give away the property of other people, but destroy the opportunity of giving assistance to other classes who deserve it as much, if not more. I believe that when the history of this period comes to be written in the light of events, it will be seen that we have been distributing gifts to the tenants to an inordinate degree. As regards the Ulster tenants, though they have many complaints and grievances, I believe that, as compared with the labourers, they have everything given to them. They have been favoured, whilst the labourers have been entirely neglected, and deserted even, by hon. Gentlemen opposite. I know what the condition of the Ulster labourer is, and I know that he can be represented as living in a miserable house that is not sufficient to shelter him. The labourer has been neglected by hon. Gentlemen opposite because his vote has not been thought of much importance. I believe that the class of labourers has been disgracefully neglected by both sides of the House, and the Chief Secretary will forgive me if I say that I have endeavoured to call the serious attention of the Government to this matter as an evil which is looming closely in the future.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway) : Since you left Derry?

SIR C. LEWIS : That seems to me to be about as inane an interruption as could be made. This is a matter which does not depend upon a particular constituency, but is one of public importance. It has been said that this Bill interferes with the measure of the Government. I do not sympathise with that measure. I believe that we have already given the farmers enough, and that we are going in the wrong direction ; but that is not any reason for supporting hon. Members opposite in an attempt, by a side-wind, to take away the funds which the Government propose to employ. Reading between the lines, and seeing the conduct of hon. Members who support this Bill, it is plain that they do not want so much to see the Bill discussed, and its principle carried out, as to give a stab in the side of the Government for the purpose of checkmating the measure which the Government have proposed. I do not say that there is anything very objectionable in the general provisions of the Bill to satisfy the necessity there is for altering the mechanism of the existing Labourers' Act; but I think we ought to give the Government another opportunity of dealing with this question on broad lines. I maintain that the Church surplus is not a fit fund for either this purpose or that for which the Government propose to use it, both of them being totally different objects from that for which it was originally provided. While, therefore, I acknowledge that this question is of serious, stirring, and immediate importance, I contend that both parties are in fault, and while I will take no part in the Government Bill, I am not going to create a false issue by giving away the Church surplus as proposed in this Bill without proper safeguards. I quite concur with the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh with regard to the administration of the Labourers' Acts. I have read resolutions published in the acknowledged organs of the Nationalist Party, distinctly prohibiting Boards of Guardians from taking any part in assisting labourers who are not of the true blue Nationalist creed. What is wanted is an untainted body to administer these Acts; a body free from terrorism and intimidation. The Boards of Guardians who have to administer these Acts are, as these resolutions show, under a system of terrorism, which prevents them from using their discretion in selecting the sites, and the labourers who are to have the cottages. I cannot vote against this Bill, because its object is one which I desire to see accomplished; but its mechanism is useless for the purpose, the use of the Church Fund is objectionable, and the Bill is directed to the express purpose of doing injury to the proposal of the Government, and I, therefore, will not vote for it.

*(248.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I suppose the House will expect to hear from this Bench on the subject of what I had been going to call the Debate, though that term is inappropriate, because, if my memory serves me right, the speeches which we had from the fathers and god-fathers of the Bill took up precisely 10 minutes of our time.

Sir C. Lewis

An hon. MEMBER: That is a novel complaint.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; and I shall have to dwell upon the novelty of it directly. The hon. Member for King's County delivered a speech that was brief but not pregnant.

An hon. MEMBER: You were not here.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member's speech, I understand, had very little to do with the Bill. I believe it occupied about five minutes of our time. He was immediately followed by the Member for South Tipperary, who took up another five minutes. And did he devote that five minutes to explaining the provisions of the Bill? Not at all. He devoted them to giving an account of the efforts he had made to stimulate the growth of geraniums in the windows of the cottages that had been built under the Labourers' Act in his constituency. And having done that, he did not devote any part of that rich eloquence, which on the subject of the Liquor Trade is not usually found to flow by any means in a thin and niggard stream from him, to the substance of the Bill before us. He devoted no more than five minutes to a Bill which proposes to take the whole of the National funds of the Church surplus and devote them to the amelioration of the labouring class in Ireland. Moreover, during a discussion which deals with funds of that importance, and with the interests of the labourers of Ireland, the House has not been favoured with the presence on the Front Opposition Bench of a single representative of the late Government, unless the stray appearance from time to time of one or two gentlemen who act as Whips to that Party, and who look in now and again to see how the Debate is going on, may be deemed to represent them. That is a very interesting and remarkable fact. An hon. Member interrupted me just now when I remarked that to-day Irish rhetoric does not seem to flow in the abundant stream that is usually noticeable when matters of such small importance are under discussion. The hon. Member said that was a novel complaint. And so it is, because this is a very unusual occurrence. During the 15 or 16 years I have been in the House I have never known it necessary to make the complaint before. [Cries of "Question!"] This certainly is the question. As a rule, when the judgment of the House is sought in favour of a Bill it is made to depend, as far as possible, on the arguments in favour of the measure; but in this case hon. Members opposite have apparently not thought it worth while to advance any arguments in support of the Bill. About this time last year a whole Wednesday was spent by Irish Members in discussing how some of their colleagues who had had the misfortune to be put in prison should be lodged and treated; but how the labourers of Ireland are to be lodged appears to be a subject of comparatively little interest to them. The hon. Member for South Antrim announced his intention of voting for the measure; but the only reason he gave for that was that, in his opinion, the passing of the Bill would destroy certain provisions of another measure which has been read a second time, which provisions do not meet with his approval.

MR. MACARTNEY: I do not think I said that. I said I approved of the method of allocating the money in this Bill, which I said had not been explained very fully, and that I thought it would facilitate the working of the Labourers' Acts already in existence. I am perfectly free to vote for any allocation of the £1,500,000 of the Church Surplus Fund, as I have not supported the Government measure.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I quite understand the hon. Gentleman's position; but I think he will not deny that his speech implied that this Bill, if carried, would not have the effect of stimulating the Local Authorities in Ulster or anywhere else in spending money in building cottages under the Labourers' Cottages Acts.

MR. MACARTNEY: What I said was that there was no provision in the Bill, as at present drafted, which would enable the labourers to secure a more efficient working of the Acts than there is at present, and that in Committee I should endeavour to carry Amendments which I have proposed on previous occasions.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Therefore, I am correct in saying that the Bill, as it stands, does not appear to my hon. Friend to contain any guarantee that the Local Authorities will exercise the powers given under the old Labourers' Acts in a more public-spirited manner than they do at present. My hon. Friend will admit that unless the Local Authorities do use the powers given them under the Act, which expires next year, it would be in vain that we should give them the Church Surplus Funds to aid their operations. But after my hon. Friend's explanation I acquit him of using, or endeavouring to use, this Bill as a means of embarrassing the Government in their conduct of the Land Purchase Bill. But I do not suppose I need extend the same charitable interpretation to the action of hon. Gentlemen opposite. And I suppose hon. Members opposite will not deny that the chief interest they take in this Bill is not so much to benefit the Irish labourer as to embarrass the Government with regard to the Land Purchase Bill. They are now deliberately going to vote to mortgage the Church surplus for a purpose to which the hon. Member for East Mayo openly declared it ought not to be applied, for he said the other day that it should be paid to educational purposes only. [Mr. DILON assented.] The hon. Member assents to that interpretation, and, therefore, something must have occurred between the Second Reading of the Land Bill and to-day to persuade hon. Gentlemen opposite that the teachers in Ireland do not want the money, and that the labourers ought to have it. My hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim complained that nothing has been done for the labourers of Ireland, and said very truly that the course of legislation during the last 10 years has been to give advantages, rightly or wrongly, at the expense of the public or of the landlords to the tenants. But when he said that nothing has been done, or is being done, for the labourers of Ireland, he cannot have had before him the full figures relating to the steps that have been taken in their interest. According to the last Reports, which will very shortly be in the hands of hon. Members, it appears that the Treasury has already sanctioned loans to the amount of £1,098,772. I also find that if the whole of the schemes which have been, or are about to be, submitted to the Local Government Board, estimated at about £400,000 more, are considered, it will be seen that £1,500,000, within a few thousands, has been applied, or shortly will be applied, for the benefit of the labourers of Ireland. It cannot be maintained by any section of the House that that is a trifling or an insignificant sum. An hon. Member has regretted that the question of dealing with the labourers of Ireland should have been left to private Members; but the benefits proposed to be given to the labourers of Ireland under the Land Purchase Bill have not been fully recognised. I should probably be out of order in now discussing the provisions of that measure, yet it is relevant to the Debate that I should remind the House of what they are. Under those provisions one-eighth of all the annuities payable on purchase under the Land Purchase Bill will be given to supply labourers' cottages in parts of the country where they are most required, and I find that the sum thus available for the purpose will be no less than between £75,000 and £79,000 a year; whereas the entire sum available under the present Bill, and that probably subject to a large reduction, cannot be estimated at more than £40,000 or £45,000 a year; so that the boon intended to be given for the Irish labourers, the sum to be granted for the building of labourers' cottages in Ireland by the Land Purchase Bill when it comes into operation, is nearly double that which the present Bill proposes to give. In reality, if the Bill passes and becomes fully operative, it will do far more for the object this Bill professes, on the face of it, to have in view—the better housing of the labouring classes in Ireland. Though that is its professed object the Bill is as much intended to give relief to Local Authorities. The House is probably not aware that the Bill is retrospective in its operation. It is intended to supply half the cost not only of labourers' cottages which have been built, but also of those which may be built, so that, of the £1,500,000 the Bill would deal with,

Mr. A. J. Balfour

£750,000 would go from this National Fund not for national purposes and not for labourers' cottages, but simply and solely to recoup those Unions which have already spent borrowed money under the Labourers' Act. I think this fact alone will be sufficient to show the House the hypocritical nature of the Bill, and those who advocate it on the ground of using the Church Surplus Fund for the benefit of agricultural labourers, either do not know the contents of the Bill, or are deliberately bringing it in under false pretences. The House will see that merely comparing the two schemes, the scheme we have brought forward in the Land Purchase Bill for the benefit of the labourers with the scheme in the present Bill for the same object, while the latter would provide at the most £20,000 a year, our proposal, should it come into full operation, would provide £75,000 a year. But my hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) suggests the proposals in the Land Purchase Bill may not come into operation in some parts of Ireland, and so provision may not everywhere be made for building cottages. But granting that, it is to be observed that the part of Ireland where it appears the Labourers' Act has been least taken advantage of is Ulster, and, by universal admission, whatever may be thought of the Land Purchase Bill in other parts of Ireland, in Ulster it is received with great favour, and I do not doubt that the amount authorised to be borrowed in Ulster will be fully taken up at no very distant date in the various counties there. Take Antrim for instance, the capitalised value of the sum available for land purchase would be £1,426,650, and the annual amount available for building cottages, should land purchase go on in Antrim, would be £3,500, or, capitalised, over £100,000. What is true of Antrim applies to a similar extent to every county in Ulster and elsewhere where land purchase takes place. I have no doubt that the sums available will be taken advantage of, and that the labourers will have a fair share of benefits proposed to be conferred on the country by Imperial credit. One hon. Friend of mine has dilated on the injustice of using for class purposes a fund intended, to be used for the whole of Ireland. He said we ought not to devote this sum of £1,500,000, intended to be a fund for the national advantage, to the benefit of a particular class of farmers. Of course I admit that, in one sense of the word, the tenants in the congested district are farmers, but they are not farmers in the English sense of the word, and I am disposed to think whatever their legal tenure may be, they ought to be regarded by this House rather as distressed labourers than as impoverished farmers. I have often said they ought to be regarded as labourers, with allotments. A large number of them do eke out their living by labour in England and Scotland, and some, I believe, even by labour in America, while others make a living partially by the cultivation of their allotments, and largely by fishing and other local industries. They are labourers in the strict sense of the word, whatever their legal standing may be, and thinking, as we do, that money may be devoted to the welfare of the labouring class in Ireland, then it cannot be denied that, go where you will, you can find no section of the labouring population more deserving or more requiring assistance, or who have a greater claim on this National Fund, than the poor people who inhabit these congested districts in the West. Therefore, to summarise my argument, this Bill is not so much a Labourers' Relief Bill than it is a Local Rates Relief Bill; secondly, it is a far worse scheme for the labourers of Ireland, far more illiberal in amount than the proposal in the Land Purchase Bill I introduced the other day; and let the House notice this, which I omitted to mention before, though it is a most important consideration—if this Bill passes it will leave it entirely to the Local Authorities to determine whether a single sixpence shall be devoted to the building of labourers' cottages or not. The Land Purchase Bill practically compels or holds out inducements to Local Authorities, in my opinion, of a far more stringent character than anything to be found in this Bill. Comparing, therefore, the two Bills, it is plain, in the first place, that the amount of money under this Bill is much smaller; in the second place, that the inducement to Local Authorities is not so great; in the third place, that part of the money professed to be devoted to the purpose is merely given to Local Authorities; in the fourth place, that you leave untouched that which is not a local but a national calamity, the condition of the population on the West Coast of Ireland. These are reasons which, I think, should be conclusive with those who are moved by consideration for the good of Ireland as a whole, or of the particular class of Irish labourers. We all know that the motives of hon. Gentlemen opposite have nothing whatever to do with the condition of any particular class in Ireland. Their motives may be laudable, may be excellent, but the motive is not benefit to the labouring class in Ireland. I do not complain of their motive. They dislike the Land Purchase Bill, and, finding they are unable to defeat that Bill by argument, they may try to damage it by a side wind. Let them do that, but do not let them pose as philanthropists. They are wire-pullers, and good ones. They have always shown much greater aptitude for that particular occupation than for the calling of philanthropy, of which, occasionally, they make such loud profession. The object of hon. Gentlemen is tolerably clear, but I do not think it is likely to be successful in the House this afternoon. But whatever that decision may be, of course the Government will certainly not regard it as final, or indeed of any significance whatever. Even if the Bill is carried, which I venture to think hon. Gentlemen opposite hardly anticipate, let me point out that the £1,500,000 the Bill proposes to take is already taken, or will be taken, by the Land Purchase Bill, and this Bill becomes a dead letter. There is only one other point, and that relatively a subsidiary point to the matter before the House. The Labourers' Act expires next year, and it will be the duty of the Government next year to make proposals for dealing with the Acts, and probably for reviewing them in some shape or other, and then will be the time for Amendments to the Act to be considered. They were brought in as a temporary measure originally, they were extended to seven years; we have had that length of experience, and the Acts will expire next year, and then will be the proper and legitimate time for the Government to bring forward their own proposals for amendment, and for hon. Gentlemen to offer what suggestions they may think right for the improvement of those Acts. [Interruptions.] I am sorry that hon. Gentlemen do me the injustice of supposing I have an object in extending my remarks. Personally, I have no objection to a decision of the House being taken, for, as I have said, and I am glad to have the opportunity of repeating it, the conditions under which this so-called Debate has gone on has deprived it absolutely of all significance, and no significance will be attached by the Government to the decision the House may come to. I think every one of the considerations I have brought before the House is deserving of an answer, though it may not be forthcoming. No attempt has been made to meet the arguments, but every man who has at heart an improvement in the condition of the inhabitants on the West Coast or the labourers of Ireland, will not hesitate to declare, at the fitting time, his disapproval of the attempt made by hon. Gentlemen opposite under the guise of benefiting labourers to relieve the rates in Irish Unions.

JURY LAW (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 31.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(3.20.) MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.): This Bill deals with a subject to which the attention of the House has often been directed in various ways. It has often been alleged that Irish people have no respect for law and order, and the purpose of this Bill, shortly stated, is to induce that respect for Jury Law which at present the people do not entertain. The Attorney General for Ireland will, no doubt, be anxious to explain the action of his predecessor in office in relation to a celebrated trial last October in my native county; so, without dilating at length on the provisions of the Bill, I will merely allude to that trial by way of illustration, and shortly state that the object of the Bill is to give prisoners in Ireland that chance of fair play which, owing to the action of the Crown prosecutors, they do not now enjoy. By a practice unknown in this country, a very large number of special jurors are summoned for the trial of political prisoners, and thus, at Maryborough, 217 men were summoned as jurors for the trials I have mentioned, all men rated at over £100, and of these 217 only 66 were Catholics or Nationalists, or supposed to have any sympathy with the persons on trial. It is because we object to have the law brought into contempt by its administration that we introduce this Bill. We wish the people to have confidence in the administration of the law. We have as much respect for law and order, fairly administered, as any hon. Member on the other side, but I think no hon. Member can justify the action taken at the trial of the Gweedore prisoners at Maryborough, where the whole of the special jury panel were summoned, and any person who was suspected of any sympathy in politics or religion with the people on trial was ordered to stand by. The jury did not contain one single person in the same condition in life as these Donegal prisoners. Such circumstances as these bring the law into contempt, not only in Donegal but all over Ireland. How can any Catholic have any respect for the law so long as his creed is considered a disqualification for serving on a jury, and he is subjected to what is an insult in open Court? The Bill, I hope, will be read a second time, and I know the effect of carrying it into law will do much to make the law respected, and will do much to strengthen the union between the English and Irish people, which we have as much at heart as hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who call themselves Unionists.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Kilbride.)

(3.24.) MR. M. HEALY (Cork): In seconding the Motion, I would point out that the Bill is only a return to the ancient Constitutional practice prevailing both in England and Ireland. In the famous Magna Charta it was declared that a person arraigned on a criminal charge should be tried by a jury "indifferently chosen," and this is the law which nominally is supposed to prevail in this country and in Ireland. It was found at one time that the Crown had succeeded in evading the law by exercising an unlimited right of challenge, and accordingly, some 500 or 600 years ago, Parliament solemnly enacted that the Crown should have no right of challenging a jurymen except for cause shown, but this Act the Crown evades by exercising the right to order a person to stand by. Nominally, the Crown prosecutors do not challenge jurors, but really they do by calling on jurors to stand by. They exercise this right of "stand aside" to an extraordinary extent by summoning a whole panel, and I have known the summons extend to 300 persons. In cases of misdemeanour a prisoner has six challenges, in cases of felony, 20; but the Crown has practically unlimited challenge in both; so that instead of the trial being conducted before 12 jurymen indifferently chosen, persons appear before 12 jurymen selected by the Crown. We are solicitous to put an end to this state of things, and hence we support the Second Reading of this Bill.

(3.26.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The hon. Member who moved the Second Reading of this Bill seemed to be under the impression when he sat down that I would rise to defend the administration of the law in Ireland from charges he did not make against it. Now, I do not think any Member of the House would expect that anybody charged to any extent with the administration of the law in Ireland would get up and evolve charges from his inner consciousness for the purpose of demolishing them. If the hon. Gentlemen who moved and seconded the Motion for the Second Reading have not thought fit to formulate charges in detail it is certainly impossible for me to imagine them. The hon. Member who moved the Second Reading did make allusion to a specific trial, and both hon. Gentlemen made allusion to a practice which they said is largely exercised. The hon. Member alluded to recent trials in a county with which I understand he is connected, trials at Maryborough. It was a vague and general statement, and, before referring to it, I should like to read to the House the statement of an eminent member of the English Bar who attended these trials for purposes of observation simply; and I take the opportunity of saying I wish other members of the English Bar, who have any doubts as to the manner in which the law is administered in Ireland, would follow the course that Mr. Crompton adopted. [An hon. MEMBER: He denies it.] I will read what Mr. Crompton said. Speaking at the annual meeting of the Irish Protestant Home Rule Association, held in Dublin, on the 22nd of October, 1889, Mr. Crompton said:—

"He had attended the trial at Maryborough,"—(it was the case of Father M'Fadden and others)—"this week, and he must say he did not complain of the way justice was administered by the learned Judge, or of the way in which the Protestant jurors acted. So far as the Judge was concerned, he (Mr. Crompton) had attended thousands of trials, and he never heard a criminal trial conducted more admirably, or with greater power, ability, and fairness, than this trial was conducted by Mr. Justice Gibson. He thought he was an honour to the Irish Bench and the Irish nation, and the only regret was that Mr. Justice Gibson did not join the Protestant Home Rule Association. The jury appeared to have done their duty fairly, and to have brought in a verdict of guilty because they considered there were extenuating circumstances connected with the arrest of Father M'Fadden which exasperated the people, and, in the eloquent words of the Mac Dermot, 'made them mad.'"

An hon. Gentleman interrupted me by saying that Mr. Crompton afterwards denied, or modified or qualified that statement. He did nothing of the kind. I know the letter to which the hon. Gentleman referred. He did not deny or qualify his testimony as to the conduct of the Judge and jury, but said he made some general charges in relation to jury packing. [Cheers.] I know the charges.

There are two distinct classes of charges that may be made. You may make a charge against a certain system, and you may go further, and say that system produces practical injustice. I deny the existence of the system as alleged by hon. Gentlemen opposite—[Cries of "Oh, oh!"—and before I sit down, I shall read testimony, which, I think, will have weight with hon. Gentlemen. The hon. Member who moved the Second Reading of the Bill said that no Catholic could have respect for the law, because his religion was used as a means of insulting him in Courts of Justice. I give the most categorical denial to the suggestion underlying that statement. No person is ordered to stand by in Ireland on account of his religion. This is not the first time this House has heard accusations of this kind, and this is not the first Government against which accusations of this kind have been made. Similar charges were made against the Administration of Lord Spencer, but what has Lord Spencer himself said? I should not think of producing Lord Spencer as a witness if the speech from which I desire to quote were one delivered by him during the time he was administering the law of Ireland with firmness and with success. But the speech from which I am about to make an extract was made in other days, and I presume that, in his present state of mind, Lord Spencer will be accepted by hon. Gentlemen opposite as a credible witness, particularly in a matter in his own personal knowledge. Speaking at the Eighty Club, on the 8th of March, 1889, Lord Spencer referred to the complaints of the prevalence of the practice called jury packing which were made while he was responsible for the Government of Ireland. He said—

"We thought we had done away with the cry in Ireland, this painful cry of packing juries; but I was quite mistaken. I found in my experience later in Ireland that when there were cases of agrarian or political moment which created much excitement among people the cry was again raised, and I will just explain how it came about. Some of you may not agree with me. You may think that I am not giving a proper version of affairs, but what happened was this—I speak of Dublin, and I do not know so much about the rest of the country—"

[Ironical Opposition cheers.] Yes, but complaints were made in relation to Dublin, and if the allegation is found, on the testimony of Lord Spencer, to be utterly untrue in relation to Dublin I ask you to draw the same inference in respect to the rest of the country. Lord Spencer continued—

"In Dublin the Law Officers of the Crown, when the panel of jurors was called over, considered whether there were any publicans on the panel or farmers who lived in isolated districts. I do not think I shall be contradicted when I say it is the duty of the law officers to see that no absolutely partial person is on the jury. The Crown had a right to set aside peremptorily or for cause, and the prisoners to challenge a certain number of jurors. I believe the law officer would not be doing his duty if he knowingly left on the jury a man whom he knew would give a verdict independent of the facts. It was the habit to challenge these two classes, and the reason was that the publicans were put in such an invidious position with their customers, if they went against the feeling of their customers, and did their duty. The same thing occurred with regard to the farmers in any district. What was the result? I know, because I have cross-examined the officers on the subject, and I know these men did not challenge because a man was a Roman Catholic. I am satisfied that the law officers did not challenge and set men aside because they were Roman Catholics; but the result was that, as these two classes were invariably Roman Catholics, we constantly had juries in Roman Catholic districts almost wholly made up of Protestants."

[Ironical cheers.] Do hon. Gentlemen believe Lord Spencer of 1889 or not? They are not derisively cheering any statement of mine, but a statement of Lord Spencer, as to what occurred when he was Governor of Ireland, in regard to matters which must have been within his own knowledge. He says he was satisfied, from inquiries made at the time, that no person was challenged because of his religion. I do not think more important testimony on the subject could possibly be adduced. Let me remind the House that the accusation of jury packing was made just as strongly and vigorously in the time of the late Government, and in the House of Commons, on the 26th of February, 1883, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan) said—

"He was able to give, from his own personal experience, the most complete contradiction to one of the assertions made by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). The hon. Member had said that since the Crimes Act was passed, juries in Ireland could not be trusted to exercise judicial impartiality—that trial by jury did not exist, by which he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) supposed was meant that juries empanelled under the Crimes Act, could not be trusted to do their duty."

Then he went on to pass a eulogy upon Mr. Justice Lawson, who presided at the trial of Michael Walsh, and added—

"But he did not wish to say a word about the jury. He went into Court as an entirely unprejudiced spectator. He did not know what proportion of the jury was Protestant and what was Catholic; but he desired to say, having had some experience, both favourable and unfavourable, of juries in this country, that never in the whole course of his life had he beheld a more intelligent, a more patient, or a more impartial jury, and he thought he might add, a jury more indulgent to the prisoner. Every single question they put was directly to the point, and, as he could judge, most of their questions were directed to elicit some point in favour of the prisoner. He could say emphatically that no man could have had fairer trial, and at the conclusion of it he could not help saying that if that was the way they packed juries in Ireland, he only wished they would pack English juries in the same way."—(Hansard, vol. 276, p. 892.)

That is the testimony of a right hon. Gentleman who supports the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and who sits on the Front Opposition Bench. Now, I have been asked several times if I would lay on the Table of the House the rule under which the Crown Solicitor in Ireland acts as regards the empanelling of juries. I am prepared to lay the rule on the Table, and I will now read it. I would first of all remind hon. Members that it is no new rule invented for a novel occasion, but a rule that has been substantially in force since 1867. The rule provides for the exclusion from the jury box of those who, from their position or circumstances, would be open to be influenced by fear, favour, or affection. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M. Healy) said this Bill would have the effect of bringing the law back to the ancient Constitutional practice in England and Ireland, and the hon. Member for South Kerry (Mr. Kilbride) said that such things as he complained of could not take place in England. I do not know whether the House is aware that the law is precisely the same in England as in Ireland. [An hon. MEMBER: "No."] An hon. Member says "No," but let him show any statute creating the smallest difference. Having due regard to my position as a lawyer, I state that the law in England in relation to the right of the Crown to order jurors to stand by is identical with the law in Ireland on the subject. This Bill will take away the right of the Crown to order jurors to stand by in Ireland.

MR. O'HANLON: Oh, oh!

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Gentleman not to interrupt constantly.

MR. MADDEN: Roscoe in his Criminal Law says that this practice of ordering jurors to stand by has existed uniformly from the time of Edward I. to the present time.

MR. MAC NEILL: The law is the same in both countries, but the practice is entirely different.

MR. MADDEN: My statement was that the law in England and Ireland is the same, and if the hon. Member merely rises to show that that is the case, his interruption is hardly necessary. He has referred me to a publication which, he says, states that the law in question in England is either obsolete or disused. Well, let us see what the Bill does, and clear our ideas. It is not a measure to bring the law of Ireland into line with the law of England. It will do exactly the opposite of that, the law of England and Ireland being precisely the same as to the rights of the Crown in respect of challenge, and I have, I think, gone far enough to throw the burden of proof on the shoulders of those who wish to establish a different system in Ireland. I have the authority of my Colleague (the Attorney General for England) in saying that any such statement would be unfounded. The hon. Member who moved the Second Reading, and the hon. Member who seconded the Motion, cannot be said to have discharged themselves of the burden of proof, the conjoint duration of their united oratorical efforts having been about eight minutes. It may be right to alter the Jury Law of Ireland, of it may be wrong, but, certainly, we should not adopt a suggestion for alteration unless it is supported by some show of argument. The law and practice are that the Crown Solicitor shall exclude from the jury those likely to be influenced by fear, favour, or affection, and when it is said that there is greater reason why the right of challenge should be limited in Ireland than in England, I would point out that there are, unfortunately, more classes of persons in Ireland who are likely to be influenced by fear of combinations, by favour, and by affection, than there are in England. I have had many interruptions during my speech, but I do not complain of them. I am always anxious to meet, as fairly and as far as I can, any argument brought forward from the opposite side of the House, and I always like to know what are the points hon. Members wish me to deal with before I sit down and exhaust my right to speak. But if the interruptions which have come from hon. Gentlemen opposite could be counted by the clock, I feel sure they would be found to have occupied quite as much time as the speeches of the Mover and Seconder, and perhaps to have been more to the point. With regard to these interruptions, I may remark this: It is said that the law may be the same in England and Ireland, but that the practice by which it is worked is different. Well, that is a question of fact as to which the House should not be influenced by any opinion of mine, and I have ventured to submit the testimony of two learned Queen's counsel on the point. I read part of a speech of Mr. Crompton, and I also quoted the hon. Member for Denbigh—and theirs is testimony the force of which hon. Gentlemen opposite, I think, will admit. I also read to the House the speech of Earl Spencer, who was responsible for governing Ireland, and he gave the result of his own inquiries into the working of the system. I think Earl Spencer's testimony overbalances the assertions which have been made by hon. Members opposite. I met with a passage in a speech delivered by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford, which, I think, is significant on this point. The hon. and learned Member was speaking to a meeting in County Wicklow, in October, 1888, and, according to a report which appeared in the Freeman's Journal, was denouncing what he called jury packing, and complained that every good Catholic was insulted by being told to stand aside as being unfit to serve as a jurymen, and he was interrupted by one of his audience calling out, "And every good Protestant too." Now what did his audience understand? Did they understand that jurymen were directed to stand aside on account of religious belief? [An hon. MEMBER: Certainly.] But what did the interruption mean when the hon. Member was referring to the complaint of Catholics, did it not mean that objection was made to both Catholics and Protestants? What did it mean? [An hon. MEMBER: "Packing."] I should rather call it "unpacking," unpacking from the jury all those likely to be unduly influenced in the discharge of their duty as jurors. The power of the Crown has been exercised, and I trust will continue to be exercised, to exclude from the jury all those who, irrespective of creed or politics, would, from their position, be likely to be influenced in their verdict by fear, favour, or affection.

(4.0.) DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): The right hon. and learned Gentleman seems very ingeniously to have avoided the whole point of the question. It is not a question whether the rules and directions given to the officers of the Crown are observed; it is a question whether jury packing exists or not; it is a question whether, instead of a system keeping out of a jury those influenced by fear, favour, or affection, you put into the jury box those who are influenced by interest, hatred, and antipathy towards the prisoner. This is the accusation made against the Government of Ireland; it is not an accusation of yesterday, it is an old accusation; numbers of unfortunate people are obliged to run the gauntlet of this system, and the same stereotyped excuse is always given. I am thankful that we have not heard one excuse; we have heard hundreds of times from the other side of the House, that it is simply by chance that a jury all Protestant are selected from a panel upon which half, at least, are Catholics. I have collected a few facts in relation to the doctrine of chances. Take an ordinary panel of 78, upon which the religions are equally divided, and suppose there is no intention of excluding one party, what are the chances against one party being excluded? We know that in certain trials, for instance the Maamtrasna trials, five consecutive juries, on each of which there was not a single Catholic, were selected from a panel where Catholics and Protestants were equally divided. An ingenious friend of mine has calculated the chances against 12

Protestants being selected by the ballot in five consecutive juries out of an equally divided panel of 78, and the chances are 110,099 to one.

*(45.) MR. C. DARLING (Deptford) : I think an English Member may be excused for intervening in this Debate, seeing that it is allowed the law in England and Ireland is the same, and only the practice of ordering jurors to stand by differs. That is admitted, and I think it is most objectionable to apply the practice to Ireland alone unless there is something in the condition of Ireland or the condition of prisoners that makes it expedient to have this difference in practice. But experience which would justify the passing of this Bill would justify its application to England and Ireland alike. If it is bad to give the Crown the power of ordering jurors to stand aside without cause shown, why then it is bad altogether, and the Bill should apply to both countries. If there is any justification for the Bill, why not give us the grounds upon which you ask us to pass it, and why did not an English Member second it? The purview of the Bill is limited to Ireland because there is a difference of practice there, and, of course, it is obvious why there is that difference. The hon. Member who introduced this Bill gave us no reason why we should pass it; he only said it was the habit of the Crown in Ireland to order Catholics or Protestants to stand aside as the exigencies of the case seemed to require. But, even admitting this practice exists, to my mind that would not in itself be a reason for altering the law. What we want to induce us to make the alteration is, that some proved case of injustice should be brought before the House, not only that Catholics had been tried by Protestants, or Protestants by Catholics. In either case, it does not follow that the trial would not be a fair one; there must be something deeper than this. Hon. Members are at no loss in dealing with facts and in acquiring information where information is to be got. Why, if there is any case to which they can point under this or a former Government where a man owing to these religious differences was wrongfully convicted, do they not bring that case before the House? If they do so, I can only say—supporter of the Government as I am—that I will support this Bill. If they bring before the House a case in which it can be plainly and distinctly shown that, owing to the action of the Crown in packing a jury with the political or religious opponents of an accused person that an unjust verdict was obtained, I would not for a moment support the maintenance of this law. [An hon. MEMBER: Joyce.] We have heard pretty well about the Joyce case; and if hon. Members are going to maintain that Joyce was wrongfully convicted, all I can say is they will have to argue their case at much greater length than now appears to suit them, and it will require much more evidence than has yet been brought forward to influence my vote. I know they have charged Lord Spencer with "burying in the grave the proofs of his own guilt," but they have made no attempt to show to the public of England that the conviction and punishment were unjust or unlawfully obtained by Lord Spencer through his legal officers. There are those sitting opposite now who were in office when this miscarriage of justice, if miscarriage of justice it were, occurred. They have had the leisure of opposition to re-consider the case, but I should be surprised if one of them should get up and express the opinion that while they were in office their own colleagues did procure the wrongful conviction of an innocent man in order to get a political opponent out of the way. I should be surprised to find the charge against Lord Spencer and his Law Officers repeated now. But although it is alleged as a reason for bringing in this Bill, that Protestants or Catholics may be ordered to stand aside, I cannot for a moment suppose that the fact of a man being the one or the other is the real reason actuating the Law Officers. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has told us that the fact that so large a proportion of Catholics being ordered to stand aside cannot be the result of chance. I should never have thought that anybody who had received a very large would maintain support. I can speak with merely sentence on the subject to which it himself some attention, and having, among downer, had to deal with question addressed by the expansions of towns, access land becomes valuable, and when no redress frequently can be obtained from the landowners, whose themselves upon a jury, before whom a co-religionist from the parish is to be tried, it is a duty and obligation upon the jurymen to find a verdict for that prisoner, right or wrong. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, unfortunately, we know perfectly well that it has been done. We know that the influence of many among the Catholic Priesthood has been used from the pulpit—[Interruptions. "It is not true." "It is a lie." "Quote a case."]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. C. DARLING: To impress upon their followers that the law, as administered, is an alien law, that they owe no obligation to it, and that they owe no obligation to the oath taken as a juror. If after this kind of incitement to the Catholic people, an incitement which has not reached Protestants, the majority of those who are directed to stand aside are Catholics, who can wonder at it? [Cries of "It is not true. You dare not repeat that out of doors."] What I dare repeat outside the House is not the question. There are assemblies even more turbulent than this where I should have difficulty in saying what I have said. But what I have said will go forth, and it may be denied by hon. Gentlemen where and when they please, here or elsewhere. We know that among the Catholic people from whom jurors are drawn a pamphlet has been circulated in which they are told to do exactly that which hon. Gentlemen now suggest that the priests never told the people to do. A certain Nationalist barrister, Dr. Council, wrote a pamphlet before the trial of Father M'Fadden, and we know the contents of that pamphlet. If hon. Gentlemen have not made themselves acquainted with it I may quote an extract, and I may mention that it has also found circulation in the Leinster Leader. Here is a passage—

"But the verdict, when given is a judicial act, and in this the jury are absolutely independent and above the authority of the Judge. This I propose to prove by showing that the jury in a criminal case have an unquestionable right to find a verdict of guilty or not guilty"

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Perfectly true; they have.

*MR. C. DARLING:—

"To find on the law and the facts or the case without regard to the direction and instruction of the Judge."

Mr. C. Darling

SIR W. HARCOURT: Hear, hear!

*MR. C. DARLING: The right hon. Gentleman is learned in International Law, and, therefore, he knows both English and Irish Law. Does he mean to assert that the jury have a right to find on the law and the facts of a case without regard to the instruction and direction of the Judge?

SIR W. HARCOURT assented.

*MR. C. DARLING: Then why does the Judge sit there and give directions on the question of law if the jury have a perfect right to disregard his directions? Does the right hon. Gentleman know what happens if the jury disregard the directions of the learned Judge on matters of law? The right hon. Gentleman has had some experience at the Parliamentary bar, but has not much acquaintance with the Criminal Law. If he had in practice before a Court occupied a tenth of the time wasted before Committees the right hon. Gentleman would know that when juries disregard the directions of the Judge upon a point of law their verdict will be set aside, and there is no limit to the number of times in which the case may be set down for trial, until the jury learn what the right hon. Gentleman has not as yet begun to appreciate—that they have no right to disregard the direction of the Judge on a matter of law? For this digression hon. Gentlemen opposite must thank the right hon. Gentleman. Among other things contained in this pamphlet is this, that every juror told to stand aside should protest against the insult to his honesty and intelligence, and should make this protest in such a way that it would be heard, not merely inside the Court, but out of it, and through the length and breadth of the United Kingdom. Now it is remarkable that when in cases such as those to which this pamphlet is addressed certain jurors were challenged, they did exactly what the pamphlet told them to do. And not only so, but when a jury had been obtained, such was the intimidation used, such was the spirit among them, such the false and heretical opinions upon matters of law and of fact and of the duty of jurors, that they were unable to agree upon a verdict; and so plain was the case that when the prisoners were afterwards put on their trial they pleaded guilty and admitted that all alleged against them in law and in fact was true. Now I ask hon. Members who do not look on this as a piece of Party tactics to reflect when they are told that the law as regards juries in Ireland is not fairly administered, is it not necessary, is it not absolutely—[An hon. MEMBER: Ridiculous?]—no, that was not the word I was about to use. Is it not absolutely obligatory on hon. Members who ask us to vote for this Bill to show that it is not promoted with a desire to embarrass the Government, but because there is a genuine opinion that the law is bad and wrongly administered? Is it not obligatory upon them to get up and show that under this or a former Government some proved injustice did take place that there was some wrongful conviction not due to such occasional miscarriages of justice as may take place from mistakes of the jury or perjury of witnesses, failures to which all human institutions are liable? I put it to right hon. Gentlemen who have been responsible for the government of Ireland, and hope to be so again, can they possibly find it in their consciences to support this Bill without some case made out in its favour? The law in England and Ireland is the same, but the practice is different; but that arises from the necessities of the case. The division is not between Irishmen who are Protestants and Irishmen who are Catholics, but between Irishmen who are Fenians and rebels and Irishmen who are loyal subjects. So long as that is the case it is necessary that the practice in England and Ireland should show a divergence. For my part, I say, if the law is to be altered let it be altered in both countries at once; but it is not shown that the law is bad because differing circumstances cause a divergence in practice.

(4.28.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I did not intend to take part in this Debate and am not now going to discuss the Bill; but I cannot allow to pass without challenge such an extraordinary and ignorant statement as has been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman, of which a layman ought to be ashamed, not to say a lawyer. The statement which the hon. Gentleman contradicted was this: that a jury in a criminal trial had a right to find a verdict irrespective of the direction of the Judge. I should have thought that there is no English citizen who does not know that that right is the foundation of our liberties. I have often heard it stated that practising barristers do not know anything of the principles of law. I would recommend the hon. Gentleman to get a copy of Lord Erskine's speeches. What was the fame of Lord Erskine founded upon except that he induced juries to find verdicts against the direction of Lord Mansfield. The whole liberties of England depend upon that. There is another case with which any ordinary English reader is acquainted. He has never heard of it probably. I recommend him to read a copy of Holmes' Trial. In that trial the jury found dead against the direction of Lord Ellenborough; and on a further trial the jury found dead against him a second time. And it is said in Lord Campbell's Lives, so far from the Judge having rough-handled the jury, the jury killed the Judge, who died of mortification because of their not having found in accordance with his direction. Really, Sir, it is shameful to delay a Bill which has for its object the amendment of the Jury Law, and that such ignorance should be displayed by Gentlemen who endeavour to talk out the Bill. That is all I have to say in reply to the hon. Member for Deptford.
